THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 11 MAY 2005]

FIFTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 440

SEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 2005–2006

House of Commons

Monday 28 November 2005

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

WORK AND PENSIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Council Tax Benefit

1. Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): What progress his Department has made in simplifying the application process for council tax benefit. [31681]

4. Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): What progress his Department has made in simplifying the application process for council tax benefit. [31684]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): I recently authorised the third annual publicity and marketing awareness campaign aimed at getting everyone who is entitled to council tax benefit to take it up. In a separate exercise, the Pension Service is already telephoning existing customers nationwide who do not appear to be getting council tax benefit and is filling in a simple three-page claim form on their behalf. In addition, from December, the Pension Service will take council tax benefit claims at the same time as new pension credit claims.

Andrew Gwynne: Will my hon. Friend expand on whether it may in future be possible to remove all form-filling from the council tax benefit process?

Mr. Plaskitt: As my hon. Friend will see, we are making good progress towards that objective. There used to be a 26-page form, but now, for many claimants, that is reduced to a three-page form. Some of them do not even have to fill it in—they have only to sign it after the Pension Service has completed it for them. Ultimately, we would like to reach a point at which we can have automatic take-up of the benefit, based on data that already exist in the Department. We are having work done on that and I expect to receive a report on its feasibility next spring.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: There are areas in my constituency of high deprivation and poor adult literacy, so I welcome the fact that we are making the process simpler, but will my hon. Friend assure me that, in doing so, we do not jeopardise the good work being done to tackle fraud and error in the system?

Mr. Plaskitt: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. Indeed, as we move to greater automaticity in handing awards out to those who qualify for them, we will remove the opportunities for error that arise when forms have to be completed. I am happy to say that, in respect of housing benefit and council tax benefit, the level of fraud and error is falling. It is down by 8 per cent. over the past 18 months. Fraud alone is down by 30 per cent. over that period.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): One reason why there is so much concern about this issue is the massive increase in council tax that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has put on to councils by stealth. Will the Minister tell us how many people were claiming council tax benefit in 1997 and what the latest figures are?

Mr. Plaskitt: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that what is important is to ensure that pensioners who are having difficulty meeting their council tax bills get the council tax benefit that is rightly theirs. We estimate that as many as 1.5 million pensioners might not be receiving that help. They should be receiving £800 million-worth of benefit. It is incumbent on all of us in our constituencies to ensure that pensioners who would benefit from obtaining that help with their council tax bills get it. I hope, therefore, that he will support the take-up campaign.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): The Secretary of State informed the House that forms were now simple for pensioners to fill out. However, that is not the experience of senior citizens in Shrewsbury, many of whom have come to see me to say that the forms continue to be difficult to fill out. Would he be prepared to see some of their letters in the coming weeks and then perhaps reassess what he said earlier?

Mr. Plaskitt: I have studied the forms, so I know exactly what the hon. Gentleman is talking about. As I said, there used to be a 26-page form, but that is now down to three pages. In many instances, pensioners do not have to fill in or even see the form. It can be filled in for them over the telephone. It is then sent to them for their signature and can be returned in a stamped addressed envelope. We have been piloting that scheme from the pension centre in Nottingham and, so far, 100,000 forms have been completed in that way, which has already resulted in 15,000 additional pensioners receiving council tax benefit. That is £10 million-worth of additional council tax benefit being handed out, without anyone having to complete complicated forms.

Basic State Pension

2. James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): By how much the basic state pension will be up-rated in 2006–07; and if he will make a statement. [31682]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): The general uprating statement will follow the pre-Budget report. The basic state pension will be uprated by at least 2.5 per cent. or in line with the retail prices index if that is higher.

James Brokenshire: As the Minister said, increases are generally in line with the RPI or 2.5 per cent. If the RPI for September of this year had been used, that would have resulted in an increase of £1.14 less per week than if an earnings link had been attached to it. Will he make representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to restore the earnings link, or does he think that that would be a less than fruitful conversation?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman might find it instructive to check his own party's record in Government on this issue. The basic state pension was uprated 18 times between November 1980 and April 1997, and that was done strictly in line with prices every time, except on one occasion in 1994, when an extra 50p a week was added in a futile attempt to soften the blow of VAT on fuel. We shall not take any lessons from the Conservatives on the level of the basic state pension, which is 7 per cent. higher in real terms today than it was in 1997.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): It has been widely leaked that the Turner report will recommend the reinstatement of the link between the basic state pension and earnings. If that recommendation is accepted, will the Government implement it in time for the 2006–07 uprating?

Mr. Timms: I can only advise my hon. Friend to wait for the Turner commission's report on Wednesday. I can assure him that it will be a substantial and important document, and I am sure that he, along with all other hon. Members, is looking forward to seeing it.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Was the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions consulted by the Chancellor before the Chancellor wrote to Lord Turner?

Mr. Timms: I am not entirely sure which correspondence the hon. Gentleman is referring to. If he is referring to leaked correspondence, that is not a subject that I shall comment on, other than to say that the arrangements for the uprating of pension credit have been well established for a long time.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that any decent Government must ensure that a decent basic pension is paid to our poorest pensioners? May I counsel him against taking advice from those who believed that £67 a week was sufficient for a pensioner to live on, and who broke the earnings link in the first place?

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend is right. In 1997, there was a large number of pensioners whose total income, through income support, was £69 a week. Every single person in that position now is entitled to an income, through pension credit, of at least £109 a week. There has been a dramatic transformation in the prospects of people who were abandoned on low incomes by the previous Tory Government, and we will not go back to those days.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Because the Government have managed to plunder people's pension funds, there are now far more pensioners dependent on either the basic state pension or means-tested benefits than there were before. Is not that a good argument for Lord Turner's recommendation that the basic state pension should rise in line not with prices but with earnings?

Mr. Timms: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman is driving at, but I remind him of the scandal of mis-selling that took place under the previous Conservative Government, which left many people in extremely difficult circumstances. I hope that he will recognise from his experience among his own constituents on the Isle of Wight that the pension credit has been a means of raising a large number of people out of poverty—2 million people across the country as a whole. We must certainly not go back to the days when pensioners were left on an income of £69 a week.

Pension Credit

3. Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): If he will make a statement on the take-up of pension credit. [31683]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): At the end of June, 2.7 million households in Great Britain were receiving pension credit.

Mr. Vaizey: The Minister will be aware that only 21,000 households took up pension credit in the last quarter for which figures are available, and that 1.7 million pensioners still do not take up pension credit. Does that not make it clear that the take-up of pension credit has stalled? What further measures will the Government take to help our poorest pensioners?

Mr. Timms: We are doing a great deal about this. It is not true that only the number of applications that the hon. Gentleman suggested were made during that quarter. It was a much larger number—about 80,000, I think. But of course there were other people who, perhaps through death, stopped claiming. Between April and October, Pension Service staff made 500,000 home visits to make it easier for people to claim their entitlements. As the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) said, we have done a great deal to simplify the process, and we shall do more over the next few weeks. Indeed, in a new campaign, 500,000 people have been mailed on this issue since the middle of October, and another 800,000 will be mailed between now and March.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Does the Minister accept that the take-up of pension credit is probably far higher than the official figures show and that, in both Birkenhead and Wantage, Members of Parliament would have difficulty in finding a pensioner who had been eligible for pension credit for any length of time but was not claiming it? If it is true—as I believe it is—that this Government have redirected more money to poorer pensioners than any other Government since 1948, is it not important for us to recognise that, following the publication of the Turner report, we shall be able for the first time to concentrate on long-term reform rather than remaining bogged down in the reforms that will help the poorest pensioners now?

Mr. Timms: My right hon. Friend has made an important point. When the report is published on Wednesday, it will be clear that there is no crisis over pensioner incomes, for the reason that he gave. He also suggested that fewer people than we thought might be eligible for pension credit, and there is some evidence that that may be so.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Does the Minister agree that a central problem of pension credit is the disincentive caused by high marginal rates of withdrawal, amounting to 40 per cent. or more? What analysis has his Department conducted of the effects of change in the marginal rate of tax or benefit withdrawal on pension credit, in terms of people's willingness to save?

Mr. Timms: There is little evidence of any damage to saving incentives being caused by the current arrangements. There has been an element of means-testing of pensioner incomes since 1908, but the key point is that pension credit has lifted 2 million pensioners out of poverty, and abject pensioner poverty has been consigned to the history books. That is a huge achievement and we want to ensure that it is maintained.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Will the Minister bear in mind the outreach services offered by the Pension Service? The Pension Service has opportunities to work with local voluntary organisations and local authorities to contact pensioners who may be reluctant to telephone contact centres and who need to know about the benefits to which they are entitled.

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend is right. There is much scope for the Pension Service to work creatively with the voluntary sector and local authorities. Joint teams involving the Pension Service and local authorities and, in some instances, voluntary agencies, are being established all over the country. I agree that that approach could be developed further, and that the service provided for elderly people could be significantly improved.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Minister agree that, had proper reform been carried out eight years ago, fewer people would now need to rely on pension credit? In the light of the revelation from the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that the Prime Minister considered a proposal to build on my plans for basic pension-plus and was put off only when he was reminded that he had attacked it during the general election, will the Minister ensure that future reforms are not based on party-political considerations?

Mr. Timms: I do recall the debate about basic pension-plus, which I think contributed to the failure of the right hon. Gentleman's party in the 1997 election. I hope that the Turner report will provide the basis for national consensus on the way forward. There is wide agreement on the need for reform. I trust that, now that we have addressed the appalling problem of pensioner poverty with which we were left in 1997—as was pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)—we can build wide agreement on what further steps are needed.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that in Hove and Portslade in my constituency, pensioners are unclear about, for instance, savings thresholds? Will he confirm that a particular target of his take-up campaign will be pensioners whose claims have been turned down in the past, and that the campaign will not be aimed only at new applicants?

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend has made an important point, but as the credit is uprated in line with earnings, people who were not previously eligible may well find a couple of years later that they are. My hon. Friend may wish to advise her constituents to telephone the pension credit application line on 0800 991234.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Has the Minister seen a copy of the Chancellor's letter to Lord Turner, in which he stated:

"you should not assume that the current"

link of pension credit to earnings "will continue beyond 2008". With 1.7 million pensioners failing to claim pension credit, and 2 million pensioners still living in poverty, does the Minister accept that scrapping the link would condemn even more older people to poverty, and be, in the words of Help the Aged, "unforgivable"?

Mr. Timms: The commitment to uprate pension credit in line with earnings up to 2008 is long established, and has been set out time after time. The uprating that we have seen has made a big contribution to lifting large numbers of pensioners out of poverty, and I reassure the hon. Gentleman that this Government's commitment to keep people out of poverty will endure.

Pensioner Poverty

5. Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the extent of pensioner poverty. [31685]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): Tackling the legacy of pensioner poverty that we inherited when we came into office has been one of our top priorities. The introduction of pension credit means that every pensioner is now guaranteed a weekly income of at least £109, compared with £69 in 1997. Those and other measures have helped nearly 2 million pensioners escape from absolute poverty.

Mr. McFadden: Of the 2 million pensioners whom the Secretary of State mentioned, 5,600 in my constituency are receiving pension credit at an average rate of £45 a week, which makes a huge difference to their standard of living. Will he assure the House that, whatever the Government's response is to the Turner commission report, we will not return to the days before the pension credit, we will keep protecting the incomes of the poorest pensioners, and we will not see again the situation when the Conservatives were in power in which pensioners were expected to live on as little as £69 a week?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making those points. We have no intention whatever of returning to the poverty pensions of the previous Conservative Government. His constituents and, I am sure, those of many Members on both sides of the House, will support what we have done. We have made significant progress in tackling pensioner poverty, and will continue to place a high premium on doing so.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Does the Secretary of State acknowledge that one way to tackle pensioner poverty would be to have a better state pension, and that one of the things that could help to pay for that in the long term would be reform of public sector pensions? Does he agree that, over the weekend, signals from the Government on the issue of public sector pensions have been difficult to read? Can he confirm today whether or not the deal on retiring at 60 until 2048 is unbreakable—yes or no?

Mr. Hutton: On the basic state pension, we have seen significant improvements because of the measures that we have taken. I think that I am right in saying that most of those have been opposed by the hon. Gentleman and Opposition Members. On Lord Turner's report, I think that I am also right that the only political party in the House that has so far pre-empted it is the Liberal Democrats, who have already announced what their policies are. On the public sector pension deal, we have no plans to revisit that.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): With regard to pensioner poverty, my right hon. Friend will be aware that, at one time, pensioners who had savings had the income from those taken into consideration when their pensions were balanced out. The point was reached at which the Government of the day introduced a £3,000 limit, above which all savings were automatically chopped. That sent a message to many pensioners, which, I believe, is still in their mind, not to reveal to the state any amount of money that they had for fear of any entitlement being cut. They do not want to get embroiled in that system. What plans does he have in place to ensure that pensioners are not penalised for saving and that any income that they receive is not automatically deducted to a higher amount than that which they receive from their investments?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The introduction of the savings credit was the first time that any Government had provided an incentive for pensioners who have saved. It is an important precedent to have established that people do the right thing when they save for their retirement, and it is the Government's responsibility to support people when they do so. In relation to specific proposals, he and the House will need to wait until the publication of Lord Turner's report on Wednesday and the Government's response later in the new year.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I listened carefully to the Minister for Pensions Reform's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) about pension credit uprating. He did not answer the question, so perhaps the Secretary of State can help us. Will the Government uprate pension credit in line with earnings from 2008?

Mr. Hutton: Those are all matters for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, particularly in this very cold spell, poorer pensioners welcome the £200 winter fuel allowance? Will he promise that we will not return to a system under which help was provided only if the temperature fell below freezing on seven consecutive days and under which only those on income support received perhaps £7 or £8 a week? Is not our system superior, certainly for poorer pensioners, to what happened during the 18 years of Tory government?

Mr. Hutton: The policy that relied on temperatures dropping below freezing for seven days before pensioners got any help was totally inadequate and we certainly will not return to that. Winter fuel payments have made a significant difference and, again, I think I am right in saying that they have been resisted by the Conservative party.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that many future pensioners who will be dependent on the state pension to avoid poverty feel indignant that, while they may be expected to continue working until the age of 67, the Government's own existing employees will be allowed to continue retiring at 60 for up to the next 40 years? I listened carefully to what he said to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws). He said that there were no existing plans to reopen the issue but did not rule it out completely. Given that the Prime Minister has said that he was very unhappy with that deal and that conflicting signals have come from Government Departments, will the Secretary of State be more explicit? Is he simply saying that there are no plans as of today to reopen that deal, or is he ruling it out completely?

Mr. Hutton: We have no plans to revisit that deal. I am truly surprised that the right hon. Gentleman has sought to raise that issue in the House today. [Interruption.] I am very surprised, for one simple reason: I have had the opportunity to look at the guidance sent out to all Conservative parliamentary candidates at the last election, guidance that will have been read by some new Conservative Members. That guidance made it clear that his party not only had no plans to raise the pension age but would revisit any plans the Government made so to do. If he wishes to be treated seriously, he has to come here with serious proposals and, as on every other pensions issue, he has absolutely nothing to say.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): May I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden)? I have similar numbers of pensioners in my constituency who benefit from pension credit and would live in poverty without it. When I have debated with people who have works pensions and wish to have a link to earnings, every one of them—honourable to their last breath—has said that they would wish that only if it did not mean that the most impoverished pensioners lost their pension credit. Will my right hon. Friend make sure that the first priority is that we remain with the pension credit and deal with those of pension age in serious poverty?

Mr. Hutton: Yes.

Incapacity Benefit Green Paper

6. Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): Why the incapacity benefit Green Paper was not published before the summer recess. [31686]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): The welfare reform Green Paper will be published in January, taking forward our agenda to build a modern, active and inclusive welfare state, built on the principle of individual rights and responsibilities.

Mr. Holloway: Does the Secretary of State acknowledge that, in 1998, one of his many predecessors said that

"1 million disabled people say that they want to work but are not being given the chance."—[Official Report, 28 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 340.]?

Why are 1 million people still waiting?

Mr. Hutton: We have introduced a series of reforms that have seen the number of new claimants for incapacity benefit fall by a third and, for the first time since records began to be collected, there has been an overall fall in the total numbers claiming incapacity benefit. Our proposals will be announced in January and will extend new opportunities to people who have a sickness or a disability. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will welcome them when he sees them.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The fact of the matter is that many people want to get back into work, but who is going to lead them back? Is it the responsibility of Jobcentre Plus or the Learning and Skills Council or some other body? People who may just have come out of prison or who have been out of work for a long time need someone to help them, if they are on incapacity benefit, back to work. Which Government agency is responsible for helping those people? We hear about so many statistics, but the reality is that these people need practical help, so which Government agency should provide it?

Mr. Hutton: The lead responsibility clearly lies with Jobcentre Plus, but it needs to work in partnership with local organisations, including the voluntary sector and some private providers. That is necessary to provide a proper package of support to help people to get back into work quickly. That is what we want and the main responsibility clearly lies with Jobcentre Plus.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend assure me that, in the forthcoming Green Paper, he will not overlook the needs of people whose disability is mental ill health? Too often we overlook such people and I believe that, in designing a new system of incapacity benefit, we must ensure that they are not neglected.

Mr. Hutton: Yes, I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I believe that something like four in 10 of new claimants for incapacity benefit are reporting a mental illness of some kind or other. It is important, if we are to make progress with the reforms, that we specifically address the needs of those people.

Pension Fund Deficits

7. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What his most recent estimate is of the level of pension fund deficits; and if he will make a statement. [31688]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): There are different ways of estimating pension fund deficits. The pensions regulator estimated last month that the aggregate deficit measured on the FRS 17 accounting standards was £130 billion as of December 2004.

Mr. Bellingham: The Minister may be aware that many of my constituents have had their lives ruined as a result of company pension schemes being wound up. The firms include Motokov, Albert Fisher and Dalgety. Some of my constituents do not even qualify for help under the financial assistance scheme. Does he understand the anger and dismay that that causes and recognise that it is heightened by the way in which the Government are treating public sector pensions? Does he believe in a two-tier pensions system?

Mr. Timms: I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome the extent to which the financial assistance scheme is helping people who find themselves in the difficult circumstances that he described. In the case of Dalgety, of course, there has not been an insolvency, so in those circumstances, the employer has the responsibility of honouring the pension promises that it has made. As to public sector pensions, I advise the hon. Gentleman to look at the advice given to him and his fellow Conservative candidates by the Conservative party during the last election. It was made very clear that the Conservative party did not support changes to public sector pension arrangements. I admit that the position appears to have changed somewhat over the last couple of weeks, but simply jumping on a new bandwagon is not a very good way of tackling the problem.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): About 2,000 current and former employees of Scarborough bus and coach builder Henlys stand to receive only a third of their expected pensions after the company ceased trading, with a pension deficit of £80 million. Workers within three years of retirement would normally have qualified for the Government's financial assistance scheme, but no insolvency event has occurred. Is the Minister aware of that case, as well as Dalgety, and what would he say to my constituents who may be deprived of financial assistance through what they see as a financial technicality?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing this case to my attention, but I can say to him only what I said to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham)—that in the case of Henlys, the company has not become insolvent. People therefore need to look to the employer to honour the pension promise that was made.

Housing Benefit

8. Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): If he will make a statement on his plans to reform housing benefit.

[31689]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): Reform is already under way. In 2002, we put in place a comprehensive strategy for the reform of housing benefit, which is already delivering results. For example, the average processing times for new claims have been cut by two weeks. We are also testing a simpler system for paying housing support in the private sector—the local housing allowance. The findings of the 18 pathfinder authorities are being carefully evaluated and will inform our decisions on the next steps towards improving support for housing costs. Reform in this respect, of course, needs to complement our overall strategy on welfare reform.

Adam Afriyie: I thank the Minister for his answer, but there rightly continues to be concern about the effect of the Government's housing policies. In particular, the pathfinder pilot appears to discriminate against those on the lowest incomes who are claiming housing benefit. Which of his Department's policies does he believe has been the least successful in this area?

Mr. Plaskitt: I studied very carefully indeed the responses from all 18 pathfinder authorities and they do not confirm what the hon. Gentleman is saying. In fact, all have achieved considerable success and there certainly are useful and important aspects of this reform that we can build on. I ask him to bear in mind the other aspect of housing benefit reform—the current scheme's performance. I wonder whether he might give us a hand by having a word with his local Liberal Democrat-controlled council, whose performance on processing housing benefit has slipped from 28-day processing in 2002 to 52-day processing.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Lord's prayer that we have just said in this Chamber consists of 66 words and there are 42 laws of cricket, but the housing benefit regulations consist of 967 pages, five parts, six schedules and 40 statutory instruments. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is no wonder that the local authorities charged with implementing housing benefit find those regulations too intricate, long-winded and expensive? Which of their reactions and comments is he taking on board in order to tackle this problem more effectively than in the past 20 years?

Mr. Plaskitt: We have of course been assisting local authorities in handling this complicated benefit, and we have put in place the performance standards fund. Some £160 million has been allocated to 370 local authorities, many of which have been extremely successful in improving their performance in processing the benefit. My Department sets a 36-day standard for processing, and that standard is now being met by 222 local authorities; three years ago it was met by only 129. My hon. Friend is right to point to the benefit's complexities, and such complexities are the reason why we are starting to simplify it and reviewing more far-reaching reform.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): According to the National Audit Office, £600 million a year is lost through housing benefit fraud. Although we Conservatives welcome the introduction of flatter, more standard-rate elements to housing benefit, which must be sensible, it is being restricted to the private sector.

I learned that, according to the Minister's Department, such reform of the social rented sector will be achieved only toward the end of the decade. What on earth is he waiting for?

Mr. Plaskitt: No, we have not said that. We have pointed out that there are very substantial differences between the structures of the housing markets in the private and social rented sectors, so any reform of the benefit must of course take that into account. On fraud and error, the £600 million figure to which the hon. Gentleman referred is correct, but I should point out that losses arising from housing benefit fraud have fallen by 30 per cent. in the past 18 months. My Department has set a target of reducing fraud and error jointly by 25 per cent. by 2006, and we are on course to meet it.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the careful way in which the local housing allowances are being piloted. However, has he seen representations made by groups such as Shelter and Barnado's on the effect of the single room rent control on the under-25s? In some cases, considerable hardship has been caused to vulnerable young people. If he can identify some modest changes to the rules that will meet our concerns about those vulnerable people, will he do so?

Mr. Plaskitt: I have studied the submissions to which my hon. Friend refers carefully and we do not believe that expecting young people to share accommodation is unreasonable. After all, 60 per cent. of single childless young people aged under 25 who are not in receipt of benefit rent shared accommodation. We must consider that abolishing the single room rent would result in single young people on benefit being able to afford a level of housing that many of their working peers cannot.

Computer Systems

9. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What assessment he has made of the performance of the new customer management system computer system. [31690]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): The new customer management system is being introduced across the Jobcentre Plus service. Some difficult problems have been associated with its introduction and they have impacted on Jobcentre Plus's service to its clients. Improvements to the system and its associated processes are being made, and these changes are leading to much better standards in both service and performance.

Hywel Williams: I thank the Minister for that rather inadequate reply. Is she aware that customers are waiting three weeks for a call back, four further weeks for an interview and that customers who use Welsh wait twice that time, because the script—ludicrously—is not available in Welsh. Operators have to translate the English script into Welsh, talk to the customer in Welsh, translate the replies into English for the record and send them off to be translated back into Welsh to send to the customers. That is not providing Welsh-speaking customers, or customers in general, with a proper service. Does she agree that something needs to be done now?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): Answer in Welsh.

Margaret Hodge: I wish I could, but that is not one of my talents. I can tell the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) that, across the whole infrastructure in Wales, we have Welsh-speaking officials who can respond to Welsh-speaking clients. Indeed, he will know that the new system is not yet in place for his constituents. I know that the truth sometimes stands in the way of a good story, but the truth about the call-backs is that, yes, the situation was bad when the system was first introduced and the service was poor. However, the latest statistics for November show that call-backs take place, on average, in 1.6 days, which is within the standard we want and is achieved across the nation, including Wales.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Sadly, it is all too clear from the recent BBC survey, which showed that a third of calls went unanswered, that in the introduction of the system the Department has once again let down vulnerable people and, incidentally, increased staff stress. Will the Minister now give an assurance to the House that all those who call Jobcentre Plus before the end of this week—if they can get through—will be called in for an appointment and have benefit paid to them before Christmas?

Margaret Hodge: It was not a BBC survey that was reported in the press last week: it was a survey that we did to ensure that performance and standards could be improved—

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Was it an internal survey?

Margaret Hodge: It was an internal survey that we undertook to see how the new system was bedding down and I agree with hon. Members that problems occurred with its introduction. I assure the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) that the most recent statistics—for performance in the second week of November—show that nearly 90 per cent. of calls were answered, which reaches our standard. Claims for both income support and incapacity benefit are being processed above standard, but the processing of claims for jobseekers allowance is falling a little below standard, and we will seek to make improvements. I see no problems in the future like those we have seen in the past.

Incapacity Benefit

10. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): How many incapacity benefit claimants he estimates will return to some level of work following his reform of incapacity benefit. [31691]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): Our welfare reforms will help us to reach our aspiration to increase further the number of people in work, so that we enjoy an 80 per cent. employment rate in the UK. Our incapacity benefit reforms will support that aim by opening up employment opportunities to many more people. Our broad estimate is that the reforms will help 1 million people into work who might otherwise be claiming incapacity benefits.

Richard Ottaway: I thank the Minister for that clear answer. Will the time-limiting of incapacity be permitted? Her Department seems to be against it, the Prime Minister is for it and, when the Secretary of State was asked the other day, he was silent on the matter. Could the Minister give a hint about the way that issue is going?

Margaret Hodge: The hon. Gentleman will know that we will abide entirely by what we have said in our manifesto and in the five-year plan. I suggest that he read both documents—[Interruption.] They are consistent with each other. He should then await the publication of the Green Paper, which is now promised in January.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that reforming benefits on its own may remove disincentives from the system, but not necessarily get people off incapacity benefit and into work? Extra help is needed, perhaps using the new deal for the unemployed and the new pathways-to-work programme. Indeed, it has been shown recently that rehabilitation is the key to getting more people off benefit and into work.

Margaret Hodge: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's comments. If we simply consider the benefit, we will not provide the opportunity that we want to give to many people who have been locked into dependency on incapacity benefit for so long. We need not just to provide the support that has been demonstrated to work effectively in the pathways-to-work programme, but to consider intervening early to prevent people from even starting on that journey on incapacity benefit, by providing proper health service support in the early stages. We should also to consider the whole process through which people travel on their journey on to incapacity benefit to find out whether that cannot be more effectively administered and implemented.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): At one of my surgeries recently, a gentleman staggered into the office, walked very slowly up to my desk, sat down and said, "I have been on incapacity benefit. I have doctors' and consultants' certificates saying that I cannot possibly work, yet I have now been put on to job seeker's allowance." When he asked why, he was told, "It's because the Government want to get people off incapacity benefit." Will the Minister comment on that case?

Margaret Hodge: I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman understood the processes by now. Existing claimants are regularly called in and reassessed to find out whether they remain eligible for benefit. Unless the hon. Gentleman provides me with details to the contrary, I am sure that the constituent to whom he refers was called in, probably examined by doctors who work with our system, and reassessed as being capable of work. May I make a final comment? The problem with the current system is that all we do is check people's eligibility for the benefit by assessing their incapacity. What we want to do is look at what people can do—their capabilities—so that they can contribute to the world of work and, of course, support their own families and feel the self-esteem that comes from being able to work.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The Minister has referred again to this 1 million figure for the number of people whom the Government want to take off incapacity benefit and get into work, but is she aware that the claimant count level of unemployment in the economy generally has been rising for the past nine months? The background is getting more difficult. Is that why the Prime Minister and his policy unit are reported as wanting to time-limit incapacity benefit and pay it by way of vouchers rather than cash, presumably to force people into work when his other policies have failed? Will the Minister now clarify that point because a great deal of confusion and concern has been caused by the row between her Department and No. 10? Otherwise, we must wait yet more months for the much-delayed discussion document or Green Paper.

Margaret Hodge: May I say two things? First, the right hon. Gentleman will know that we have been incredibly successful in growing the number of jobs in the economy, and that it is not a shortage of jobs that has led to the unfortunate and accepted slight increase in the claimant count for jobseeker's allowance in recent months. There are other factors at play and we are working to tackle them.

Secondly, our entire agenda is not driven by cutting benefits. That agenda was familiar to many Opposition Members for decade after decade. Our agenda is about ensuring that, in the same way that we have introduced a range of civil rights for people with disabilities and health problems that help them to gain access to goods and services, we now introduce the right and opportunity for individuals to enjoy the benefits of work.

Deaf People (Benefit Claims)

11. Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): What representations he has received about the difficulties that people who are prelingually profoundly deaf may experience while claiming benefits; and if he will make a statement. [31692]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Our aim is to provide an accessible service to all our customers. People who are prelingually profoundly deaf may claim benefit in a variety of ways, including by using a British sign language interpreter, or suitable communicator, to help in their own home if required.

Annette Brooke: Is the Minister aware that a recent survey of all customer service managers in the disability and carers service by the ombudsman's office revealed that only three requests for British sign language interpreters had been received in a whole year? From the ombudsman's report, which overwhelmingly supported my constituent, it appears that help is needed to access help. Will the Minister assure me that she will work with the voluntary sector and other bodies to improve accessibility to the benefits system—and, indeed, pathways to work—for anyone with a sensory disability?

Mrs. McGuire: I am aware of the case that the hon. Lady mentions, and I hope that I can give her some reassurance. Among other organisations, my officials are meeting Sign It!, which I understand was the group that supported her constituent. That group provides communication and interpreter support to the deaf community. We are working with it to explore the potential for improving arrangements for making claims. I reassure the House that the disability and carers service has produced a British sign language DVD version of its customer information leaflet, which will be available from 16 December 2005. We are examining further ways in which we can ensure that communication is extended.

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What impact does my hon. Friend think the access-to-work scheme has had on people who become deaf over time, either while in employment or due to age-related nerve deafness or industrial deafness? Is she aware of a report by the Disability Employment Coalition that says that for every pound spent on the scheme, £1.48 is accrued in extra revenue to the Treasury? Does she agree that deaf, deafened and hard-of-hearing people need help not only to enter employment, but to stay in employment and off the benefit system?

Mrs. McGuire: I thank my hon. Friend for raising the access-to-work scheme. As she and many hon. Members will be aware, that successful scheme supports disabled people, many of whom become disabled of a result of illness or accidents during their working lives. The scheme helps them into employment and sustains them in employment. I am aware of the report that my hon. Friend mentions. Some of the figures in it are perhaps not universally accepted, but it highlights the importance of such support to disabled people to ensure that they can fulfil their potential in the workplace.

Council Tax Benefit

12. Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): If he will take steps to increase the take-up of council tax benefit among pensioners. [31693]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): We have already done so. Over the winter we will again, with local authorities' support, be running publicity and marketing awareness campaigns that are aimed at getting everybody who is entitled to council tax benefit to claim it. As I said in reply to an earlier question, the Pension Service has, by telephoning existing pension credit customers nationwide, already filled in and issued nearly 15,000 of the new, simplified three-page claim forms. Those are real improvements to help pensioners to get the support that is theirs by right.

Anne Snelgrove: I thank my hon. Friend for that and for his earlier answers. He will know that the issue is important because, according to the excellent House of Commons Library, the take-up of council tax benefit appears to be lowest among pensioners, when analysed by either case load, or expenditure. Pensioners who are already claiming benefit sometimes face a long delay before the outcome of their cases. What steps is he taking to shorten that delay for those who are already in the system?

Mr. Plaskitt: My hon. Friend is right to point out that the over-65s is the group with the lowest take-up—it is probably about 63 per cent. We thus think that about 1.5 million pensioners who are entitled to council tax benefit are not in receipt of it. We are moving towards a point at which those who are on guaranteed pension credit can be automatically signed up for council tax benefit. As we have the information, we now know who to telephone, which is what the Pension Service is doing. All that speeds up and simplifies the process. As I said earlier, steps are being taken to make the process automatic, ideally.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Is not a system whereby the basic state pension goes up by only the comparatively small level of prices, even though the council tax has been consistently going up by at least double that level of inflation—if not more—over recent years, inevitably going to cause extreme hardship to some of our poorest pensioners? Is that not inevitably going to drive them on to benefits, especially council tax benefit? Is not the real answer to keep council tax increases at or around the level of inflation? What representations has the Minister made to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to keep council tax increases down towards the level of inflation so that the poorest pensioners in our country are not caused such hardship?

Mr. Plaskitt: First, it simply is not the case that more and more pensioners are being driven on to council tax benefit. In fact, back in 1997, 3.2 million pensioners were picking up council benefit; it is now 2.5 million. It is a smaller absolute number because of increases in pensioner income, thanks to the introduction of the pension credit and other measures taken by the Government that have gone a long way towards eradicating pensioner poverty. That is why the actual take-up of council tax benefit by pensioners has fallen in absolute numbers.

However, we still need the campaign to encourage take-up because many pensioners, having successfully received pension credit—which is a large additional amount for them in terms of their income—think that that is as far as it goes and are surprised to find that there is additional help. We also find that owner-occupiers mistakenly believe that they are not entitled to help with their council tax bill when they may well be. That, too, is part of the take-up campaign.

As for the size of the increases in council tax, the hon. Gentleman should consider which side of the House has political control of the councils with the largest increases.

New Deal

13. Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the new deal; and if he will make a statement. [31694]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): The new deal has so far helped nearly 1.5 million people into work. The lone parent employment rate has risen by more than 11 percentage points since 1997 and studies have shown that about half of that increase can be directly attributable to the Government's welfare-to-work policies, in which the new deal has played a major part. Also, research by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research has shown that the new deal for young people now saves the economy £500 million every year.

Mr. Stuart: On the new deal, it is noticeable how selective Ministers are in finding support for it. The Secretary of State mentioned young people specifically. The director of the Centre for Economic Performance suggests that the new deal has had a very small effect on them. In fact, he says:

"The level of employment of young people is about 17,000 higher per year . . . as a result of the New Deal."

How many people have gone through the new deal twice, three times or four times?

Mr. Hutton: It is the hon. Gentleman who chooses to be selective. He asked for evidence of the success of the new deal and I presented it to him. He chooses to ignore it. In his constituency, more than 2,000 young people have been through the new deal. If he wants confirmation of whether it has been a success, I suggest he has a chat with some of them.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Will the Secretary of State answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) about how many people have been through the new deal twice, three times, four times or more? If he cannot tell us, will he undertake to write a letter and place it in the Library?

Mr. Hutton: Of course I will be happy to do that.

Child Support Agency

15. Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): If he will make a statement on the performance of the Child Support Agency. [31696]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): Clearly, it is not as good as it should be. I think every hon. Member will agree with that. That is why the chief executive, working closely with Ministers, is drawing up a strategy to tackle the root causes of the agency's difficulties and to get it into decent shape so that its performance can begin to meet the standards we expect of it.

Mr. Gale: The Minister knows perfectly well that there is not a Member of the House who has not got a file of letters from parents with children who cannot access the money to which they are entitled, and an equivalent file of letters from absent parents who cannot afford the demands that are made on them. While both those sequences of cases are causing misery, the information technology is failing and the people working it are failing. Has not the time come to draw this whole sorry episode to a close and replace it with something that works?

Mr. Plaskitt: When did this sorry episode start? Back when the hon. Gentleman was in government and voted for it—[Interruption.] Oh yes. It is worth reminding him and all Conservative Members of that. He will know that we inherited a mess in the CSA in 1997—[Interruption.] I am happy to remind hon. Members of the work that we have done. I am sure that they will remember that we introduced reforms in 2000–01 which established a new method of calculating the maintenance assessment.

As we analyse the problems, we find more and more that many of them date back to mistakes in the setting up of the agency—[Interruption.] No, that is where most of the debt comes from. The original formula for assessing maintenance was excessively complicated, with 90 different variables. The hon. Gentleman voted for that and it led to many of the complexities in the system. He and his party set it up with second-hand, second-rate IT. We have begun the reform process. I agree with him—every Member in this House has a thick file of cases of constituents who are having difficulties with the CSA. I have spoken about such cases just as often as he has. We are just as keen to get on with reforming the agency. As I have said, we are working with the chief executive to bring forward a reform programme.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The Government have been in power for eight years and it is time that they took responsibility for the state of the CSA. The Prime Minister said yesterday that the CSA has basic design problems. Only a fortnight ago in this House, he said that the CSA is not suited to its job. With the CSA, as with incapacity benefit, the running seems to be being made by Downing street and not by the Department. Can the Minister guarantee that we will get a statement on the future of the CSA before the Christmas recess, or has he no more knowledge of the Prime Minister's plans than the rest of us?

Mr. Plaskitt: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was absolutely right when he said that the agency has basic design problems. When was it designed? It was back when the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends were in office. Let me remind him of what he said in The Guardian only last week:

"There are no easy solutions for the CSA."

He wants to know when our reform proposals will come forward. We still hope to bring them to the House before the end of the year.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): Is not the time for action from this Government long overdue? The agency has at least 400,000 cases where no payments are going to children, and it has a backlog of 350,000 cases that have not even been assessed. In respect of action that the Government are thinking of taking, will the Minister confirm that his Department is considering privatising this dog's breakfast?

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Lady has been reading the press speculation and I suggest that she treats it as exactly that. Her party's position on the agency is getting more and more confusing. I am used to hearing some of her Front Benchers suggest that we hand things over to the Inland Revenue, but the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) asked in the House last week whether it was sensible to transfer the administration of means-tested benefits for children to the Treasury. But that was last week.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Wednesday, the Prime Minister was asked why his Defence Ministers had suddenly stopped giving 2012 and 2015 as the projected in-service dates for the future aircraft carrier. He replied that it was "perfectly possible" that those might be the actual dates. At the weekend, however, reports were manifest that the project has slipped by anything up to four years. Have you, Mr. Speaker, been informed of any intention by the Defence Minister to come to the House to make a statement about this important project, or by the Prime Minister to come to the House and correct the record?

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Let me answer the point of order and then perhaps the hon. Gentleman will not need to ask me his.

The Prime Minister's responses and replies are not a matter for me. If the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) feels that the figures or statements should be challenged, he can seek an opportunity for an Adjournment debate or table more parliamentary questions. Does that help the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois)?

Mr. Francois: It does, Mr. Speaker, but might I humbly add that this is an important matter, because the current class of carriers are growing old and will be withdrawn, and the Sea Harriers that they carry for the air defence of the fleet are being withdrawn now, so the fleet is without long-range air defence? I realise that you are not responsible for the actions of the Prime Minister, but is there anything further that you can do for the security of the Royal Navy?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is a good, fighting Back Bencher. Perhaps he can do more for the Royal Navy by asking more questions.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you help me, as I tabled question 7 on the important issue of constituents who have private pension schemes that have been wound up? Many Opposition Members were trying to ask a question to raise the plight of their constituents. I saw you, Mr. Speaker, look encouragingly at Government Back Benchers, but in vain because none of them was trying to catch your eye to raise their constituents' concerns. What advice can you give hon. Members such as me who wish to raise these matters and have a long debate on a question?

Mr. Speaker: All that I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that the only thing I encourage hon. Members to do is not to shout at Ministers—that applies to hon. Members on both sides of the House. When it comes to pursuing matters on behalf of constituents, if I ever needed any lessons—I am a constituency MP in my own right—I would go to the hon. Gentleman.

Orders of the Day

Childcare Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Today is a landmark for families and children, as we have embarked on the Second Reading of the first ever Bill on child care, ensuring that all parents can make genuine choices to help them to balance work and family life, and that children have the best start in life. When the Labour Government came to office, child care and early years provision had suffered from years of underfunding and neglect. We inherited one of the worst sets of child care and family-friendly provision in Europe, and one of the worst records on child poverty in the industrialised world. We are determined, however, that child care and early years provision should be at the heart of our strategy to allow families to make the choices that modern lifestyles and work patterns demand. In doing so, we must ensure that we help the people who need it most and improve the life chances of every child.

The Bill builds on our manifesto commitments and sets out our aspirations. It ensures both that we have sufficient high-quality provision and that parents have the information that they need to be able to access the services that they want for their children. The Bill recognises that families on the lowest incomes need the greatest support. It achieves those things by setting out a new duty on local authorities to take steps to provide sufficient child care, integrating inspection regimes, setting targets for outcomes that we want to be achieved for children and ensuring that local authorities provide clear and accessible information for parents.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The Secretary of State referred to the new duties that the Bill would impose on local authorities. Will she make more funding available so that they can fulfil those duties effectively?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the £17 billion that we have put into child care provision over the past eight years—enough money to ensure that local authorities are already taking that duty seriously. We are building on those duties, but we are not providing any new unfunded pressures in the Bill.

In 1997, there was a massive gap between the needs of parents and the availability of child care, with a place available for only one in eight children under the age of eight. With an increase of almost 600,000 registered child care places, there is a place available for one in four children. In 1997, there was no guarantee of a nursery place—now there is free part-time nursery provision for every three and four-year-old who wants it. In 1997, there was no help for working parents with the cost of child care. Now, 337,000 families have benefited from the child care element of the working tax credit, compared with a mere 47,000 who benefited from the child care disregard of family credit.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): In her response to my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), the Secretary of State suggested that funding had been made available, but that the Government did not intend fully to fund local authorities' proposed new responsibilities. What estimate has she made of the cost of that responsibility for council tax payers in east Hertfordshire?

Ruth Kelly: I made it quite clear that there were no new unfunded costs in the Bill. Local authorities have a duty to make sure that sufficient child care is available to parents who need it. They must therefore map demand and talk to parents to ensure that sufficient child care is made available by the voluntary sector or the private sector or, in the last resort, by themselves. However, there is no new unfunded pressure in the Bill.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): A number of constituents, especially young mums, have told me that they feel under enormous pressure to go back to work and get their children into child care as soon as possible. Is there any provision to encourage mums to stay at home and look after their children in the early years?

Ruth Kelly: Yes, there is, and the House will shortly debate the Work and Families Bill, which will build on the existing maternity pay and leave provisions, which in 1997 were derisory. Maternity pay at present stands at six months and parents have the right to request flexible working as well, but the Work and Families Bill extends paid maternity leave from six months to nine months by 2007, because we know that parents want choice about whether to stay at home with their young children or to work. Of course, we are the first Government to bring in paid paternity leave for fathers.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I noted the right hon. Lady's comment about maternity pay being extended in the Work and Families Bill. She said that that was particularly to give families choice. Does she, therefore, support our proposal, which we made at the election, that families should also have the option of taking all that maternity pay over the first six months, to give mothers a real choice about staying at home to look after their children by giving them extra money?

Ruth Kelly: We will debate those issues in the House next week. I urge the right hon. Lady to be patient and make her comments in the appropriate forum. She knows that we have extended maternity leave. When we came to power, maternity pay was for only 14 weeks; it is currently for six months. We as a Government are pledging to extend that maternity leave and pay from six months to nine months, with a goal of 12 months. I hope that that is a measure that she will support.

Since 1997, we have started to build up services to help all parents help their children in their early years and beyond. By 2010, there will be 3,500 children's centres across the country, one for every community, building on the Sure Start approach and ensuring that more families than ever before can benefit.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): The Secretary of State referred to the large number of child care places now available. Would she say that they were well distributed in terms of class, ethnic groups, rurality and provision in urban areas?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman makes an incredibly important point. We need not only to tackle child care for those who can afford it, in places where they find it easy to access, but to tackle the clear child care gaps for more vulnerable groups—for parents of children from the ethnic minorities, for parents of children in rural communities, for those on particularly low incomes and for children who are disabled. The Bill specifically highlights a couple of areas—the plight of low income families, and ensures that there is sufficient affordable child care for that group, and also disabled children. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that there are other gaps that we also need to tackle, and the Bill will take that forward.

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has just mentioned provision for disabled children. She will know that provision has been improving, but it is still extremely patchy. One of the core elements of providing decent child care for disabled children and their families is training. How will the Bill improve the capacity to look after and support disabled children in child care?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. How children are looked after and the quality and leadership available in child care centres is incredibly important, including for disabled children. We will shortly publish our work force strategy, including the use of the transformation fund, which is designed precisely to ensure that there is sufficient support for workers who work in those environments and that the leadership exists so that children can be well looked after, no matter what their special needs. I hope that my hon. Friend will welcome that.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): In the context of her earlier answer, can the Secretary of State guarantee, in the interests of giving choice to young mothers, that if a young mother chooses to stay at home and look after her children, the taxation, allowances and benefits will be exactly the same as if she goes out to work?

Ruth Kelly: I am very aware that, from time to time, the Opposition make the proposal that there should be tax relief on child care. That is their favoured approach to those issues, but I have never favoured it as the sole answer, partly because it favours taxpayers and the wealthy at the expense of the low paid. Our provisions in the Bill and elsewhere are designed to make child care accessible and affordable to all groups who need it. That is the approach that we have taken.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ruth Kelly: I want to make some progress and then I will take interventions from my colleagues and others.

The Bill will use all the facilities at our disposal. For example, by 2010 all schools will be providing access to a range of extended services, including child care, from eight in the morning until six in the evening. Over the past eight years, such reforms and innovations, alongside the £17 billion that we have invested in early years and child care services, have brought an area previously at the margins of public service into the heart of the welfare state.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Earlier, my right hon. Friend mentioned affordability. When she looks at the special needs of children with disabilities, will she take into account the cost of child care to their families? All too often they have to pay what is called the disability premium, so child care is much more expensive for them. Will she look into that issue?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Bill tries to ensure that there is sufficient affordable provision for disabled children. Local authorities will need to take that into account when providing child care and ensuring that sufficient child care is available in their local areas.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con) rose—

Ruth Kelly: I shall give way once more before making some progress.

Mr. Evennett: I was interested to hear the right hon. Lady's response to the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble). Does she agree that child care costs in the UK are among the highest in Europe, so if no additional funding is going to local authorities, yet they still have to provide additional facilities, will not that push up further the costs for parents?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. That is why it is so important that we have invested £17 billion in early years provision and child care provision over the past eight years. We intend to put more funding into child care, both through the extended schools, to which I have just referred, and through Sure Start centres, setting up such a centre in every community in Britain. That investment was opposed every step of the way by the Conservatives. Britain's hard-working families need that investment.

As family patterns change, with more women working, families need their Government to support them, not a Government who would tell the 1 million and more women in work since 1997 that it would be better if the social clock were turned back a couple of decades. Our aim is always to support parents as they try to make the right decisions for their children, rather than to pretend that the Government know best. That is why we believe that there is no excuse for the do-nothing policies that faced families in the Tory years. Simply shouting "Nanny state" at any measures to support families will not work in the modern world.

Our achievements since 1997, although substantial, do not go far enough. Sixty years on from the Attlee Government, who did so much to establish the welfare state, we must extend its frontiers to embrace the greater opportunities and to confront the bigger challenges of the modern world.

Our "Every Child Matters" programme and the Children Act 2004 have put children and their safety and well-being where they should be—centre stage. The Bill takes that forward and focuses specifically on the early years of childhood. It places a duty on local authorities to improve outcomes for all young children. Every child should have the opportunity to fulfil their potential.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The Secretary of State has made several references to the duties placed on local authorities, and the Bill shows that those duties will be significant. In a previous answer, she said that no costs would be involved in those duties. There would thus be unfunded liabilities for local authorities, and I am at a loss to understand how no costs can be involved in such a large number of duties. If they are to have the significant impact described by the right hon. Lady, surely they will put many costs on local authorities, which will put up council tax.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman does not take into account the fact that, over the next three years, there will be an average real terms increase in investment in child care of 24 per cent. a year. Massive new investment in child care is being directed to local authorities through the Sure Start fund, through extended school provision and through other measures, which will make it possible for them to carry out the duties in the Bill.

The Bill in itself does not impose any new unfunded pressure on local authorities. It formalises the role that they have already been playing. It gives our vision statutory force and sets out clear priorities for the use of the considerable amount of money already flowing into the system.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): May I raise with my right hon. Friend the fact that the "Every Child Matters" document did not pay proper attention to the role of housing? Can she say what the Bill will do to increase the protection provided to homeless families with children?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Housing is a key part of the "Every Child Matters" agenda and needs to be taken into account in the inspection regime, ensuring that every child fulfils their potential in the fullest sense. As I was saying, the Bill places a specific duty on local authorities to improve outcomes for all young children.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Clause 6 places a duty on local authorities to secure sufficient child care for working parents. Does the Secretary of State agree that, while not calling for public expenditure, it is a route through which more funds will go into child care, because the working tax credit, which is not cash limited, means that more funds will go to child care when more places are available?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The generosity of the working tax credit system has been increasing over the years. It has increased again recently. That has opened up child care to ordinary hard-working families, sometimes for the first time.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ruth Kelly: I must make some progress.

Because life chances are still too often determined by parental background, we want to see local authorities reduce inequalities between the poorest children and the rest. The local authority role will be to champion the rights of young children and their families. To do that, they will work with partners to develop integrated services focused around the needs of the child, and they will involve parents in the design and delivery of the services to ensure that they meet their needs. Sure Start children's centres, already being established throughout the country, will play a vital role in achieving those aims.

To enable parents to balance more effectively their work and family responsibilities, we are placing a precise duty on local authorities to secure sufficient child care for working parents. Local authorities already play a key role in planning, commissioning and delivering services for young children and their families and the Bill formalises that role.

Ruth Kelly: I must make some progress.

To achieve that, every local authority will have to take into account what parents say they need, particularly those on low incomes or with disabled children. Every local authority will then have to work with providers in the voluntary, private and state sectors and do all they reasonably can to ensure that there are sufficient places and that those match parents' needs.

Parents need information and guidance to allow them to make informed choices between the services available, so the Bill extends the existing duty on local authorities to provide information about child care so that parents know about the range of services available for their child from birth to the age of 19.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ruth Kelly: I give way one last time to the hon. Gentleman, who has been very persistent.

Mr. Hurd: Does the Secretary of State share the concerns of the Daycare Trust, whose judgment is that the Bill will not help non-working families and therefore ignores the needs of vulnerable children from workless households, particularly the disabled? Those children would arguably particularly benefit from high quality early years provision. Does she acknowledge a gap?

Ruth Kelly: I do not. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the duty refers specifically to working families but, as child care provision is increased, that child care provision will also be there for those families where no one is in work. As the supply increases, it will not differentiate between the types of parent who want to avail themselves of child care.

These measures call for an appropriate regulation and inspection framework both to give parents confidence that their child is safe and secure and to give children high quality learning experiences and stimulation. For young children, there is no distinction between care and learning. Care cannot be considered good quality unless it provides opportunities for children to learn. Equally, learning must be provided in an environment where children feel safe and secure. However, the current system implies that there is a difference between care and learning. That is why we want to change the legal structure to bring them together in a single coherent system that allows young children to be safe and secure and to learn and develop through purposeful play, just as they would at home with their parents.

To achieve that, the Bill will introduce the early years foundation stage—a single phase of development for all young children during which activities appropriate to their age will be provided to support development. That will build on the widely welcomed foundation stage and the "Birth to Three Matters" framework, and help us to ensure that all children are getting a good start in life. Our objective is for all providers to work to and be inspected against the same framework. That will reduce bureaucracy and raise the bar on quality.

Currently, all child care providers for children under the age of eight must register with Ofsted. However, there is no such requirement on those that provide only for children over the age of seven, so parents have no way of knowing that that provision is safe and that their children will be looked after well. The Bill will simplify and extend the current regulatory framework so that for the first time Ofsted registered child care will be available for children over seven. Registration will be voluntary for providers that care only for children aged eight or above. We think that that is right and proportionate to the level of risk.

However, there will be strong levers to register for all those providing child care. For example, only registered provision will be eligible for tax credit support. We will also provide guidance to schools developing extended services that they should work only with registered providers. The inspection regime for child care provision at schools will also be simplified. If a school provides child care for its pupils on the school site, it will be inspected by Ofsted as part of the routine school inspection.

This landmark Bill shows a Government who assess and act, listen and respond, and learn and move forward. We have witnessed fundamental changes in the world of work and in the way in which families want to live their lives and we have taken decisive steps. As a result of the Bill, parents will have the certainty of knowing that, whatever their situation, high quality early years services and child care will be available to support them and their children.

The Bill is an essential part of our drive to ensure that every child has the chance and support that they need to fulfil their potential. It is an essential part of a modern Government, forging a modern welfare state that supports families and helps them in making difficult decisions on balancing work and family life. That is what this Government believe in and what the Bill is all about. I commend it to the House.

3.57 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I welcome many of the aims and much of the content of the Bill, which the Secretary of State has explained. However, I am a little concerned about the tone of some of her remarks and I emphasise that Opposition Members—indeed, I thought it applied to all of us in the

[Mrs. Theresa May]

House—recognise the very important role that child care plays in Britain's future. The Secretary of State made a number of claims about Conservative party policy, so let me place it on the record that it is not our policy that the social clock should be turned back. It is our policy that families should have the choice of doing what works best for them. As someone who, as chairman of education in a Conservative borough in London under a Conservative Government, ensured that there was a child care place in a nursery for every three and four-year-old child whose parent wanted one, I take umbrage at the Secretary of State s comments about do-nothing Tory years.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: It seems a little early, but if the hon. Gentleman feels the need to intervene, I shall give way.

Edward Miliband: The right hon. Lady defends, rather surprisingly, the record of the last Conservative Government. Let me give her one fact. The child care disregard in family credit helped 46,000 families—a miserly amount. Today, the child care tax credit helps 347,000 families. Who does she think has a better record on child care?

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): The gap has got wider.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is right that, contrary to the claims made by the Secretary of State about child poverty, the gap has got wider under this Government, rather than improving.

We recognise that affordable quality child care is one of the most important concerns for many hard-pressed working families today. Indeed, for some families, access to any child care is a problem. Quality child care and effective parental support are critical to ensuring that children reach their true potential, and that families are able to make the choices about their work-life balance that best suit them, although I recognise that, for many families, it is simply a question of being able to meet the increasing demands of paying their mortgage, tax and other household bills. For the sake of the children, we must get this right, and that is why we want to do our best to ensure that the Bill goes as far as possible towards helping children. However important the issues of work-life balance might be, the outcomes for children are what really matter.

We have a number of concerns about the Bill, and I shall outline them later. The Secretary of State mentioned the Work and Families Bill, which will come to the House in a week's time. It will deal with work-life balance and parental leave, and this Bill deals with child care provision for those who are working. I am surprised that we are dealing with these issues in two separate Bills. Surely it would have made more sense for the Government to address them all together in one Bill, to ensure that we came up with joined-up legislation that works for children and families. I cannot help feeling that the presence of two Bills on these matters, led by two different Departments, reflects the fact that the Government have singularly failed to deliver the joined-up government that they promised.

The challenge for the Government—and for us, working to be back in government—is to so manage the operations and working of government that it works for people and not for Ministers and civil servants. Alternatively, perhaps the chance to issue two press releases and to make two headlines carried more weight among the Government's spin doctors than the needs of families.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): The right hon. Lady mentioned her backing for supported parenting for every child. Why, then, did her party vote against our proposals to give a mere two weeks' leave to new fathers when their sons or daughters are born?

Mrs. May: I suggest that the hon. Lady look at our manifesto proposals for parents in relation to flexibility of maternity pay and benefit. Those proposals aim to give families a choice in the provisions they make to look after their children, and in regard to whether the mother or the father wants to go back into the workplace. Choice for families is the underlying principle that we are following in all our proposals, and, indeed, in our response to the Bill.

We know that parents are under strain, and the predicament of the modern family is often particularly difficult. A quarter of all families are lone-parent families, and of the other three quarters, which are couple households, the majority are households with both adults working. In financial terms, a shocking 42 per cent. of families are in arrears with their consumer debt payments, and with the mean age of first-time mothers nearing 30, many parents are now having to cope with the double hit of simultaneously caring for children and parents. No wonder eight out of 10 parents say that they are under strain. Those are the families that we are all keen to help.

The Bill contains measures that attempt to ensure a sufficient supply of child care for families across the country. We support the idea of ensuring that sufficiency of supply, but all too often today, the problem is that families have little choice in the child care that they can use. The emphasis that the Bill places on the working families tax credit, and on the families that receive it, will yet again restrict choice, as has been mentioned earlier. The rising cost of child care places and the lack of real choice mean that many parents are left using the only child care available, rather than the child care that they would really like to use. That lack of choice prevents parents from raising their children as they see fit and from placing them in the environment that they believe will best meet their individual needs. That can result in children being less happy, and in their deriving less benefit from their child care.

Increasing the options available to parents is key to producing the kind of child care that works for families. Just as all children are different, the child care that they need to grow and flourish will be different. That is why, as I said earlier, we want policies that are designed to give parents more flexibility and more choice of child care, and more support for the most important job that they will ever do. That is why we do not believe that a "one size fits all" policy will meet the needs of all children.

We believe that the Bill is too restrictive. Too often, as we have seen, the Government's efforts to make child care more available, however well intentioned, have had an impact on other providers in the sector without producing the net gains for child care that the Government envisaged. Many Members will know full well that Government provision frequently forces the closure of private and voluntary sector child care services offering smaller groups and more flexible care.

Helen Goodman: The right hon. Lady may not be aware that there are half a million more child care places than there were when the Tories were in power. Can she explain how a programme involving public expenditure cuts of £35 billion would increase choice?

Mrs. May: The hon. Lady should look carefully at what has happened as a result of the Government's child care provision. For every two places that have opened one has closed, and choice has often been removed from parents.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: In a moment.

It is wonderful, is it not? Labour Members seem to think that all that matters is a number. The quality of child care does not matter. It does not matter whether livelihoods are affected by closures in the private and voluntary sectors. It does not matter that children are not being given the choice that they need. All that matters is a number—a tick-box, mechanistic approach. That is it.

Andrew Gwynne: Parents in my constituency, and in many other constituencies, do have a real choice. There are Sure Start centres, voluntary pre-schools, privately run nurseries, nurseries attached to schools and child and family centres. Will the right hon. Lady acknowledge that that is the true position?

Mrs. May: I am pleased to hear of the hon. Gentleman's constituency experience, but I can tell him that many other constituencies have a rather different experience. I am thinking particularly of the impact on Sure Start, on which I shall comment in a minute.

It is difficult enough for parents to find places in nurseries or play groups—that often causes them a great deal of anguish—but when those nurseries and play groups close, it means real disruption for children and real problems for parents. If we are to crack the nut of affordable child care, we can do it only by working with all providers, including the private and voluntary sector, to ensure that the needs of families are met.

There is real concern in the industry that the Bill will mean closure for many nurseries. I am sure that the Secretary of State will have read in the Financial Times last week about research undertaken by the National Day Nurseries Association. It might interest the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Gwynne) as well. More than half the association's members had seen their local authorities create child care places that competed directly with them. According to 71 per cent. of respondents, local authorities were not involving them in the delivery of children's centres, and 63 per cent. did not believe that local authorities would collaborate with providers locally to build on existing provision rather than merely replicating it. Purnima Tanuku, the NDNA's chief executive, has said that the Bill "will not succeed in reversing these trends and establishing a mixed economy in childcare."

We must make full and proper use of the capacity and skills of the private and voluntary sectors. Only by working with them, rather than competing against them, can we ensure that Government resources put into child care deliver value for money. Government provision must complement what is already there. After all, 24 per cent. of private providers are already operating in less affluent communities, and many more are keen to do so. We must harness their potential. Government must promote the mixed-economy approach, building on existing provision, which could benefit children and parents from disadvantaged communities the most.

We have always supported the work done in establishing Sure Start, and we recognise that for many parents it has made a difference. It also has flaws, however. It focuses on the 20 per cent. most deprived wards, but Government figures show that 46 per cent. of the most deprived children do not live in those wards. Too many parents who could benefit from Sure Start or a similar project are denied it, often because by refusing to work with the private sector the Government are not making the best use of resources.

Sure Start is also relatively new and untested. Since its introduction, it has gained support, but we have seen no empirical evidence of the difference that it is making in communities.

Ruth Kelly: Is the right hon. Lady going to support it?

Mrs. May: If the Secretary of State had been listening about 30 seconds ago, she would have heard me say that we have always supported Sure Start. What we have said is that we would do certain aspects of it differently. If we are to continue to support Sure Start, everybody in the House must know whether it is doing the job that it is intended to do, and whether it is making a difference.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): The right hon. Lady might not be aware that in my constituency the Bridgehall and Adswood project has received national accreditation because of the vast improvement that it has made in children's language skills at an early age, which has enabled them to go on and take advantage of nursery education. It is therefore simply not true to say that there is no empirical evidence.

Mrs. May: The hon. Lady makes a valuable point about her experience in her constituency. She might be aware, however, as I am sure that the Secretary of State is, that a research report by Birkbeck college has examined the effectiveness of the Sure Start scheme. That report has not been published, despite the fact that it was due to be published in September. When the Minister winds up the debate, perhaps she can tell the House why the publication of that report was delayed, and when it is going to be available. Newspaper reports have suggested that far from Sure Start having the impact on children's development that the Government intended, the report's findings were that it had had no discernible effect on the children that it was supposed to be helping. We have supported Sure Start, even though we would want to make changes to it, but if the Minister wants that support to continue, she must publish the evidence and let us judge for ourselves. I hope that she will provide a date for the publication of that report when she speaks later. If we are to invest a large amount of taxpayer's money in helping parents with child care, we must ensure that that provides value for money.

Edward Miliband: There is little surprise that concern has been expressed about the Opposition's view on Sure Start, because I looked through their manifesto before this debate—the education section, as I understand it, was written by the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)—and it contains no mention of Sure Start. Can the right hon. Lady explain that?

Mrs. May: The hon. Gentleman should pay more attention not only to my speeches and those of other Conservative Members but to other publications that we produced prior to the election, in which we made clear—

Mr. Evennett: More homework to be done.

Mrs. May: I thank my hon. Friend for his helpful sedentary intervention. We set out our views in a number of manifestos, and said consistently that we supported Sure Start. Perhaps by the end of the debate the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) would like to quote the manifesto in which we made it absolutely clear that we were supporting Sure Start, and significantly, that we would guarantee the funding for Sure Start, as well as supporting the concept of it.

The issue of providing value for money, about which I was speaking earlier, brings me to my second concern, which is the implication of the duty being placed on local authorities to ensure adequate provision of child care. Several of my hon. Friends have referred to that, and they have had a mixed bag of responses from the Secretary of State, who on the one hand appeared to say that there were no unfunded provisions in the Bill, and on the other, that there were provisions in the Bill, but it did not matter because they were funded. That is not the view of local authorities looking ahead to the implications of the Bill, because it places a duty on them to secure as far as is reasonably practicable child care that meets the requirements of parents who want to work or undertake training.

The Secretary of State said, and I agree, that the Bill confirms the vital role that local authorities will play as strategic leaders. We know the skills that local authorities have in delivering cost-effective services, meeting the needs of local people. Yet once again we see in the Bill the Government giving local authorities another job to do without giving them the resources to do it. Time after time we have seen this ploy by Ministers and we are now seeing a repeat performance.

As a result of the Bill, local authorities will be left literally holding the baby. Simply shifting the problem to local authorities without providing additional money will do little to solve the problem. It may lead to yet higher council tax bills for many people, because councils do not have a magic wand to wave and create more child care places. I say to the Secretary of State that if she genuinely believes that there are no funding requirements for local authorities in this Bill, she is living in cloud cuckoo land.

The Secretary of State does not need to look at me for evidence. The Local Government Association spokesman on children's services, Councillor Alison King, has said that without substantial extra government investment, it is hard to see how the Bill will increase the amount of affordable child care for low-income families. She said also that to be on track to meet the Government's ambitions means investing £200 million in the next two years, over and above existing resources. Perhaps the Minister who winds up will tell us where the money will come from.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): My right hon. Friend has identified one example in which what the Government said does not appear to match that for which the Bill provides. It is clear from clauses 12 and 13 that there will be an obligation to provide advice and assistance to parents and, in certain circumstances, to provide training to child care providers. Given that none of those is currently a duty under statute, it logically follows that all are new. Why is it that the Secretary of State is right and the head of the early years development partnership in Buckinghamshire is somehow wrong?

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend has subjected the Bill to his characteristically rigorous assessment and he is absolutely right. But it is not only those particular clauses that set out clearly new requirements that would cost local authorities. Other parts of the Bill make it clear that if the provision of child care is not suitable, local authorities will have to provide it, so there will be significant costs for them.

Mr. Paul Goodman: My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) referred to clauses 12 and 13, but clause 11 states:

"An English local authority must prepare assessments of the sufficiency of the provision of child care".

That too will surely bring costs in its wake. Should not my right hon. Friend add that to her list of costs?

Mrs. May: Indeed, and those costs are ongoing because the assessment must carry on; it is not a one-off effort by the local authority. That is why I said that I found it amazing that the Secretary of State felt able to stand up today and say that there were no new unfunded requirements on local authorities.

With the debate on private sector provision and local authority budgets, it is easy to forget the real reason why we are discussing the Bill today. We are all concerned with ensuring, as Government slogan-writers put it, the best start for all children. That brings me to my final and perhaps most important concern about the impact that the Bill will have on our children.

We all know that, as part of the Bill, the Government are establishing for the first time a national curriculum for children from birth until the age of five. This causes concern for many on this side of the House. We have had the foundation stage national curriculum in place for some time now, but I have been warning that the Government were intent on pushing a more formal educational approach further and further down the age range. At one stage, the DFES had even coined the phrase "educare." Whatever it is called—national curriculum or educare—it is clear that Ministers want to see children in the classroom at an ever-younger age.

Childminders and nurseries will be under a legal obligation to teach the early years foundation stage curriculum to children from birth until three years of age. Ofsted inspectors will then check that children are developing according to the Government programme. For the first time, we are seeing the Government's involvement in the lives of our children moved from the classroom into the maternity room. As the Minister for Children and Families has said:

"We want to establish a coherent framework that defines progression for young children from nought to five".

I think that a potentially insidious part of the Bill is the idea that the Government should and would decide how any individual child should develop month by month and use legislation to determine the outcome of children's development. Therein lies the problem. It is impossible for a Government official or a Minister to establish a framework for the development of babies—[Interruption.]

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab) rose—

Helen Goodman rose—

Mrs. May: I am going to make some progress.

Babies develop at their own pace and learn to walk, talk and understand their surroundings at their own pace. That is what nature dictates. Children grow at their own pace and it is wrong to tell parents that anything other than that is expected. As Deborah Lawson, chairman of the Professional Association of Nursery Nurses, has said:

"One child might not learn to walk until 14 months, while another walks at 10 months. So it will be very difficult to have a curriculum that matches all children's needs."

Mrs. Humble: Clause 41 introduces the learning and development requirements, and I note that it specifically points out that young children have "different abilities and maturities". It also lists simple developmental goals. We are not here talking about educational attainment, but about the development of a young child, which is what health visitors and the like already look into now.

Mrs. May: The hon. Lady says that she has looked at clause 41, but I suggest that she look at clause 41(2)(b) more carefully. The educational background to the provision is clear, because it refers to "the matters, skills and processes which are required to be taught to young children of different abilities and maturities ('educational programmes')".

Mrs. Humble rose—

Michael Connarty rose—

Helen Goodman rose—

Mrs. May: No, I am going to make some more progress. I am going to return to the Professional Association of Nursery Nurses and I suggest that it would be good if the Secretary of State listened to the professionals out there, whose concerns about the Bill are evident. Deborah Lawson, chairman of the PANN section committee has said:

"It is important to find the right balance and not have unrealistic expectations of what young children can achieve. Research has indicated the dangers of introducing formal education too early as this can lead to dissatisfaction in later years. Prescriptive formal education can be too much too early for children under five."

Similarly, Peter Moss, professor of early childhood provision at the Institute of Education in London—not known, I have to say, as a hotbed of conservatism—has said that we risk creating "an 'industrial model' of early years education in which workers follow a manual to ensure children conform . . . All we will do is have a kind of template and check whether children fit into it."

That is yet another example of the Government's mechanistic, target-driven approach to development.

It is time, I believe, that the Government stood back and allowed children to enjoy their childhood and grow up at their own pace rather than forcing them into formalised learning. It is simply ridiculous to impose a national curriculum for children from birth. I wonder what is next on the Minister's agenda—testing for two-year-olds? It is not only the experts at the Institute of Education or those who are working professionally with children who take this viewpoint. Margaret Morrissey of the National Confederation of Parent Teacher Associations has also said:

"We are now in danger of taking away children's childhood when they leave the maternity ward. From the minute you are born and your parents go back to work, as the Government has encouraged them to do, you are going to be ruled by the Department for Education. It is absolute madness."

Another example comes from Juné O'Sullivan, chief executive of the Westminster Children's Society, who said:

"My real concern is that we will have death by worksheet at 2. How do you turn out creative thinkers and entrepreneurs if you ask them to act to a worksheet at the age of 2?"

Michael Connarty: I do not really want to interrupt the right hon. Lady's fantasy, but she really must look north. There has been a zero to eight curriculum in Scotland for a decade, which has proved beneficial to the educational process and the life chances of children in Scotland. The right hon. Lady should not disparage what she does not understand.

Mrs. May: I was going to make a reference to the hon. Gentleman—who has of course himself gone through education in Scotland, I assume—but perhaps I had better not.

[Mrs. May]

I hope that the Government will work with us in Committee to ensure that it is parents and children themselves who set the pace at which children develop, not the DFES.

Michael Connarty: Could the right hon. Lady please explain her earlier remark? I do not understand what she was trying to get at.

Mrs. May: If the hon. Gentleman is unable to take a light-hearted and off-the-cuff remark relating to education—[Interruption.] Sadly, this House does not have responsibility for what happens in education in Scotland. I simply say to the hon. Gentleman: do not listen just to me; listen to the professionals here in England who are working with children; listen to those who are saying clearly that they are concerned about the Bill's proposals. I also suggest that he look at the experience of continental countries, where formal education starts much later than, and where results are often far better than, in the UK.

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): I do not want Members to feel that they are being misled. Has the right hon. Lady read the framework document, "Birth to three matters", which will be incorporated in the new foundation stage? It states that the framework

"takes as its focus the child and steers away from subjects, specific areas of experience and distinct curriculum headings."

It is entirely play-based and focused on what young children like to do.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the Minister for her intervention. When she winds up, perhaps she could explain how that document ties in with what the Government have included in this Bill—the legislative framework within which everybody will operate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) said earlier, we are very conscious of the number of occasions on which what the Government say they will do, and what they do in the Bill in question, are very different. Our interest is the future of children: When the Minister winds up, I hope that she will address the issue of children being allowed their childhood in which to develop at their own pace, and not according to a developmental framework set by Ministers in this Government.

Helen Goodman: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No. As I said, I hope that in Committee, the Government will work with us to ensure that it is parents and children themselves who set the pace of development, and not the DFES.

I want briefly to mention a final issue relating to this Bill that my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) will doubtless want to discuss when he winds up, given that he has done so much excellent work on it: children in the care of the state, or looked-after children, as they are known.

Mr. Hurd: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the success of this Government's strategy depends on the quality and motivation of those providing care, and does she share my concern about the Government's silence this afternoon on the investment required to upgrade skills in a sector where pay rates are low and, apparently, 40 per cent. of nursery assistants have no GCSEs?

Mrs. May: I entirely agree with the extremely valid point that my hon. Friend makes. Quality is a key issue that is raised consistently by child care sector professionals. They are concerned that the drive for numbers could lead to a reduction in quality, rather than providing the quality necessary.

On the question of quality, I am afraid that, frankly, the state's record in caring for looked-after children is shameful. This Bill talks about the well-being of children. It gives specific duties to local authorities relating not only to child care provision, but to the overall concern of the well-being of children. It also makes specific reference to local authorities' social services responsibilities. Today, more than 60,000 children are in the care of the state—the highest number for 20 years—but to call these children "looked-after" is verging on an offence under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. One in 10 children in care misses 25 days of school or more a year. Six in 10 children leave care without a single GCSE to their name and only 1 per cent. of children in care go on to university. The Government have set a target for 75 per cent. of children leaving care to achieve a single GCSE, but the Government have failed miserably to achieve even that target. In a sense, that the Government have failed to achieve that target is not what should lead us into action. What should force us to take action is the acceptance by the Government that a single GCSE, just one qualification, in any way equips those young and vulnerable people for a life in the real world.

Beverley Hughes: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for giving way a second time. Given the concern that she expresses for looked-after children, can she confirm that her party will support the Government's intention to make schools give priority to looked-after children in their admission arrangements?

Mrs. May: I suggest to the Minister that she look at the record, because my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham moved an amendment to that very effect to the Children Act 2004 and Ministers refused to accept it.

The outcomes that I have set out would not be accepted by anybody in this House for their own children. We must not accept them for those in our care. We will table amendments to address the issue of looked-after children, and I urge the Minister to look sympathetically at those amendments—more sympathetically than the Government have done at our attempts to help looked-after children in the past.

Early-years care is about more than simply enabling parents to work. It is about giving children the best start possible and supporting parents in their role as a child's primary educator. We look forward to trying to ensure that the Bill delivers what we all want for Britain's parents, but—most important—for those who are our future, our country's children.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): It is with great pleasure that I rise to support this excellent Bill. It is good news for parents, it is good news for children and it is good news for the providers of care for children. It is also good news for employers, because they can be assured that their members of staff have high quality child care for their children while they are at work.

I speak today as the chair of the all-party childcare group, which has campaigned for exactly this initiative for many years. However, I fully acknowledge that the Government have not been sitting back for all those years and have invested in a huge increase in child care places of more than 500,000. The Government have also invested in part-time places for three and four-year-olds, new neighbourhood centres, and excellent Sure Start projects—I have one in my constituency.

I also welcome the changes to maternity pay and leave. We have had some discussion already of the increases in maternity pay, but one of the most welcome aspects of that legislation was the simplification of the rules. The previous rules were so complex that many women did not have the foggiest idea of their entitlement. Now they do. Fathers also now have rights to paid paternity leave and, importantly, so do adoptive parents. Families have adopted children who bring with them very real problems, but have had no entitlement to any leave to care for them during the initial settling-in. The Government have also met many of their targets to reduce child poverty. The Bill is an important step on the way to meeting more of those targets.

I also welcome the Bill as a member of the Work and Pensions Committee, which produced a report on child care for working parents. The Committee acknowledged that lack of child care stood in the way of many parents who wished to work. One of our recommendations mentioned the importance of flexibility in early-years places. It stated:

"Out of school care is crucial for working parents of school-age children. We recommend that further expansion of out of school care should be developed as a priority."

We all need to remember that we are talking not just about pre-school children but, importantly, about children who are at school—the point at which parents often face the most problems. Many working parents can gain access to nursery care, but many of the problems arise once their children start school. I certainly hope that, when local authorities assess the needs in their localities, they look especially at school-age children—something that is even more key when considering the needs of children with disability, to which I shall return later.

Another of the Work and Pensions Committee's recommendations was to re-examine the child care tax credit. We made various recommendations, including the possibility of creating a child care costs run-on system to provide more flexibility for parents who move in and out of the labour market. May I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children and Families that she liaise with colleagues in the Inland Revenue to consider how the child care tax credit can help parents to an even greater extent?

Other key issues raised by the Select Committee related to the child care work force, and there are no easy answers. I am sure that every right hon. and hon. Member wants child care workers to have the highest possible qualifications. We all want them to provide appropriate care, given the important job that they do. However, as those in the child care work force become more qualified, the costs to the providers also often increase. There is a tension between producing a highly qualified work force and maintaining affordability.

Certainly, when the Select Committee considered those recommendations, we took evidence from other European countries which had developed an early-years pedagogy, thus recognising that a mixture of educational and social care inputs is necessary in early-years care. In some European countries, looking after pre-school children is a graduate profession. That is a recognition of its importance: getting things right in the early years provides the foundation for everything else that happens in a child's life. Although I acknowledge that child care must be affordable, which involves a tension, may I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to address those training and qualifications issues and to look again at that Select Committee report?

John Bercow: It is very important that we use our terms precisely. The Bill clearly imposes a duty on local authorities to ensure that there is sufficient child care in their areas. Can the hon. Lady help me and the House by stating which parts of the Bill ensure the flexibility of that provision?

Mrs. Humble: I was going to put that question to the Minister, and I hope that she will respond to both the hon. Gentleman and me at the end of the debate. In fact, I want to list four key aspects of the Bill: first, the emphasis on improving outcomes; secondly, the role and responsibilities of local authorities; thirdly, parental involvement; and, fourthly, the new quality and regulatory framework.

First, I want the Bill to improve outcomes, especially for two key groups: first, low-income families and, secondly, families with disabled children. The Bill rightly focuses on working parents because it is important that they have access to the best possible quality of child care.

We must not forget about workless parents. Some parents who stay at home with their children are not disadvantaged—it is their freely-made choice. However, other workless parents find themselves at home because they have mental health problems, for example. They may be a long way from engaging in the labour market and might not have the confidence to look for training and educational opportunities.

As the Minister takes the Bill forward, will she ensure that such disadvantaged workless families are taken into account? The Bill sets out local authorities' responsibilities as the providers of support for children through the child care services in general. I hope that the Minister will consider the overall role of local authorities and ensure that such workless parents are helped by, and benefit from, the increase in child care that will result from the Bill.

That exact group has been helped by the Sure Start project. I have talked to parents who lacked confidence before they got involved with Sure Start and were frightened to access the support provided by statutory agencies. All too often, those parents' experience of education was not happy, so seeking education and training in colleges was a difficult step for them. However, through Sure Start, their self-confidence increased. Talking to other parents and educational and health care professionals encouraged them to realise that they could cross the threshold of a further education college and develop their potential. That was the one single success of Sure Start for many of them. Sure Start has addressed the needs of parents as much as the needs of children, so I hope that the Minister will recognise that in her analysis of the scheme. I acknowledge that it will be more difficult to measure outcomes for such workless parents than for working parents. However, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister will address that matter.

In the UK, there are 770,000 children with a disability or a limiting long-standing illness. The number of children with complex needs is growing all the time. Some 55 per cent. of disabled children's families live in poverty. The families of severely disabled children face three times the costs of other families, yet only 16 per cent. of disabled children's mothers work, compared with 66 per cent. of other mothers.

Last year, Contact a Family conducted a survey that found that a third of such parents were paying more than £5 an hour for child care and that 6 per cent. were paying more than £20 an hour. That was happening at a time when the average cost of a nursery place was £2.80 an hour, so the families of children with disabilities are facing real costs. If the Bill is genuinely to improve outcomes for disabled children, it must address the cost pressures on their families.

Interestingly, at the last meeting of the all-party childcare group, we heard heart-rending accounts from such parents about their difficulties in accessing child care. They experienced several problems, such as a lack of information. Many mainstream nurseries would not accept their children, whether that was because of access problems or for reasons of staff training. All too often, the parents found that staff lacked the confidence to deal with children with disabilities. I hope that my right hon. Friend pays special attention to training that gives confidence to staff who work in a variety of child care settings so that they are enabled to accept willingly a child into their care. Many parents tell me that even in nurseries that can be accessed by disabled children because they have adapted equipment, the attitude of the staff is disabling. It reflects the old adage that the child is not disabled; it is society that is disabled in its response to the child. We must not have that and need to consider the problem as we develop child care provision.

The many workless families with disabled children welcome child care not just because some of the parents want to go out to work—polls and analysis of parents' wishes show that many of them want to work—but because they want their children to socialise. It also allows them respite. We must take those considerations into account. When my right hon. Friend the Minister consults on the birth-to-five framework, I urge her to consider an explicit recognition of the needs of children with disability.

Transport has been raised with me. When families with children with disability send their child to a day care setting or a school, they have transport problems because it comes at a certain time and picks a child up at a certain time. If we want to use the extended school model to include families with disabled children, we have to consider transport arrangements. It will not be easy in some areas. For example, it will be harder to arrange taxis and other forms of transport to ferry disabled children back and forth in shire counties with large rural areas. Nevertheless, we should send out the message to disabled children that they too can access the earliest provision and the wrap-around care—the extended school hours—that is being developed.

We must also consider the needs of the whole family. Families with disabled children—some have more than one—often have other children as well. Local authorities should take other siblings into account when they think about the needs in their area. When they liaise with other statutory agencies, as the Bill requires them to do, will that include health authorities and primary care trusts? A key problem for families with children with disability is that their children are sick more often than other children. If parents choose to go to work, they are more likely to be phoned up by the nursery and told, "Your child is ill. Please come and take her home."

Again, there are no easy answers to that, but if we are to encourage parents of disabled children to access the work force, we need to consider how pre-school provision responds to sick children. In addition, many children with disability are incontinent well into their teens. Again, how will child care respond to that? I hope that my right hon. Friend ensures that there is liaison not just with the Department of Health, but with the Department for Work and Pensions, because such issues need to be taken up with it as well. Parents of profoundly disabled children want a clear message that they are included in the provisions of this excellent Bill. I call on her to say that.

Secondly, I want to refer to the role of the local authority and to some of the phrases in the Bill. What do phrases such as,

"so far as is reasonably practicable" and "sufficient childcare" mean? Referring back to my point about children with disabilities, there are practical issues that local authorities will have to face. There will be issues for parents, especially those with profoundly handicapped children. Such parents will need clarification, as will local authorities about their role. I emphasise that, although the Bill refers specifically to the employment status of parents. I hope that we can look beyond that.

Many local authorities are as keen as parents to ensure high-quality child care, and that brings me to the issue of resources. I hear what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State says about the big increase in local authority resources over the next couple of years, especially to improve the number of child care places, but she will be aware of pressures on the budgets of many local authority child care services. Given the pressures on Blackpool council and the important work that it does in protecting children from harm, there are many calls on its budget.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): I recently visited Bracknell Forest borough council educational services; we toured one or two of the schools. I agree with the hon. Lady: it seems that budgets are already under pressure. The authority is attempting to do an excellent job for children, both able-bodied and disabled. Will she urge the Minister to look at the funding requirements behind some of the new duties in the Bill to ensure that there is not undue pressure on the authorities when it comes to child care?

Mrs. Humble: Everybody present is taking part in this debate because we all care about these children and their needs. There are issues about the availability of child care places in some areas, especially in relation to child protection. However, I can see the opportunities presented by the Bill and by other legislation. There will be opportunities through the development of children's trusts to integrate services much more coherently, which I hope will help the development of exactly that sort of cross-working. Sometimes, when social services departments intervene to protect children, the families involved are exactly those for whom the local authority wants to provide child care support. So, there needs to be working across local authority departments. I see the framework of children's trusts as an opportunity to do that as well as to involve other agencies, such as the health service, which are vital.

Will my right hon. Friend monitor what resources are available? I repeat that I recognise how much money is being put in, especially to develop children's centres. That is very welcome. I visited Kincraig primary school in Blackpool last Friday, where I talked to people who are very much looking forward to having a children's centre.

The third area that I identified was parental involvement. It will be vital to the success of the Bill to involve parents in the development of provision. In spite of the information that is available, parents still come to me because they do not know what services they can access. The requirement on local authorities to seek out parents to tell them what services are available is welcome, but it is equally important that those parents are part of the development of services. For example, parents of children with disabilities should be included in considering how services can be improved and developed. Parents from black and minority ethnic groups should be involved. We must ensure that services are culturally appropriate and that such parents do not feel excluded. Parents in Fleetwood were involved in the development of the Sure Start project from the outset. Before a suitable building was identified and opened, the local managers talked to them about the services that they wanted. As a result, parents feel ownership of those services—they welcome them and engage with the delivery of direct child care provision and all the other support that is offered to them.

Finally, I welcome the new quality and regulatory framework. My reading of clause 41 is that developmental requirements are on a par with learning requirements. However, that is a false dichotomy. The Bill creates a welcome single framework for early years education and child care instead of dealing with education on the one hand and social care and health development on the other. The two are inextricably linked—children learn through play and by observing others. Children are now examined for their developmental progress. Health visitors used to visit me to make sure that my children had reached developmental milestones as babies, so such provision is not new. As the framework is developed, however, it is important that parents understand it. Sadly, parents who read the headlines in the media may think that their six-month-old will be propped up, a book placed in front of them and a pen put in their hand. [Interruption.] I admit that I read to my children when they were little, because it is good practice to teach children from a young age to follow the reading movement from left to right so that when they learn to read they can follow sentences from left to right and identify pictures. I remember teaching my children colours and shapes and playing with them as part of the educational process. We should reassure parents that the foundation stage—the new framework—encourages them to do all that with their children. We should explain that if they place their child in a child care setting, whether with a child minder or in a nursery and so on, the trained staff will do the same.

John Bercow: I am listening with great interest and respect to the hon. Lady, who clearly knows a great deal about the subject. The important point, surely, is the need for common sense and flexibility. My wife and I have two young sons—one will be two next month and the other will be three weeks old tomorrow. We are not worried about the age at which Oliver and Freddie will speak, because I did not speak until I was two and a half, but I have comprehensively made up for it in the subsequent 40 years.

Mrs. Humble: I could not possibly comment on the latter point, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman on the former. Clearly, common sense is needed, as children develop at different rates. The Bill, in fact, says that that is the case. Within the context of children developing differently, may I emphasise the special needs of children with a disability? The outcomes for them in the framework must be linked to their own personal development.

To sum up, I warmly welcome the Bill. It is an excellent piece of legislation which will bring in much clearer standards and better joint working, not just between the statutory agencies and local authorities, but with a range of child care providers. We need to take into account what we are told by the Pre-School Learning Alliance and private nurseries. They want to be part of the provision. As the Bill is debated, there will be further discussion of the role of local authorities in liaising with existing child care providers, which have a key role. The test for the Bill will be whether it provides affordable and accessible child care services to everyone. The framework represents a move in the right direction, which I find reassuring. I look forward to further debate, but above all, I look forward to the Bill being implemented so that child care is improved and becomes more accessible, so that parents and children can benefit from it.

5 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), whose constituency title is almost as complicated as mine. She has brought great experience and knowledge to the debate.

[Annette Brooke]

On behalf of the Liberal Democrats, I welcome the Bill. Given that much of our long-term policy work and commitment relating to early years provision is compatible with the 10-year child care strategy, it would be churlish not to express that general support. However, that does not mean that the Bill has our wholehearted support in its present form. There are a number of issues that I shall raise, and a great deal of detail will have to be addressed in Committee.

Like the Secretary of State, I believe it is worth reflecting on what has been achieved since 1997. I was a chair of education pre and post-1997, and I would be the first to acknowledge the extremely low base from which the Government started and the enormous progress that has been made from 1997 onwards. The creation of early years development and child care partnerships in local authorities, a free nursery education place for all three and four-year-olds whose parents want one, Sure Start, early excellence centres, neighbourhood nurseries and so on, and now children's centres are to be extended to an additional 300,000 pre-school children across 136 local authorities, plus the extended school programme. However, issues have inevitably arisen, and given the sums of money being invested, it is right that clear evaluation and monitoring take place.

I understand that in 2004–05, total public spending on child care was around £5 billion, and I agree with the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) that we need value for money from such sums. The National Audit Office reported in 2004:

"From the launch of the measures announced in the National Childcare Strategy to spring 2003, 626,000 new childcare places for all ages were created in England. However, 301,000 places have closed".

For every two places created, one was closed. Sustainability has been an issue and will continue to be one, and needs to be monitored.

Earlier this year I recall the same confusion as the right hon. Member for Maidenhead surrounding the outcomes of Sure Start. I appreciate that evaluation is continuous at a local and national level, and given the wide local variations in schemes and the length of time that it would take nationally to get a true picture, it is important not to jump to hasty conclusions, but feedback is needed. I join the right hon. Lady in calling for some indication of when an evaluation will be published. I note that the national evaluation runs from 2001 to 2008, and is predicted to cost more than £20 million.

Issues have arisen relating to the quality of provision throughout the period that I referred to—for example, the "Panorama" programme which showed some worrying tendencies in terms of quality in some settings. Will the roll-out programme of children's centres, with the provision and level of non-ring-fenced resources to local authorities, mean a watering-down of the original concept and practice of Sure Start?

In 2004, according to the Social Market Foundation report on life chances and early years, 26 per cent. of families reported unmet demand for child care, with lone parents, parents in deprived areas and parents of children with special needs affected most severely. Those conclusions seem to underpin the need for the type of proposals that we are discussing, especially as I assume that 26 per cent. must be an understatement of what the demand would have been if parents had access to more information on availability, affordability and so on.

Further underpinning for the Bill's strategy comes from the EPPE—effective provision of pre-school education—project, published last year, which found that pre-school children with three years' quality pre-school provision who started in nursery at two or younger were up to a year ahead of their contemporaries in educational attainment when they started school. Notwithstanding that report, it is important to consider other evidence that might lead to different conclusions.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): In a previous life, I visited a large number of Sure Start projects; for example, the Newcastle centre which is second to none. It cannot be beaten and gives an excellent service. However, other Sure Start projects barely qualify for their existence in terms of the provision they offer both parents and children. Does the hon. Lady agree that as we are so far away from evaluation of the Sure Start programmes we need to work towards quality standards, as projects throughout the country are so diverse?

Annette Brooke: There are strengths and weaknesses in diversity and in some ways much was learned by having different types of project. I shall talk later about quality assurance in the context of the Bill, which will be more relevant.

A number of US studies have concluded that maternal employment, particularly full-time, during the first year of a child's life is associated with poorer outcomes. On the other hand, UK evidence—in a study this year—found that only full-time, not part-time, work during the first 18 months of a child's life might have adverse consequences, but that they were minor. There were variations depending on income and education. The study also found that the quality of non-parental care is highly significant in determining outcomes. Other studies suggest that antisocial behaviour in children may stem from some of their early experiences of child care.

After a presentation at the all-party group on children, I became interested in work based on attachment theory. Sue Gerhardt, the author of "Why Love Matters", and others have studied the impact of early parenting on babies' brains and their future mental health. Given the importance of early emotional bonding, one might conclude that nursery care would be inferior to one-to-one care at home. However, I think that work shows the importance of supporting mothers, as Sure Start does, in emotional bonding with their children. It also shows why the current framework of birth-to-three programmes and their implementation matter.

More recently, there have been reports about what the families, children and child care study—the Penny Leach study—will conclude. Press reports suggested that young children looked after by their mothers until the age of three did significantly better in developmental tests than those cared for in nurseries or by nannies, child minders or relatives. However, Penny Leach and her team made the important statement that "no recommendations about childcare are made by the research team and we certainly do not advocate that all children in the early years of life must be cared for full time by their mothers, nor indeed that one form of child care is always preferable to another. However, it is the view of the team that both parental choice of care and the quality of care are most important."

I echo those points. Parents should be able to make well-informed choices and I certainly welcome the proposals in the Bill about the expansion of local authority children's information services.

On the choice agenda, in an ideal world—to which we should have aspirations, such as those suggested by the Daycare Trust—there would be universal, affordable, quality child care and 12 months parental leave paid at a level that would provide all parents with the option of being able to afford to stay at home to care for their children during the first years of their life if they choose to do so; a home care allowance paid to parents who choose to stay at home to look after their child aged 12 to 24 months and much more. Those are the ideals and I hope that we have those aspirations. Next week, some progress will be made with the Work and Families Bill, but there is still a long way to go. Liberal Democrat policy on child care provision at the general election was to include a maternity income guarantee, which we managed to finance only for first-time mothers. It contained a mechanism by which the money paid over the six months came up to the minimum wage. It is important that we work towards that, because people do not really have a choice with statutory maternity pay of £102 per week. I know that there is a tremendous dilemma: whether to lengthen the period of maternity and paternity leave, or to leave it as it is and increase the amount of money paid.

When talking about child care and early years services, commentators tend to mention the experience of Sweden and Denmark. Increasingly, the recent progress of New Zealand in investing successfully in high-quality child care is also mentioned. The Nordic states have all achieved or are close to achieving two of the United Kingdom's main policy goals—near eradication of child poverty and universal early childhood services—and high levels of gender equality and women's empowerment.

On funding levels, Sweden and Denmark currently spend around 2 to 2.5 per cent. of gross domestic product on early education and care, excluding parental leave payments. Even with the massive investment that this Government have made, which I welcome, that still accounts for just 0.43 per cent. of GDP, so we have a long way to go. The Nordic systems, to which we might aspire, have developed a truly integrated early childhood service.

The proposals in the Bill are largely welcome, long overdue, and have the potential to offer many benefits to a lot of children and families. We must, however, keep the bigger vision in mind, despite the challenge inherent in trying to increase significantly the share of GDP spent on early years provision in future decades. Even with the current proposals, many Opposition Members are concerned about whether there will be sufficient funding to deliver the Bill's goals. Inevitably, as I comment on its specific proposals, I will have to question the cost-neutrality assumptions. I want the Bill to make a difference but, without sufficient funding, what true progress will be made in plugging some of the most important gaps?

The requirement to place a duty on local authorities to improve the well-being of young children and to reduce inequalities between young children in their area, referring to the five well-being outcomes specified in the Children Act 2004, must be warmly welcomed in principle. I hope that we will be able to address the outcomes on looked-after children within that structure, but what will that mean in practice and how will it work effectively? On what basis will targets be set? What definitions will be used? How will monitoring take place? That requirement, in common with many in the Bill, is left to future regulations. It would be helpful if such draft regulations were made available for the Committee stage.

A number of organisations have flagged up the concerns that were expressed by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead about partnership working between local authorities, private and voluntary providers and schools. I wonder whether the Minister will issue guidance in that respect, as there seem to be genuine concerns that existing providers may be pushed out of the market with an expansion of child care within a children's centre or on a school site. It is important that the best solution for a local area is pursued. I do not prejudge what the right or the wrong decision will be, but we need to be assured that, across the country, local authorities are consistently working in partnership.

As we have heard, the Bill requires local authorities to secure sufficient child care to meet the needs of working parents and of those in education or training. Achieving sufficiency is defined as, first, securing child care provision that is eligible for the child care element of the working tax credit and, secondly, providing child care that is suitable for disabled children. In other words, in the Bill the duty to secure child care is closely linked to parents working.

As other hon. Members have said, however, there will be parents who decide to stay at home with their children during the early years and they may still need to access some child care. For example, a parent may want to work part-time—I refer to the evidence that I cited earlier—or to access part-time education. I would be interested to know whether the Minister for Children and Families is considering such situations and how parents can access particular sessions of child care. There is a tension in that respect, because it is quite hard for providers to provide sessions that do not run right through the week, but such flexibility can contribute a great deal to family life.

Having a break from child-caring responsibilities can improve parents' mental health, as we have heard. [Laughter.] The mother may be suffering from post-natal depression, which I do not think is funny. There will be other situations in which parents cannot work. I appreciate that social services may give support under the Children Act 1989, but given the constraints on social services, will that funding be sufficient? About 1.2 million children live in workless families and, like other hon. Members, I am not clear on where funding will come from when people really need support.

[Annette Brooke]

I am particularly concerned about disabled children and I am worried that their families will lose out. Much is promised, but will it be delivered? Children with disabilities and their families face particular challenges, and those parents often have a need for child care beyond the need to work. For example, they may need child care to be able to spend time with their other children or to attend appointments about health and education provision for their children.

The National Autistic Society's research shows that accessing critical services and entitlements during the early years is a key stressor impacting on the family life of a child with an autistic spectrum disorder. Securing provision of suitable child care should enhance the well-being of families in itself, regardless of work. For that reason, child care is a cost-effective intervention: providing services for children with disabilities such as ASD helps to prevent families from reaching crisis point, thus preventing reliance on costly residential placements.

Child care provision for children with disabilities is woefully inadequate in many areas. I am very pleased that the Government are seeking to address that issue in the Bill. However, in addition to the points that I have already made, the quality and affordability of the provision required for disabled children should be considered. Will the provision of care for children with disabilities outside the main school day be included? I am also thinking of holidays and respite care.

A mother of a severely disabled child came to my surgery the other week. Across Dorset, Bournemouth and Poole, a survey is being conducted on the provision of respite care at weekends or for whole weeks to allow the rest of the family to go away. A local authority employee told my constituent, "There is only so much money available. If we extend provision at a certain special needs school, that may well mean cuts in the overall respite budget." That was obviously very alarming for my constituent, but I have to point out that there are councils, which are starting from a relatively low base and are rather poorly funded, that may be giving with one hand and taking away with the other.

The concept of sufficiency generally should include other difficult-to-reach groups, such as ethnic minorities, and the issue of quality as well as quantity. However, as soon as we start talking about quality issues, we come to the tensions between quality and affordability. I do not know the answer to that; I suppose that the Minister has to supply the answers. First with regard to quality, I place it firmly on the record that I do not think that it is mad or ridiculous to propose an early years foundation stage. The principle of a coherent framework that provides quality and consistency across settings is in the interests of children and practitioners. Indeed, I have heard several practitioners say that they would like the present foundation stage to be extended to seven-year-olds, as it is so firmly based on skills rather than on prescribed content.

The details of the new proposals and their implementation are important. It is vital that children in their early years are given the freedom to learn through enjoyment, exploration and play, and allowed to investigate new skills and concepts for themselves. It is right that the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who did not learn to speak until he was two and a half, should have been able to develop at his own pace. We need to strike a balance between teacher-orientated and child-initiated activities that are appropriate to the individual child.

I agree with the Conservatives about clause 41. The use of the word "taught" in the clause gives me concern, when it describes

"the matters, skills and processes which are required to be taught to young children of different abilities and maturities".

That sets alarm bells ringing, and we must address that wording. There is also some concern that any proposal to extend the national literacy and numeracy frameworks down to the age of three will result in formalised learning at too young an age. It is vital that the chosen model should not be too prescriptive.

The principles underlying the early years foundation stage will be very important, as were those underlying its predecessors. There are clearly differences between the principles underlying "Birth to Three Matters" and those underlying the foundation stage. For example, the former include the principle that "children learn best by doing rather than being told", while the latter includes the principle that,

"to be effective, an early years curriculum should be carefully structured".

It will be important to arrive at a joint set of principles across this wide developmental range, so that we get this right. Both sets of principles cover the importance of working with parents. I know that preliminary consultation is being carried out on the new proposals, and I would like to emphasise that getting the underlying principles right will form the fundamental starting point.

In a second point on quality, research shows that who provides the early years education is vital in determining its quality and impact. The EPPE project found that, in socially diverse settings, the quality of practitioners' knowledge and understanding of the curriculum and pedagogy was vital. Some years ago, the Liberal Democrats proposed a new qualification—that of the qualified early years teacher. It would be a graduate qualification covering the three strands of early provision: health, education and social services. The long-awaited children's work force strategy was published earlier this year, and the 10-year strategy set welcome long-term goals for increasing the number of workers trained to degree level and for degree-qualified early years staff to lead all full-time day care settings.

Given the clear evidence that positive child development depends on services being of high quality, and that a well qualified work force is the biggest determinant of quality, I am worried that only half of Britain's 100,000 nursery workers have a child care qualification. The average gross salary of a child care worker is £7,800 a year, compared with £22,662 for a graduate trained nursery or primary school teacher. The £125 million a year transformation fund announced in the 10-year strategy to support investment by local authorities in high quality, affordable, flexible and sustainable child care provision is inadequate for a radical review of the sector. Although it shows an unprecedented commitment to investing in the work force, it equates to approximately £500 per member of the work force, which is not enough to raise salaries, invest in training or increase staff numbers. Changes need to take place over time, but it is my duty to point this out today. I acknowledge that commitments are being made, but there is still such a lot to do.

We need investment in continuous professional development. We really do need to develop a professional work force who are esteemed by the public, and in whom the public have great confidence. The tension between quality and affordability could not be greater. The Government face major challenges, given the investment that is required and the knock-on effects on the cost of child care.

The third strand of quality is registration and inspection. We welcome the Government's commitment to retaining regulation for those who care for any children under the age of eight, but I agree with some of the organisations that have expressed concern about the regulation of crèches. Let me give another constituency example. At a major facility in Poole town centre, one of my constituents had a very unfortunate experience involving a three-year-old who was not being cared for properly. Ofsted was called in, and found that regulations were not being observed. I understand from a reply given by the Minister at the time that Ofsted wanted the facility to change and to take its recommendations on board, but it had the option of offering less than two hours' provision.

Here is another of those famous tensions. The Government do not want to overregulate—none of us want to do that—but my constituent called on me to try to secure more regulations. What I consider important is for parents to be given information about crèches. Even a notice on the wall stating that a crèche is not subject to regulation would be helpful. Anyone would surely assume that a major facility in a town centre was regulated, and that all the staff had been checked. Could that information be added to the bank of information already available to parents?

I also share the concerns raised about the different registers, which may prove complex in practice and difficult for parents to understand. The Bill states that the Secretary of State "may by order provide" exemptions from the requirement to register in certain circumstances. That will require a great deal of clarification in Committee.

I have heard reports of concern about the quality and consistency of inspections of early-years facilities. I hope that as we move into a new phase, we will pay attention to the qualifications required of inspectors—the training that is required, and the processes involved in inspections. Will early-years provision at independent schools be subject to the same processes? I am pleased to learn that the same framework will apply.

We must not underestimate the importance of self-evaluation to the process of improving quality, and to the formulation of what we hope will be rare inspections. I am sure that many Members have, like me, presented quality assurance certificates in various pre-school settings. I am always proud to do that, and am always amazed that the leaders of playgroups and nurseries have time to do all the work that is needed to earn the certificates. Such processes are very important.

There seems to be some uncertainty—although perhaps not on the Minister's part—about the future of Investors in Children. I know that there are many different forms of quality assurance—I think that there are more than 70—but there should be a recognised kite mark which parents can understand. That was mentioned in the Government's consultation, but we do not seem to have been told what will replace Investors in Children if its funding is cut. When an inspection takes place in a school that covers early years, is an early years specialist always part of the inspection team? That would fit in with this agenda.

I want to conclude by commenting on the new duties on and delivery by local authorities, and particularly on what is meant by "reasonably practicable", on which several Members have commented.

We are told that the local authority must assess the market and parental needs. What are the milestones, however, to show what is reasonably practicable and what local authorities must do? There are bound to be councils in which it is very difficult to ensure that child care is available to fit every circumstance. Variations between the provision of councils such as Islington and Poole mean that their starting points will be very different. Will some families be disappointed? Is a parental guarantee being offered or simply an expectation? What is practicable in relation to children with disabilities and severe disabilities?

It will be difficult to go out and find low-income and ethnic minority families and make them aware of and interested in all the choices. In 2002, only 3 per cent. of parents had contact with their local children's information service—that figure is from a Department for Education and Skills study. I applaud the aim of developing children's information services further, but again, councils will start from different bases, and outreach work will be required.

Can the aspirations be delivered within existing funding? If the funding is based on the child care element of tax credits, we still have the dilemma about workless families. In that regard, we must think of what is best for the child. There is a continual dilemma relating to supply-side and demand-side funding, and the advantages and disadvantages on either side, and it would be interesting to hear about the pilot projects being carried out in London.

In relation to the part of my constituency other than Poole, what is reasonable and practicable in very rural areas? It is important not to set up local authorities to fail, and equally important not to enable them to get away with doing the minimum. We need to know what "reasonably practicable" means.

We have had one interesting representation on listening to children, about which we all agree. It related to listening to very young children, along with parents and providers. That work has produced some interesting results, which we might explore in Committee.

Child-centred as the Bill is, family support is so important. For families with difficulties, universal family support is needed. It is obviously very costly to provide multi-disciplinary support, work, housing, child care, literacy and training, but there are great benefits in the longer term. If the Government are serious about preventive action rather than cure, they need to examine family support much more.

How many more parents will access child care as a result of this Bill? Without additional money, will a single child get more care, or will a single parent who is struggling with affordability no longer have to struggle? Will the Bill be a false dawn? I sincerely hope not. We will work with the Government in Committee to address our great concerns about certain aspects of the Bill, although we applaud its principles.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): I welcome the Bill. The Government's continuing investment in child care and the working tax credit is and has been crucial in overcoming barriers to work and tackling inequalities. I welcome particularly the investment in Sure Start. In the poorer part of my constituency, the Sure Start project has been an outstanding success in supporting parents, raising standards of care and achieving significant improvements in language skills among the most disadvantaged children.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) about the role of Sure Start in building confidence among parents. The community's commitment to the project was evident when the Minister for Children and Families opened the Sure Start building in Bridgehall recently. Huge additional value has been secured from social regeneration projects in the area, and I hope that any evaluation of the success of Sure Start projects will take that into account—they are not simply deliverers of child care.

I look forward to the new children's centres building on the success of Sure Start in my constituency. Through a range of services, including a subsidised playgroup, it has provided support to working and non-working parents. As 4Children and other organisations have pointed out, the most disadvantaged children are in workless households and it is those children who would most benefit from high quality child care from birth, and their parents would benefit also from support. That is the basis of Sure Start provision.

Such parents are victims of a cycle of low aspiration and poor education, handed down from generation to generation, which the Government have addressed through a number of measures. I believe that it is essential to continue to deal with inequalities from birth and that children from disadvantaged and workless families should continue to get the support offered through Sure Start, including access to good quality child care.

Clause 6 is clear on the duty being placed on local authorities to ensure sufficient child care for parents who require it in order to take up, remain in or undertake work-related education or training. That is very important.

Clause 7 provides a duty to secure early years provision of a prescribed description, free of charge, for such periods as may be prescribed for each young child who has attained such age as may be prescribed but is under compulsory school age. The precise nature of this measure will be known only when it is set out in the secondary legislation that is to follow, but I hope it will be explored in Committee. At present, local authorities have a responsibility under section 17 of the 1989 Act to promote the welfare of children within their area who are in need and to promote the upbringing of such children by their families. I hope that the Government intend to ensure that, under clause 7, this duty will extend to children from disadvantaged backgrounds.

With the setting up of the new children's directorates and the Government's commitment to dealing with inequalities and improved outcomes for all children, it would certainly make sense for local authorities to look at areas of deprivation and to provide services to families that help overcome disadvantage, including good quality child care to workless households. By subsidising playgroups, the children's fund has certainly helped to show the value of such provision.

New child care places in my constituency have been provided by the private, voluntary and public sectors. Recent legislative changes have meant that schools can be direct providers of after-school child care; indeed, it has been in their interests to do so. The spare capacity in primary schools has meant that parents are now taking into account a range of factors in making their choice of schools. Where numbers are continuing to decline, that is likely to be the case for a number of years. It also ensures that after-school clubs are more sustainable if they are registered with Ofsted and families can access the child care component of the working tax credit.

Where schools have nursery places, private providers—there are some excellent ones in my constituency—have been providing the wrap-round child care. Some after-school activities are run on a voluntary basis. It is very much a mixture of provision, and the funds have come from various places such as the neighbourhood nursery initiative, the children's fund and Sure Start grants.

The issue of sustainability is a real one. In one area of my constituency, a school started an after-school club, as a result of which parents who had been using a private provider ceased to do so. The private provision for two or three schools became unsustainable and the private provider withdrew the service. Some weeks later, the after-school club also folded. The net result is that there is no after-school care in the area at all. It is therefore welcome that local authorities will play a strategic role in ensuring sufficient child care, but I think that the word "sustainable" should be added to their duties—as far as is possible in a vast and changing market that depends greatly on work in the area and the demand of parents.

I am pleased that local authorities will discharge their duties in co-operation with parents and all the providers in the area, but I make a plea that that should include parents from areas where it is often not easy to make that sort of contribution. If necessary, some training should be made available to parents to enable them to take part in the consultation.

Many jobs in my constituency are provided by the retail sector, which, as the House knows, often works to shift patterns. Most child care in my constituency, however, is provided on an eight-to-six basis. The antisocial hours involved in shift work can raise the cost of child care, particularly for single parent families. There are also likely to be more informal care arrangements, the cost of which cannot be recovered through the working tax credit because the providers are not registered.

I was pleased to see that parents can now pay for care in their own home and, if parents are properly consulted on the availability of child care in their area,

Government initiatives such as this, which benefit shift workers and parents of disabled children, are more likely to be promoted by the local authority. At the moment, the needs of shift workers are often invisible and it is not enough to provide sufficient child care: it must be of the sort needed by parents.

When I discussed the Bill with the carers and parents group of the Sure Start Adswood and Bridgehall project, they wanted to bring to the Minister's attention the issue of affordability. They said that that was a problem for people who worked less than full time, but more than 16 hours a week because of the operation of the benefits system. I am sure that they will welcome the Secretary of State's remarks, in which she made clear her commitment to ensuring the affordability of child care for low income families. I might add that this particular group of carers and parents took part in the consultation exercise, which again demonstrates the success of Sure Start. Some years ago, they would not have been able and would not have had the confidence to do so. That has changed because of the existence of Sure Start in the area, which should not be underestimated.

I welcome the Bill, which demonstrates the Government's continuing commitment to investing in families and children and tackling inequalities in our society. I am sure that it will make a huge difference to my constituency.

5.43 pm

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): I want to begin by briefly considering the context in which the Bill is set. We all know as constituency MPs who deal regularly with parents that almost nothing is as important to them as the care of their children. In my experience, child care is as important to my constituents—whether they are parents or not—as the headline issues fought over at general elections such as hospitals, schools and crime. That is the wider context of the Bill.

Once we acknowledge the phenomenal child care pressures on parents—whether they be single parents, couples living with a permanent partner or whatever—in the modern age in which many people work 24/7, two obvious points follow. If the House wonders why I should mention them, it is because obvious points are sometimes overlooked. The first is that the first providers of child care are, of course, parents—and that applies whether there is one parent in the household or two. I say that because according to clause 18(4), which deals with the "Meaning of childcare", child care

> "does not include care provided for a child by . . . a parent or step-parent of the child . . . a person with parental responsibility for the child"

> "a relative of the child".

That might at first seem strange, but I want at this point—perhaps curiously—to come to the Minister's defence. She would say by way of response that the Bill does not want to load obligations—so to speak—meant for others on to parents, step-parents and so on. None the less, it is striking that we are dealing with a Bill that formally excludes parents from child care.

The second perhaps obvious point was made by the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), my former colleague on the Select Committee. She is still there—

John Bercow: So is Fleetwood.

Mr. Goodman: Indeed; and my hon. Friend—obviously—is still here. I no longer have the honour to serve on that Committee, I am afraid.

As the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood said, children do not just learn formally; they also learn informally through play and discovery, and through finding out for themselves about the variety of the world around them. A sensible Government will want to put at the cornerstone of their child care strategy the principle of choice. The Government's 10-year strategy is indeed headlined, "Choice for Parents", and I, for one, say amen to that. So one way of thinking about the Bill is to ask how it measures up against the choice principle. We know that this principle has sometimes been honoured more in the breach than the observance. The former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry admitted the following in 2003:

> "If I look back over the last six years I do think that we have given the impression that we think all mothers should be out to work, preferably full time as soon as their children are a few months old. We have got to move to a position where as a society and as a Government we recognise and we value the unpaid work that people do within their families."

She made it clear that she was referring not just to mums, but to grandparents, informal carers and so on. We know that Ministers themselves feel that they have not always lived up to the choice principle that they proclaim.

Even before we consider the Bill's content, Ministers will want to ensure that the choice principle within it matches the choice principle in the tax and benefits system: to ensure that it is simple, clear and easy to access. I will not go into that system in detail, because to do so would be out of order, but I want to make two brief related points. First, it is an oddity to have two payments—child benefit and the child tax credit—that basically achieve the same end. Ministers have yet to resolve that difficulty.

Secondly, I want to pick up on the point that the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood made in referring to the excellent Select Committee report on child care for working parents, produced in the last Parliament. She did not quote in full what it said about the child care tax credit. Before she gets up to correct me, I had better point out that it did acknowledge that > "the CCTC is an important component of the Government's anti-poverty and childcare strategies, and valuable to many parents."

However, it also said the following, which I may have sneaked in while she was not looking:

> "The CCTC is . . . not consistent with" a particular expert's view—my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) quoted an expert from the Institute of Education—

> "of childcare provision as a public good which is the right of all children, whether their parents work or not. Nor is it consistent with a childcare vision based on the choices made by parents and families themselves, since it is only available to some of them."

[Mr. Goodman]

So the Government have a bit of tidying up to do in that respect.

One aspect of the Bill about which I have heard some complaints from playgroups and nurseries in my constituency is the fact that the regulatory burden is high. I suspect that other hon. Members have received similar complaints about the planning rules, the way in which VAT works, the business rate regime and even the number of funding streams, which are not always easy to negotiate for private and voluntary providers. Late in the last Parliament, the Daycare Trust identified no fewer than 28 different funding streams through which nurseries, playgroups and other providers of child care are funded. Not surprisingly, many of them found funding difficult to access and the trust wanted some simplification.

The Bill contains new regulatory procedures, although one of the reasons we welcome it is the simplification of regulation that it should provide. However, on many occasions, Ministers introduce Bills with regulatory measures that promise simplification, but it does not always happen. Another way in which the choice principle could work would be to recognise the role of local authorities, which is present in the Bill. Ministers are right to make local authorities the lead bodies in implementing the measures in the Bill.

John Bercow: My hon. Friend mentions regulation. The Government say that the Bill will simplify regulation, but we need to be reassured on that point. To that end, does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a useful earnest of the Government's good intentions if the Minister, when she winds up, committed them to publish the secondary legislation in draft form before Report, so that we would be in a position to judge how the Government's promise matches the reality?

Mr. Goodman: I was concerned that my hon. Friend was about to ask me a form of question that he has been known to deploy about whether I was familiar with this clause or that clause in the Bill, which I might have overlooked. I am glad that he asked a question to which I can simply say, "Yes." I certainly hope that the Minister will provide that assurance.

The Secretary of State's brief remarks about the role of local authorities will not quite do. She said that the Bill would place no new duties or obligations on local authorities, but she also said that a mass of money had already been provided in various forms to ensure that they could meet their duties. Those two statements do not add up. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke)—and, by a more roundabout route, the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood—pressed the Government to ensure that any duties placed on local authorities are adequately funded. That will be a pressing issue with those of us whose local authorities already have very stretched budgets and look to the years ahead with some trepidation in terms of the support they receive from the Government. It would be most unfair if local authorities, in trying to meet any obligations placed on them by the Bill, became liable for capping.

It is important that the value of childhood is recognised in the Bill. Childhood is not simply a means to the utilitarian end of achieving academic or vocational qualifications. Childhood is part of the ordinary process of growing up and maturing as a human being. That is where much of the controversy about the Bill has lain. Attention has been drawn to an analysis of the Bill headed "Childcare Bill: Orwell in the nursery?". Miriam Stoppard claimed that the Government are headed in the wrong direction, because the Bill would introduce children to the prospect of failure at an appallingly early age and was another incursion into family life by the nanny state. The Secretary of State and other Labour Members have rubbished those fears this afternoon, but—like my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who cited the relevant clauses earlier—I think that clause 41(2) is ambiguous. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole was right to concentrate on the ambiguous nature of the word "taught" in clause 41(2)(b). Clause 41(2)(a) refers to "early learning goals" and clause 41(2)(c) to "assessment arrangements". The Government will need to clarify in Committee how far they seek to push the educational process down the age range.

It could be suggested that the Bill is pulling in two different directions. Local authorities will be obliged to provide a greater quantity of child care. The question that follows is whether the quality will match the quantity. High quality child care is not always the same as affordable child care, and the question is how the two elements are balanced. Hon. Members have been right to argue that sometimes we need to take the hit on quality to ensure that child care is affordable, but worries have been expressed about what that will mean for children with disabilities, children from minority ethnic groups and children who are at a relative disadvantage to the rest of the community. That is also a worrying aspect of the Bill and I hope that the Minister will be able to address those points when she responds to the debate tonight and that they will be further considered in Committee.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), although I do not know whether he is my namesake or I am his. I am happy to welcome the Bill. Since 1997, the Government have made tremendous progress on early-years education and child care provision. We are all impatient for faster change, but we should remember what happened when Gladstone introduced the Education Act 1870. It took another 32 years before most children were in state-funded elementary schools. This new extension of the welfare state is just as significant as that one was, and marks a real social transformation.

We have done well since 1997. We have an extra 500,000 places and most three and four-year-olds have taken up the guaranteed nursery places available. Even so, we need to double the number of child care places available. In particular, I welcome clause 1, which will give a new general duty to local authorities to > "improve the well-being of young children in their area, and ... reduce inequalities between young children in their area".

I do not know whether that is the first time that the connection between education and poverty has been made explicit, but it is a truth that we all intuitively accept. Children who live in poverty do less well at school, and poverty of experience is an aspect of poverty. By the age of three, the children of professional families already have vocabularies that are greater than those of adults in the poorest families. We have made strides in that respect as well in the past eight years. The percentage of children who start school with cognitive delay has fallen from 40 to 26 per cent.

Rather than repeat more statistics, I want to tell a story that a play worker described to me. She was involved in a play scheme during a half-term holiday. In the middle of the afternoon, it was time for a snack. She gave an eight-year-old an apple to eat. After the child had eaten the apple, she asked the child, "What did you think of that?" and the child said, "Well, it was very nice, but I didn't like the hard bit in the middle." The child had never eaten an apple before. It is remarkable that we can expect a child to go to school to learn that A is for apple without knowing what an apple is, and every child is entitled to that sort of straightforward experience.

The Sure Start scheme has had a very positive impact in my constituency. We have a Sure Start programme at St. Helen Auckland with new facilities, and another on the Woodhouse Close estate, which is the most deprived part of my constituency. There are a lot of villages in Teesdale, and the rural section has mobile provision, with a fantastic bus that goes round to ensure that families who are isolated in villages also have access to services.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) mentioned the evidence from the EPPE study. I know that it sounds like a sister of Prudence, but it stands for "effective provision of pre-school education". The study found that child care is most beneficial to those who are disadvantaged, but only if it is of high quality. That finding was further reinforced by a study by Professor Melhuish for the National Audit Office. He found that, in the first three years, high-quality child care benefited disadvantaged children and that most provision gave those who were over three educational and social benefits. So improving access to child care under the Bill, alongside the improvements in maternity pay and leave from 14 to 40 weeks, will give every child the best start.

Clauses 39 and 44 will deliver the high-quality child care that is needed for children who live with disadvantage. Those clauses set out the early years foundation stage that the early years providers must meet. They also set out the process of regulation and inspection, which is important to ensure that the standards are met. Opposition Members have considered clause 41, but I draw their attention to clause 41(3), which describes the learning and development issues as follows:

"personal, social and emotional development . . . communication, language and literacy . . . problem solving, reasoning and numeracy . . . knowledge and understanding of the world . . . physical development, and . . . creative development."

It is not hard to argue that that broad range of experiences is what children up to the age of five and beyond need.

Before my election to the House, I ran the National Association of Toy and Leisure Libraries, which has a 1,000 projects across the country, and I chaired the Children's Play Council. We need to take seriously the truth that small children learn through play. I am disappointed that those hon. Members who were vocal earlier this afternoon about the importance of play, rather than formal learning, are not here now, but I invite them to join the all-party parliamentary group on play which my colleagues and I want to set up.

Ensuring that children have opportunity to play in their early years and after school and that lots of policies take account of children's need to play is essential. That has been recognised already by the Government as one of the key factors in the 10-year child care strategy, which says that activities should be "underpinned by a play based approach to promoting children's development and learning, building on children's experiences to help them extend their skills and develop their understanding and confidence."

There may be doubts about the learning and development issues set out, but I ask Opposition Members how they can criticise Sure Start for not producing results, as they put it, or outcomes, if they are not prepared to agree any measure against which we can test how children perform. We would like the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) to respond to that point later this evening.

One of the positive and significant things that has happened in the past eight years is that child care policy has been devolved to the other Administrations. So children in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are learning in different frameworks and under different curricula. That gives us an opportunity to check how effective the English curriculum is compared with the others. For example, it will be interesting to find out whether things are better in Wales, which has a play policy.

I remind hon. Members of what the policy framework is in Northern Ireland, because it is particularly attractive and we may want to consider it when assessing the English experience. In Northern Ireland, the early-years foundation stage is intended to "build self-esteem, develop the ability to play, generate an interest in stories, develop number understanding and foster curiosity."

That is a slightly different perspective on similar themes, but some hon. Members may think it a little more child friendly.

Although I am pleased about this extension of the welfare state—I hope that it will change society for the better—the key thing is that children are not human becomings; they are human beings. They are living now, and it is their experience now that matters. That is why the quality of provision matters as well.

I have just three concerns about the Bill, and I hope that they will be addressed in Committee. First, why, for children over eight years, is there only provision for voluntary registration? Only risk-based inspections will be carried out, and unless someone makes a complaint, no three-yearly inspection of provision for those who are over the age of eight will take place. Although some eight and nine-year-olds are quite assertive and good at describing their needs, I am reluctant to go down the path of thinking that they should be responsible for the quality of their child care. We need to look at that a little more.

I am unclear—perhaps the Minister can clarify this—how the Bill interrelates with the proposals on extended schools. In the move to extended schools, we need to remember that all children need time for play and that the 8 am to 6 pm provision in schools must not become purely related to homework clubs. There must be a wide range of activities, games and play time, as well as time to chill out and relax, because everyone needs that every day.

My third concern, which has been raised by other hon. Members, relates to the qualifications that we will require. I know that the Minister intends to introduce regulations, but it would be helpful if we could see an early draft of them in Committee. The problem has been one of long standing in this country. When my mother came to England from Denmark in 1951, she was given her naturalisation certificate because she had one of the unusual skills that the economy needed—she was a nursery nurse. Here we are, 54 years down the track, and we are still short of people with such skills.

I am not trying to suggest that solving the problem will be an easy task for the Minister. I know that the number of people who need to be recruited is in the same ball park as the numbers in the red army. It will be tremendously difficult to address the problem, but one way in which we could get a regulatory structure with a lighter touch would be by having more well qualified people working in the sector. I welcome the Bill wholeheartedly and hope that those issues can be addressed in Committee.

6.10 pm

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): I do not wish to detain the House for too long because we can all agree about an awful lot in the Bill. I agree with the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) that there has been a big improvement in early years child care over the past decade or so.

Most of us would agree that bringing up children is one of the most rewarding things that people can do. However, it is not always easy to juggle the many competing demands of work and home life. The Bill stems from a desire to try to help parents who often find themselves in great difficulty when juggling such responsibilities. When it comes to child care, there are sadly no easy answers or solutions for the simple reason that each family's circumstances are different. That makes it difficult for any Government to get things completely right. I acknowledge that efforts are being made and that some progress has been made over the past eight years, but I am not convinced that the Bill strikes an effective balance between the competing tensions.

It is interesting that the 1998 general household survey found that the most popular category of child care for a mother working full or part time was that given by relatives. Having read all the various briefings on the Bill, I am left wondering how effectively it supports that option for parents. Study after study has shown that many women want to remain at home to look after their children, rather than using child minders, crèches or nurseries. Many women feel extremely guilty about returning to work only months after giving birth.

It is also interesting to consider the matter from the perspective of what is best for the child. The effective provision of pre-school education project, which followed 3,000 children between 1997 and 2004, found that large amounts of group care before the age of three were associated with higher levels of antisocial behaviour. Such behaviour also increased if a child had received a lot of care from a child minder. However, the study found that if relatives—usually grandmothers—provided a substantial amount of care, children displayed less antisocial behaviour and were more co-operative.

It does not take a rocket scientist to work out what is going on. Young children are much better off in the care of their mother, father or members of their close family in the early years from birth to the age of three. In fact, the Government have agreed that if mothers work full-time during the early stages of their children's lives, it can have a negative impact. Families, and especially mothers, should not feel pressurised—either financially, or emotionally—to put their children's care outside their families during those important early years. I would argue that even between the ages of three and five, it is extremely beneficial if, in addition to receiving high-quality pre-school education, children have their mother or a close family member with them for part of the day.

The Government, to their credit, recognised in the 1998 document "Meeting the Childcare Challenge" that many parents preferred grandparents or relatives to look after children. However, rather than thinking about how to support that desire of many families, the Government dismissed it as being the Secretary of State reinforced that belief in her opening remarks today. It was felt that only Government intervention could "fill the gaps".

"against the direction of social change"—

That is really what troubles me about the thrust of child care policy. It seems to be more prescriptive than necessary, and choice is talked about, rather than delivered. There appears to be a feeling that the Government know best, or at least better than families themselves. If the Government truly wished to offer choice, would they not be coming forward today with policies that offered the widest possible choice? One gets the slight feeling that the Government still believe that mothers who want to stay at home are a "bit of a problem".

I am talking not about a bit more time for maternity leave, but about how the Government can help to support a mother through a period of years in which she brings up two or three children. The evidence shows us what is best for the child and wider society, so offering that would give families a real choice, not just a choice from a menu of state-sponsored initiatives. If the Government are really serious about one of their central principles—

"the importance of ensuring every child has the best possible start to life"— they must engage in such wider thinking and reform.

In areas in which Government intervention was needed, there has been some success. For example, Sure Start has made a contribution in some of the country's most deprived areas. Several areas have benefited significantly, so I give credit where credit is due. However, it is also true that the scheme has acted as competition with voluntary and private nurseries and play groups in those areas and has thus caused some to close.

Helen Goodman: Conservative Members have said repeatedly that they are in favour of choice, but against competition. I do not understand how they can be in favour of choice if they say that there should be no competition among providers.

Mr. Wilson: If the hon. Lady will allow me to continue for few moments, I will address that very point.

It makes no sense to have a situation in which the state is in competition with existing providers. The state can fill gaps, by all means—it probably should do that—but it should not provide something that amounts to unfair competition. If the state sets the rules and funds projects out of general taxation, private and voluntary groups cannot compete on a level playing field.

For example, local authorities will have a duty under the Bill to ensure that there is sufficient, and free, early-years provision in their areas. The desire is clearly that local authorities will co-operate with existing providers to ensure that that happens. Indeed, I was pleased to see a commitment from the Department for Education and Skills to encourage local authorities to work closely with private and voluntary providers and to complete full audits of local child care needs.

Some organisations want the Government to go further. The Minister will be aware that the National Day Nurseries Association, which is the largest body representing private, voluntary and maintained day nurseries, has said that both local authorities and child care providers would benefit from a clear and uniform national framework for partnership working. The association wants measurable targets to be set for local authorities on the involvement of the private and voluntary sectors. It says:

"this would ensure that duplication of provision and the full involvement of all sectors could be enforced."

The association's research suggests that local authorities are not adopting a partnership approach, which is why it wants such firm guidance on the requirement for partnership working. It is clearly concerned about the way in which local authorities will take the strategic lead.

There are clearly dangers in effectively outsourcing child care provision to local authorities. For example, the CBI has warned that local councils must not be allowed to construct a "state monopoly" of child care provision. I think that the CBI is also worried about local authorities' in-built advantages. For example, authorities are able to reclaim VAT when they set up day care centres, but private providers cannot do that. We must take such worries extremely seriously, and I think that that addresses the point about why there is not a level playing field for public and private sector providers of child care.

Helen Goodman: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that since 1997, under the Sure Start programme, the Government have put far more money into voluntary sector providers, which give exactly the kind of care for which he calls, than did the last Tory Government?

Mr. Wilson: I am aware of the investment, as I recognised earlier.

Perhaps the Minister could use this opportunity to reassure the NDNA and the CBI. It is important that their concerns are addressed fully.

I also have other concerns, such as those on the early years foundation stage. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, there is a danger in introducing formal education at such an early age. Why do we need to be so prescriptive? It is inappropriate to start formal learning at such a young age. Children start school much earlier in the UK than they do in other European others, yet their results tend to be much better than ours. Ministers might want to consider that again.

As with so much legislation that is pushed through on the shoulders of local government, I am worried that the measures will not be fully funded by central Government out of existing tax revenues. The increased bureaucracy must not be allowed to increase local council tax in my constituency. The reaction of the Local Government Association is enlightening. It believes that "without substantial extra government investment, it is hard to see how this Bill will increase the amount of affordable childcare for low income families and those with disabled children."

The LGA wants extra investment from central Government. It states:

"If Government can't find this money, the cost will be borne either by parents or council tax payers."

As we have some of the highest child care costs in Europe and have had huge council tax increases since 1997, neither of those is an attractive option.

Those problems should not and cannot be skirted around. They must be addressed if the child care plans are to prove effective and not to be just more empty promises. Overall, I give the Bill a cautious welcome. As I said, there is commendable intent behind it, but many questions need to be answered before it can become effective. I look forward to the Minister's response in the hope that she deals with some of my concerns.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): It is a privilege to speak in the debate, following my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), for Stockport (Ann Coffey) and for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman).

John Bercow: And my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson).

Edward Miliband: I was going to come on to the hon. Member for Reading, East.

It is partly a privilege to speak because this is the first child care Bill to be considered by the House, as I think the Secretary of State confirmed. It arises from the 10-year plan published a year ago at the time of the pre-Budget report of 2004. Like any legislation, it is worth asking a simple question at the outset: why is it necessary? My central case is that it is necessary because it explicitly sets out the state's responsibility for child care provision in statute for the first time. It strikes the right balance between the responsibilities of the Government, who need to plan provision at local level, and the role of voluntary and private sector providers, which other hon. Members mentioned.

[Edward Miliband]

I want to argue that the Bill is, first, necessary on the grounds of equality; secondly, justified by considerations of efficiency—in particular, an analysis of the child care market and its imperfections; thirdly, necessary given the progress made since 1997 and the lessons that we have learned about child care and child care policy; and, fourthly, right in its choice of local authorities as the body responsible for planning provision and for being accountable to parents.

The first argument for the Bill is on grounds of equality—the need for more equal life chances for children and equal access to the labour market for women, who tend to be primary carers. Labour Members believe that although parents have the primary responsibility for children, it is, as Beveridge said 60 years ago,

"in the national interest to help parents discharge that responsibility . . . "

Today, we know from research that life chances are shaped not at four or five, as we used to think, but much earlier in life, with the differences apparent at 22 months. We know that the right kind of intervention—Sure Start and other policy measures—can make a difference, which is why it is right that clause 1 sets out a new duty on local authorities not just to improve children's well-being but to reduce inequalities, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland said.

The case for the Bill is also based on the dramatic transformation of the role of women in the labour market. Fifty years ago, just one third of women worked; today, more than two thirds do. In the context of that change, the role for public policy is to give parents and women in particular real choice, so that they can both be at work but also have time off after the birth of a child, so that they can work part-time, and so that some can choose to work full-time and have the child care available when they need it.

The hon. Member for Reading, East said in his interesting remarks that the Government were forcing women out to work. Perhaps I can be so bold as to suggest a bit of homework. He should look at the 10-year strategy on child care. Chart B7 on page 77 makes it clear what has happened to the position of mothers with children under five. In 1990, less than 50 per cent. of them were in work. By 2001—in just 10 years—nearly 60 per cent. were in work. The Labour Government did not force them to do that; it is mothers who want to do that.

A large amount of bunkum—I hope that that is not unparliamentary language—has been talked about how the Government favour forcing women out to work and do nothing for mothers who want to stay at home. The pre-Budget report of 2004 allocated £600 million by 2007–08, around 40 per cent. of which went, I think, on extending paid maternity leave for mothers from six to nine months. That is nearly half the amount of money. Some of it went on the transformation fund and some on nursery education. We are helping to give mothers who want to go out to work a choice, but far from being prejudiced simply in favour of them, we are, within limited resources, helping to extend choices for mothers who want to stay at home.

My second argument is about efficiency. For me, that is the nub of the debate—the essential reason for the Bill. It turns on whether we believe that the market on its own—Conservative Members will be interested to hear this because they are great believers in the market—can deliver the choices that we want for parents and women. In a debate in the House, Lord Lamont of Lerwick, then the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, summed up what was then the prevailing view of the Conservative party. He said:

"if married women want to work and if employers want to employ them, the market will work and employers will pay the necessary wage to encourage married women to return to work."—[Official Report, 11 July 1989; Vol. 156, c. 892.]

I welcome the Bill because the initial clauses in particular represent a profound break with that position. I believe that to be right and I want to explain why.

On its own, the market has not delivered and will not deliver. There are three reasons for that. First, there are major gains to our society of child care and education for the under-fives which are simply not priced in the market. Economists, and I count myself as sort of an economist, would call those positive externalities. It makes the case for making child care more affordable, as the Bill will do, than it would be if it were simply left to the market.

For parents, in particular mothers, we know the long-term costs of being out of the labour market for a number of years. Each year of interruption to hourly employment has been estimated to reduce hourly earnings by 4 per cent. The danger for our society is that if mothers are forced to stay out of the labour market, we lose their skills and talents. In the real world, the costs of child care are so high that an individual would have too low a financial gain from work in the short term without the Government playing a role. That is part of the case, which, I am sorry to say, the previous Government never accepted, for a general subsidy for lower and middle-income families—currently expressed through the child care tax credit—for the costs of child care so that the choice of whether to go out to work is real, especially for mothers with young children.

Externalities apply not just to parents but to children. Every additional month of quality pre-school care from the age of two has been shown to improve cognitive performance at the start of school. The country has an interest in promoting integrated high-quality care and education, because that is in the long-term interests of our nation.

There is a second market failure. Perfect markets rely on the presence of perfect information, and in child care there are significant imbalances of information. That is addressed by clauses 12 and 13. It is hard for parents truly to know the quality of their kids' child care settings. In addition, research suggests that parents facing tight cost constraints may not be fully aware of the long-term benefits of quality—hence the role for Government to ensure that the work force are properly trained and to subsidise quality. That will lead to better long-term outcomes and give parents the confidence to use child care if they wish to do so.

The third problem with simply leaving child care to the market concerns availability. In most markets, there are low costs involved in switching from one provider to another, but clearly that is not so in child care, given the disruption faced by children and parents. I regret to say that turnover of child care providers is high. In ideal theory, there are many consumers of and providers of child care, but in many areas of our country that is not the case, so small changes in demand have very disruptive effects. There are real costs and problems in relation to sustainability, hence the need for a role for Government to try to ensure greater sustainability and continuity in the child care market. That is what clause 6, in particular, seeks to do. So the case for the Bill on the grounds of equality and efficiency is clear.

Hywel Williams: The hon. Gentleman posits three causes: market failure, a lack of perfect information, and availability. Does he also accept that there is fundamental structural difficulty, particularly in areas such as mine, because of the imbalance between rural and urban areas? There is unavailability not only because of the features that he mentioned but because the state fails as well as the market.

Edward Miliband: I take that point. I recognise that sustainability and availability are a particular problem in rural areas, which makes the case for giving a proper role to local authorities, as the Bill does.

The third aspect of my case for the Bill is the stage that we have reached in the development of the national child care strategy. Other speakers have rightly drawn attention to the progress since 1997: free nursery education for all three and four-year-olds; more than 500 Sure Start children centres, including those in my constituency in Askern, Bentley and Moorends, which are transforming people's lives; and a child care tax credit, which, as I reminded the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), reaches 337,000 families at a cost of £900 million, compared with just 47,000 who benefited from family credit. Now we need to move from a much improved patchwork of provision to a durable framework to meet child care needs.

John Bercow: As always, I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's speech with great interest. He posits the scenario of market failure. I cannot resist the conclusion that, in so doing, he is hearing voices against which he is arguing, but those voices are not ours on the Conservative Benches. Put simply, does he accept that, in addition to market failure—I do not disagree with him about that—there is such a thing as Government failure and that that is more likely to manifest itself in circumstances of monopoly?

Edward Miliband: I take the point that Governments can fail as well as markets, but I slightly take issue with the hon. Gentleman's intervention—I should say, in our mutual admiration society, that I have the highest respect for him, too—because I am afraid that what we hear from Opposition Members is not simply a desire for competition and for the private and voluntary sector not to be put out of business, but a gut problem about the state extending its role in this area. They have not really come to terms with that. I should probably exclude the hon. Gentleman from that category, because he tends to have much more enlightened views on these matters than other of his hon. Friends.

Annette Brooke: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the thrust of the Bill is to make the local authority the commissioner? I am not sure that I entirely see the state reaching out. Areas such as mine are totally dependent on a partnership, because there just would not be enough child care without harnessing the best of the private and voluntary sector. I suspect that the situation is patchy across the country. One cannot make a single statement about it.

Edward Miliband: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her intervention. I completely agree that we are talking about a new role for the state. The state is the commissioner. Of course there needs to be a mixed economy of provision—I said that at the outset—involving the private sector and the voluntary sector, but I urge her to recognise that there is a big change in the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland pointed out, it has never been set out in statute that a local authority, or indeed any agency of Government, has a responsibility for ensuring sufficient child care. That is a significant step forward and change. Indeed, I come to clause 6, the relevant clause. This is an important crossing of the rubicon in terms of the state's responsibility for child care provision, from which it will be difficult, I hope, for any Government to resile.

The problem is that parents have never until now had an accountable body to which they can turn. Local democratically elected representatives are the right people to carry out that function. Local authorities have access to information on the ground and are best placed to audit and plan provision. They are also best placed to ensure coherence and efficiency of provision in respect of schools.

There are two key questions about how the duty of sufficiency will work and to whom it will apply. I have made it clear that I believe in a mixed economy of provision, and this answers a point that the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) asked another hon. Member earlier because clause 8 makes it clear that we will maintain a mixed economy of provision: child minders, nurseries and other provision, provided by the voluntary sector and the private sector, as well as the state.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd), who is not in his place, raised the concern that the Daycare Trust and others have about the position of non-working parents, and about specifying that duty only for the parents on the child care element of the working tax credit and that that might be too modest. With the kindest respect to Opposition Members, they cannot have it both ways. They cannot say that the problem with the Bill is that it places enormous upward pressure on council tax bills and then say that it does not go far enough in extending provision.

This is a sensible and modest first step. It covers parents going a long way up the income scale. Working hand in hand with the increased limits and the increased proportion of costs payable under the child care tax credit, it will make an important difference. We will have time to assess the duty as it beds down, after it comes into force in April 2008.

[Edward Miliband]

I am pleased also that, significantly, the Bill extends the duty to those undertaking education and training preparatory to work. It would be helpful if the Minister clarified how that will work. I am conscious, from talking to people in my constituency, that funding in this area tends to be quite patchy, and I know that it is not covered by the child care tax credit.

John Bercow: Uncharacteristically, the hon. Gentleman has identified a logical lacuna in his own argument, and in the process was a little unfair on my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd). I put it to the hon. Gentleman that it is perfectly possible for us, without inconsistency, to raise the issue of the cost on the one hand, and possible implications for council tax bills, and to identify on the other hand our concern that parents who are not working will not get the full benefit that they deserve. The issue is who pays for that.

Edward Miliband: I suppose that there is a difference of opinion. I have not had the experience of being in opposition as a Member of Parliament—[Interruption]—and I do not plan to experience that for some years hence, but I would have thought that coherence was an important aim for a member of the Opposition. The problem that the hon. Gentleman highlights about the position of non-working parents is answered in part by Sure Start, which makes services available to them. If he is saying that full-time day care should be provided for non-working parents, that may be a step further down the road. I do not think that there are resources available at this point to do that. That was the only point that I was making. I hope that it was not a lacuna and that if it was, he will explain precisely why afterwards.

I want to highlight the issue of quality, to which I referred earlier. It is a great irony that teachers of the over-fives require all kinds of qualifications—there is cross-party consensus on that—while care and education for the under-fives, who are more fragile and vulnerable, and for whom supervision is arguably even more important, have not been seen as a profession in the same way. I therefore welcome clause 13 and its new duty to provide information, advice and training to providers. That is part of the greater professionalisation of the work force envisaged in the 10-year plan which is essential to give parents the confidence of high quality, and which will work in combination with Ofsted inspection and the new transformation fund to improve quality.

The Bill has many other positive aspects but, as I have made clear, the central and important step forward is the fact that, 60 years after Beveridge, we are making the provision of child care into a proper and legitimate duty of Government. That is more than a commitment to resources. In the 19th century, primary education for all was accepted as a responsibility of Government; in the 20th century, secondary education for all was accepted as the responsibility of Government. The Bill recognises that at the start of the 21st century we are embarking—I emphasise the word "embarking"—on a journey down a road on which pre-school provision for all will become a clear responsibility of Government. Labour Members can easily accept that, because we think that Government, working alongside the private and voluntary sector, can help to expand freedom and will not necessarily stifle individuals.

"The welfare state contributes to people's freedom and enterprise. It is people who are secure, that dare to try their wings."

That was said by Göran Persson, the Prime Minister of Sweden. Nowhere is it more true than in child care. That is the ethos at the heart of the Bill. I am glad that the Opposition support the Bill, but the warning to them is that if they will the ends—better child care—they had better support the means, and abandon their previous commitment to reducing public expenditure as a proportion of national income. As both leadership candidates remain committed to a smaller state we can already see contradictions emerging in their position, which we will expose over the coming months. In the meantime, I commend the Bill to the House.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), who gave a finely argued speech that will probably do no harm at all to his widely advertised prospects. He and the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) both posited that social Darwinism had produced a certain type of education in the 19th century and another type in the 20th. At the dawn of the 21st century, everything is to the good and it all represents progress. The hon. Lady cited the Education Act 1870. The majority of the Welsh working class were literate long before then, having been taught at Griffith Jones Llanddowror circulating schools and Robert Jones Rhoslan circulating schools in the early 19th century. It is pertinent to our debate that those schools were provided without state funding and without any help from the private sector. The state was indifferent, and the private sector did not think that there was any money to be made from teaching the ignorant Welsh how to read.

I welcome the Bill on behalf of Plaid Cymru, and I am glad that part 2 addresses issues particular to Wales. I should like mainly to address the question of rurality, which I have already raised in interventions, as well as issues relating to the Welsh language and the inequalities in child care that arise from those factors. They are largely matters for the Welsh Assembly, but they are relevant to our debate, because part 2 makes particular reference to Wales. The provision of proper child care is important, especially in rural Wales and deep rural Wales, but my argument is pertinent to child care in deep rural parts of England, and other hon. Members may wish to speak about such issues.

Rural parts of Wales have particularly low rates of economic activity and a greater incidence of seasonal and part-time work, as well as casualised work. In some areas, a higher percentage of the work force is female, and the population receives lower wages. All those factors are relevant to consideration of the effect of child care on economic activity, on wages and prosperity, because parents with care responsibilities are much more likely to qualify for child care tax credits. The criteria for such credits are the same in both rural and urban areas, but they are more difficult to meet in rural areas, where there is a lower provision of good child care and where employer-provided child care is almost non-existent, especially in my constituency. There is therefore greater dependence on informal child care, mainly provided by relatives.

The same regulations apply to the registration of child minders in both rural and other areas, although the circumstances are different as many relatives who provide care do not wish to be registered. Those matters are problematic in rural areas, where there is a corrosive conjunction of low wages, job insecurity, long travel distances and low child care provision, which leads to inequalities within those areas and to gross inequalities between them and urban areas. Child care in the medium of Welsh is difficult to find in both rural and urban areas. At the weekend, I was in Cardiff for the game—I was glad to see Wales beat Australia—and I had a chat with a new mother who was trying to access Welsh-medium child care for her nine-week-old son in central urban Cardiff. She had been told, however, that it was now too late—she should have put his name down before the first scan. She thought that it would be easier to get him into Eton than to access good-quality registered Welsh language child care in the middle of Cardiff. Again, that may be a matter for the Welsh Assembly.

Clauses 22 to 30 are specific to Wales. Many of those clauses replicate the English provisions, but their detailed application is left to the Welsh Assembly. There are practical reasons for doing so, as education, economic development, health and social services are devolved matters. As a member of Plaid Cymru, I cannot understand why the Welsh Assembly or even the Welsh Assembly Government cannot deal with the entire matter, as it is largely non-controversial. However, that may become the case if the Government's proposals on the Welsh Assembly Government's powers are passed. There are, however, important differences between the provisions for England and those for Wales, including the provision for child care in the medium of Welsh.

For too long, the provision of child care has been considered part of family or education policy, or as a women's issue, rather than as a central feature of economic policy. It is such a feature in Wales because of the lower rate of economic activity and the difficulty of accessing child care to enable families to gain a decent income. The fact that it has not been considered so goes some way towards explaining the poor state of provision, which has been marginalised. Historically, low priority has been given to child care, and it compares badly with provision in other countries. The hon. Member for Bishop Auckland mentioned Scandinavia, and various Scandinavian countries immediately spring to mind.

On the detail of part 2, clause 22, as I mentioned, makes particular reference to child care involving the use of Welsh. Clause 23 refers to less restrictive circumstances for local authorities to provide that child care themselves, so that there might be direct provision where it is very scarce. That is highly relevant, given the arguments that I have already made. Clause 26 gives the power to require local authorities to assess child care provision, but that power will lie with the Assembly, as will the terms of the required assessments. I find all those features entirely acceptable.

The provision of child care in rural areas and through the medium of Welsh are the main themes of my remarks. I refer to some research that I commissioned in 2004, entitled "Gofal o Fath Gwahanol"—"A Different Kind of Care", which is an examination of child care in deep rural areas. If any hon. Members are interested, I have copies available. The research showed some unsurprising facts: that self-employment was very high in rural areas—50 per cent. higher in rural areas of Wales than in the rest of Wales, and that 83 per cent. of people in deep rural areas have some knowledge of the Welsh language, compared with 28 per cent. in Wales as a whole. Here we have particular features of requirements for child care, which are specific to deep rural areas.

The research also showed that lack of child care was a problem for 40 per cent. of women in rural areas, and that was particularly the case in respect of Welsh-medium child care. In those areas, part-time work was more prevalent, more people had second jobs, sub-minimum wage work was twice as prevalent, there was more dependence on cars, distances to work and to child care were greater, and there was a lower take-up of benefits. All these features conspire to make it more difficult for people with child care responsibilities—predominantly women, of course—to access child care in order to find the work that the Government are so keen for them to take up. In many ways these difficulties are structural in nature. It is impossible to shorten the distances between far-flung communities, but one can take action to ameliorate the effects of that.

I mentioned the lower take-up of benefits. The research shows that that is partly because of a cultural perception surrounding poverty—it is not acceptable to own up to being poor—and also because of a culture of sturdy independence from the state, which is laudable. That was found not only in my research, but in the Rowntree research published on 2000.

The research that I commissioned was largely participant observation—talking to children and to parents from a local school and a local community from Tremadog and Blaenau Ffestiniog. As I said earlier, there were tremendous problems. There was very little formal provision paid for by the private sector and very little provision from the public sector. But the pertinent point is that families did not see informal and formal care as being proxies of each other. They put them in different categories. They did not think, "Now we will use informal care, and if we have the money and the opportunity, we will use formal care," because they saw them as different things. They considered informal care by families as vastly preferable. They preferred the quality of informal care, a finding that also emerged from research by the Daycare Trust.

People preferred to receive care from family members whom they knew, trusted and loved. The care was provided because of family ties and the love of grandparents for their grandchildren. The grandparents were not looking for registration or for a wage. They were not looking for that sort of payment, but they were looking for an acknowledgement of the cost involved. There is some cost, though it is not great.

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman mentioned grandparents providing care for people in their own family. Earlier in the debate, the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) said that one way to reduce regulation would be to increase the number of highly qualified people. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that because of their life experience, grandparents might be very well qualified to provide child care not just within the family, but well beyond it?

Hywel Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely pertinent point. It is interesting that the grandparents did not see themselves in any way as professional carers and were not looking for registration, which would allow the care-giving parents to apply for tax credits. It was not that sort of system. The parents and grandparents did not see the informal care provided by grandparents and formal care provided by the paid-for system or by the state as proxies of each other. We are looking at different animals.

There should be some recognition of such informal child care. It might not be a matter of recognising grandparents as child-minders providing commercial child care in their homes and being assessed by inspectors, but there is a strong case for some sort of intermediate category offering some recognition. That is what parents want. When we asked parents what they thought about making payments to close family members for care, they said they would like to give some recognition. They did not want to employ their parents or their parents-in-law. They would make payments in kind, and they saw that there was a certain cost involved in such payments. We are, of course, talking about low-wage families. That is one of the reasons why I believe there should be an intermediate category between informal and formal care.

The Secretary of State referred to the fact that tax credits are not cash limited. If they are applied for and people succeed, they are paid. Other budgets have a cash limit. Some of the assessments that we made of the potential benefits for constituencies are quite startling. In my constituency, Caernarfon, the tax credits claimed were £600,000 per year in 2004. Should informal care be recognised, that sum would go up to £750,000. That is the order of change involved—about 25 per cent. However, should all care provided by informal carers be recognised at the highest rate, the sum would be £5.6 million. That is a huge amount of value that parents and grandparents put into the economic system, and it is unrecognised. I am not arguing for £5.6 million or anything close to it, but the work that grandparents put in should be recognised in some way.

Echoing the hon. Member for Doncaster, North, there is an argument in terms of efficiency. Nobody has made the point that we depend a great deal on older women to do the caring. As the economy changes and there is more pressure on older women who have not yet retired to return to work, the number of women available to undertake informal not-paid-for caring will inevitable decrease, so that source of care is a diminishing resource.

I shall deal briefly with provision through the medium of Welsh, which as I recognised earlier, is a matter more for the Welsh Assembly. Provision through the medium of Welsh is in some cases non-existent, and in some cases under great pressure. In general, it is grossly inadequate and leads to the very inequality that the Bill is intended to combat.

There is an absolute need for that provision. As an adult I speak English fairly well, although I speak Welsh much better, but many children under three and four do not speak English. In my constituency, about 75 per cent. of the population speak Welsh, and about 90 per cent. of under-fives speak Welsh and no English in their family, yet the overwhelming majority of the small amount of child care is not available through the medium of Welsh. Clearly something is going seriously wrong, so I hope that my remarks are noted in the Welsh Assembly and that suitable action is taken as soon as possible. There is a crisis and there could be great dangers for small children being cared for in that situation.

Some of the issues that I raised are for the Welsh Assembly Government, while some are for the Treasury, in respect of legislation and the payment of child minders, especially in rural areas where neither paid-for nor voluntary provision is available. In large measure, we should be guided by what parents, grandparents and, most obviously, children, want. From the research that I commissioned, it was clear that children love being with their grandparents. I shall not trouble the House with lengthy quotations, but one nine-year-old made some charming and engaging remarks. He said:

"We played outside our grandmother's house in the morning. Then we went for chips and then we went to see 'Scooby-Doo 2'."

He said all that in Welsh—apart from "Scooby Doo-2".

We should be guided by what parents, grandparents and children want, and we should guard against overdependence on a market model that has not succeeded in many deep rural areas. Through the Welsh Assembly Government, we should be looking for much-extended provision in Wales.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): As a Welsh Member, it is with pleasure that I carry on the Welsh theme from the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams). Listening to various speakers in the debate—the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), for Stockport (Ann Coffey), for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) and for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), the hon. Members for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) and for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), followed by two speakers from Wales—it is clear that across the country we are united, which is fairly unique in the House, in seeing the Bill as critically important for children. It is their futures, their care and their experience that we are debating. We are deciding how they are to be valued, protected, nurtured and supported. Those issues must be central to all our child care provision.

We are united in agreeing that the Bill is important to parents. There has been agreement that the chance to take up education and training is important for parents. There has been a recognition that child care gives many parents with mental health problems or depression the opportunity to take a break—a point made by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole. Child care is important for people who need to raise the economic status of their family and, by having two working parents, to tackle the poverty and deprivation that they face.

The hon. Member for Reading, East noted the importance of the Bill to employers. We must recognise that it is impossible for a company to fulfil its potential for growth and quality unless its work force are able to pursue extended education and training and can give a commitment to work, without anxiety about the safety and security of their children.

This week, I read an amazing statement in The Observer magazine. Billy Killington, a 61-year-old porter at Covent Garden said:

"You would have to be mad to be a racist nowadays. What on earth would be the point? It would be like banging your head against a brick wall constantly."

Racism has not disappeared, but Billy was recognising that the world has moved a long way from when racist attitudes were the accepted norm. Similarly, employers are waking up to the fact that addressing child care and work-life balance issues is critical to keeping a loyal, skilled and experienced work force. They are beginning to see that child care responsibilities are no longer a barrier to employing women. I thus look forward to hearing a future Billy voicing a belief that had become equally rooted in our society—that we would have to be mad not to see flexible, quality child care as critical to the future of children, marriages, employers and Governments. We have started some of that debate today and we should feel intensely proud of that.

The Bill is important for government at every level. In Britain, we have the highest employment rate ever and the longest period of uninterrupted growth in modern history. Growth and stability are enjoyed by the majority, not just a few get-rich-quick kids in the City. If we are to build a modern Britain, prepared to face the economic challenges from China, India and America, we need to invest in a society where every citizen matters and where work pays and people are equipped with the skills and support they need to engage fully with our challenging and changing world. That means providing the quality child care that Members have talked about many times today: meeting the needs of parents, children, employers and Government.

Like other Members, I particularly welcome aspects of the Bill. I welcome the responsibilities placed on local authorities, especially to provide child care for working parents on low incomes; to promote the provision of child care generally; to target child care for parents with disabled children; and to inform, advise and assist parents and prospective parents. The lady to whom the hon. Member for Caernarfon referred would thus be able to book her child into the appropriate Welsh language play scheme the minute she found out the result of her pregnancy test.

Thanks to the Government's management of the economy, people in my Bridgend constituency are generally more affluent, more socially and geographically mobile and better educated. Probably only one other Member has read The Western Mail today. A front-page article tells us that the Welsh economy is approaching a boom period, with indicators of continued expansion. That bodes well for my constituency, despite unemployment of a mere 3.8 per cent., with 1,500 people registered unemployed, 800 of whom are women. We have 18,000 women working: 83 per cent. are working between 10 and 44 hours a week, and 44 per cent. work between 35 and 44 hours. There are 6,900 families receiving child and working tax credits, which has helped many of them out of poverty and into work. I have to admit, however, that the wrap-round, sustainable and affordable child care that is essential if we are to compete for jobs in the promised boom period and face the future as a modern, progressive area is not as widely available as I want.

We have been helped by such things as the excellent Sure Start programme at North Cornelly, which has made a huge difference to local families. Cornelly children's centre is a bilingual, integrated centre, which opened last April, although the formal opening will not take place until next year. The head teacher told me that it had made a huge difference to the community. From the baby club for newborn infants, mother and toddler groups, playgroups and the two nursery classes, children have the opportunity for stimulation and education from birth until they join mainstream schooling. Classes also operate to encourage parenting skills and to equip parents for a return to the workplace. The centre will officially open in March 2006, but parents and staff are all agreed that that new resource is already making an impact in an area of social and economic need. Like people in the rest of my constituency, that head teacher will welcome the roll out of Sure Start centres in other communities.

Three common denominators face all parents when they are looking for child care, the first of which is finding it. We have acknowledged today that we must expand provision. That is why the Bill has been introduced—to encourage the growth and development of child care. The second denominator is funding, which, again, has been covered extensively in the debate. There is also the fact that, once one's children are of a certain age, ensuring that the care is acceptable to them can become complex. The parent may want to keep their child in child care, under the supervision and support that they like, but that may not be necessarily what the child wants.

In Bridgend, we have the Genesis project, which promises a new beginning for parents and children. The project will enable 700 parents to overcome barriers in learning new skills or returning to work. It also aims to create 900 additional child care places in two and a half years.

For the older children whom I mentioned earlier, we have 17 before and after school clubs, which support parents who work the traditional 9 to 5 hours. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey) talked about the importance of providing child care that support those who work shift patterns. I appreciate the importance of that. Covering Kenfig Hill, Pyle and North Cornelly in my constituency, the wonderful KPCY project, standing for Kenfig Pyle community youth, helps those parents who face the nightmare of finding child care and support outside the 9 to 5 provision. The scheme was recently named as the national lottery's most inspirational project working with young people in the UK. It provides a secure and safe environment—the sort of environment parents dream of.

There are 700 registered members at KPCY, who call in at different times depending on their interests and needs. The majority of those in the project are eight to 16-year-olds, including those at risk, or who have become disaffected and hard to engage. Since its opening, there has been a 60 per cent. cut in crime.

[Mrs. Madeleine Moon]

However, that project is due to close in January because, despite the hard work of parents and staff at KPCY, it cannot raise the funds to continue the core funding that will be critical once the project loses its national lottery funding.

We had a meeting at which the local police constable talked to politicians and community leaders about how critical it was that KPCY did not close. She spoke movingly of Helena Porobich, the local lady who set the project up after her child died as a result of a drugs overdose.

The police constable went in one day to see how things were going at the project. She saw Helena go over to a child who had come in, opened his bag, got his school books out and was starting to look at his homework. Helena said, "Have you eaten yet?" The child replied, "No, mum's in work." Helena said, "Well, you're not doing that homework with an empty belly." She went into the kitchen and cooked that child a meal.

That is the sort of flexibility that the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) talked about. That is the sort of flexibility that I have in my constituency and that I am about to lose. I am particularly pleased about the power for local authorities to assist and to make arrangements for the provision of child care. My local authority currently puts no core funding into KPCY. I hope that the Bill will encourage that sort of funding to be made available.

John Bercow: I agree that that is an example of precisely the sort of flexibility that we want to see and need to have guaranteed. Taking the argument one stage further, does the hon. Lady accept that another example of such flexibility would be ensuring that there is provision, either for the whole day or just a segment of it, for an unemployed parent who wants to maximise her skills by retraining and going on an adult education course, or for someone who, dare I say it, is just going off for a couple of hours for a work interview?

Mrs. Moon: The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that that is exactly what the Genesis project provides. It is expanding across Wales. Let us hope that, for once, we will send the project over the border—over the Dyke, as we say in Wales—to England.

I would like to look at the issue of children with disabilities. Much of what I planned to say has already been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood. Like me, she is aware that families with children with disabilities are one of society's most disadvantaged groups: 55 per cent. live in poverty or are in serious debt. Parents and children suffer loneliness and social isolation.

As hon. Members have said, there are 770,000 disabled children in the UK, and there are 46,500 in Wales. Every day, 75 children are born or diagnosed with disabilities. Having come from a background of working in social care, I am conscious of the fact that, when working with children with disabilities, social services departments and education departments perhaps focused a lot on the disability. What they forgot perhaps was the child's need for fun, for friendship and for normality.

The majority of disabled children live at home, yet because of a lack of child care, their mothers are seven times less likely to have paid work, although disabled children cost three times as much to raise. Confined to their homes, disabled children are missing out on opportunities for learning, having fun and making friends.

Again, Bridgend is leading the way. I invite hon. Members to come to see our Y Bont project. I promise them that they will be amazed. It is a model of best practice in the provision of care and support for children from the age of six weeks to pre-school. Y Bont provides support and information to parents and carers and high quality training to staff and to local playgroups catering for children with disabilities, with which it shares its toy library facilities. My hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) spoke of the provision of toy library facilities.

Y Bont is a registered charity and survives thanks to rigorous fundraising and local commitment to its invaluable service. We know the quality that we have. We are desperate to keep it, but it provides for only 12 children. It needs to be expanded and I hope that the Bill will allow for that.

We have said that local authorities must be flexible in their provision of child care. Child care must be looked at holistically, so that there is provision for different working patterns and provision that ensures that, for example, if a disabled child needs to attend school both before and after normal school hours, the transport arrangements and child support arrangements are in place. Many children with disabilities are restricted in the activities that they can engage in after school because the paid, one-to-one support that they have during the school day is removed the minute the school ends. They cannot then engage in the social activities that are critical to their having the normality that their school peers enjoy.

Transport arrangements must be not only flexible but secure. When tendering for school transport, my local authority circulated to more than 100 taxi companies the names, addresses and pick-up times of disabled children in my constituency of Bridgend and in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), placing numerous children at risk. When making child care arrangements, local authorities must be mindful of the need to ensure that all aspects of the care have in-built flexibility and meet the most rigorous child protection standards. My local authority certainly failed to do that. If we are to build in flexibility, there must be guidance for local authorities on tendering for school transport.

Access to information can be a barrier to good-quality child care, and we know that access to information is most difficult for those living in poverty. In areas where children are most likely to live in poverty, parents are least likely to have paid work and, consequently, have the least assistance to get out of poverty.

Bridgend county borough council's children information service is excellent. I invite hon. Members to look at its website. It has a specific area for child care and children's issues. There are leaflets and other very good attempts to engage with communities. I attended two excellent fun days held in the recreation centre.

Families were bussed in from outlying areas to spend time meeting and talking to representatives of the whole gamut of child care provision that is available throughout the county borough. We need such practices to be rolled out throughout the country.

One of the most important aspects of which we must be aware today is the great expectations that are being raised by the Bill. As politicians, we must be aware of the danger of a gap developing between the promises that we make and the expectations that people will have outside the House. The commitments laid out in legislation must meet the day-to-day reality faced by parents and children. Parents' expectations following the Bill will be high. We cannot fail them or their children.

The clear message of the Bill to parents, children, employers and all levels of government must be that children are vulnerable unique individuals for whom only the best will be good enough. The Bill places a responsibility on local authorities to spearhead the growth in the availability of child care.

I shall conclude with a reference to the Genesis project, which I mentioned earlier, and its aims. The project will work alongside parents to help them to explore long-forgotten hopes and aspirations and to provide guidance and support to help them to achieve their hopes and build a brighter future together. That is what I see the Bill offering throughout the United Kingdom. I commend it to the House.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): I am pleased to participate in this important debate. It has been of a high calibre and there have been tremendous areas of agreement between hon. Members on both sides of the House, which is important. I am also pleased to follow the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon), who made a serious contribution. I listened with great interest to what she said about her constituency and about expectations. I endorse what she said. We must always be realistic. We must not raise expectations too high and then not meet them. If we did, we as politicians would be criticised in the media and by parents and others who depend on child care. The hon. Lady made a very good speech.

Child care is a great concern in my constituency. Regrettably, many men and women have had to come to my surgery or write to me to say that, although they want to return to work, they cannot find the necessary child care. Either they cannot afford the costs of the existing provision, or they cannot get their child into the child care that they think the child needs. That very serious issue should concern us all. It is therefore opportune for all of us to consider ways in which to improve and increase child care provision but, as many hon. Members have said, we must do so with quality as a top priority. We are talking about quality for our children and for the future.

It is also very important that child care be affordable. In today's society, the cost of child care can be prohibitive for people who want to go back to work. If we do not make changes, society will suffer and the children will suffer, which is why this is such a serious issue for us all to debate and concern ourselves with.

I welcome the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), which was excellent, moderate and constructive as usual. She was also very positive. Something that has come out of the debate is that we are all positive about going forward. My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) made some very helpful and interesting contributions and interventions, which shows his commitment. We listened to him with interest. That said, Opposition Members have concerns about the Bill, which I would like to develop later in my short contribution.

I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), who made a thought-provoking and measured speech. I did not agree with all of her contribution, as she would expect, but I agree with her comments on disabled children and their parents, an issue that the hon. Member for Bridgend also highlighted. It is a great concern that parents of disabled children do not find it easy to get the necessary child care, either because of cost or because of their special needs.

In my constituency, there are mothers of disabled children who would like to return to the workplace but simply cannot find provision of satisfactory quality, where they would be happy to leave their children and which has the necessary facilities. We should all be considering this important issue to ensure that such child care provision is dealt with satisfactorily.

I welcome the Bill in principle, because I am a strong supporter of the aims of providing quality and affordable child care for working families. Therefore the general thrust of the Bill is to be welcomed. An increase in provision and greater access to child care must be priorities in today's society. Life today is more hectic. More men and women want to return to work whenever they can. When they have children, they obviously want the best for them, but they also want to get on with their careers, because that in itself can help their children. We heard from some hon. Members that in today's society, in which people have children later in life, they may have young children and be responsible for elderly parents at the same time. Life is demanding now for people. At the age when many people now have children, they often have elderly parents to care for as well.

Choice and opportunities are two issues that have come up in several contributions from Opposition Members and Government Members. We passionately believe that there should be choice and that people should not be forced into just one form of provision. Parents should have a choice and feel comfortable. Some of the Secretary of State's comments seemed to suggest that there was a greater emphasis among Government Members on one type of opportunity and less choice. I do not think that she meant that, or least I hope that she did not, because choice and variety of provision make the situation better for parents. Parents can make a choice about what they think is more appropriate for their children.

As I said in an intervention on the Secretary of State, child care costs are very high. We hear that costs in this country are probably among the highest in western Europe. They are prohibitive for certain people, particularly those who are returning to low-paid jobs. In London—my constituency is in south-east London—the costs are particularly high and are out of reach of many people on low incomes. Many parents are therefore forced to stay at home and look after their children—which might not be the best thing for them or for their children—because they cannot afford to pay for the child care that would enable them to go back into the workplace.

I am also concerned at the fall in the number of playgroups, pre-school places and childminder places in Greater London. Such schemes all offer parents greater choice. Many private and voluntary sector child care places have also closed, and that is regrettable. The Conservatives want more choice to be available to parents, and we would like to see more work being done with business and the voluntary sector to provide more affordable child care places, more childminders, more workplace nurseries and more clubs for older children.

John Bercow: I agree with what my hon. Friend says about workplace nurseries. Would it not be sensible to consider tax incentives for the provision of such facilities? If the Government were worried that that might represent a dead weight cost, or that it might be an imprudent use of public funds if relatively well-off companies were to take advantage of such an opportunity, might not a way round that be to incentivise businesses to provide workplace nursery places for low-income employees who might not otherwise be able to benefit from them?

Mr. Evennett: My hon. Friend makes a sensible point, as he usually does on these matters. We should consider tax incentives, because they would encourage an increase in provision. If we are serious about increasing provision, we must consider all the available opportunities, and not just focus on a narrow few.

There has been much debate today on the duties of local authorities in England and Wales. Those authorities will have to secure, as far as is practical, the provision of child care to meet the needs of parents, and that is welcome and encouraging. However, giving local authorities more powers and responsibilities raises the question of cost. The Secretary of State did not really answer our questions on that earlier, and I hope that the Minister will look a little harder at the issue. No extra money is being provided. The Government have said that they have put adequate money aside, but other duties will be required of local authorities, including advice and assessment and even the provision of child care. They do not know how much that is going to cost, having made their assessment, or how much child care they are going to have to provide, but there will be an increase in cost.

Any such increase would worry my constituents. If the Government are not providing extra money to pay for the extra responsibilities, will council tax payers have to pick up the bill? My local authority, Bexley, has already had a 35 per cent. increase in its council tax over the past three years, and that has hit people hard, particularly people on low incomes with families, pensioners and people on fixed incomes. If the local authority had to increase the council tax to provide the additional services required by the Bill, it would probably hit hardest those who could least afford it, and that worries me. The Secretary of State did not give us enough reassurance that that would not happen. A further problem is bureaucracy.

As a former teacher and lecturer, I have some concerns about the educational aspects of the Bill. Parents are the primary educators. Of course, we need to help them, but we should not dictate to them. They generally know better than Governments or bureaucrats—or supposed experts—what is best for their child. However, the Bill feels somewhat prescriptive. The Government like rules and regulations, and it worries me that the Bill contains new rules that dictate how infants should communicate, use language and literacy, and so forth.

Childminders and nurseries will have to teach the early-years foundation stage curriculum from birth to three years old. Ofsted will come along to check that the children are developing according to Government policy, and the Department for Education and Skills will be in control. That worries me, because children in their early years should be encouraged to learn through enjoyment and to develop at their own pace. They need to zone in on their social skills by co-ordinating, talking and sharing. Every child will develop to a different level and a different ability, as my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham said earlier. It worries me that the Bill is so prescriptive about the level of educational involvement. Older children should certainly have formal education, but a more detailed curriculum is inappropriate for children in their early years. Parents, not Ministers, know best how to bring up their children. Of course we want more child care places, but we want to give parents the ability to superintend their child's development.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Perhaps it would be helpful to reiterate that the word in the Bill that is giving many of us a problem is "taught". I, too, am a former teacher, and I think that the phrase that we are looking for is "structured play". That would give the children the opportunities that they need. I suspect that that is covered by the Bill, but the phraseology of the provisions gives us cause for concern.

Mr. Evennett: I totally agree with the hon. Gentleman that what is needed is structured play. We want our children to develop to maximise their potential; we do not want to teach or control them at that stage.

Mrs. Moon: I have listened to this argument throughout the afternoon, and I think that hon. Members are making a mountain out of a molehill. We are talking about parents educating their children, but this is also about, for example, children pouring water into jugs and seeing how much water goes into them. That is education, but it is also play. It is about children playing with sand, and getting paint all over their fingers. That is play, but it is also education. We must remember that we are talking about the same thing.

Mr. Evennett: I very much hope that we are, but I have a niggling feeling that the Bill is proposing something more structured. If it is not, of course we would welcome it. The hon. Lady is absolutely right: play is education, and the two go together. However, the phrasing of the Bill contains a hint of more formal instruction, and that worries me. I would be grateful if the Minister would tell me if I am wrong, but the wording does place a question mark over this issue.

John Bercow: This theme has percolated much of the debate. I confess that I am much more sanguine about the provision than some of my colleagues, many of whom have focused on the word "taught". I am keen to close down this part of the argument, and I would like to suggest that the real problem in clause 41 lies in its use of adult language to describe things that we hope very young kids will be able to do. We are not seeking to create mini-intellectuals, but the problem lies in the Bill's use of such phrases as to describe circumstances applicable to nought to five-year-olds.

"knowledge and understanding of the world"

Mr. Evennett: Time will tell on that one. I am sure that this issue will be discussed further when the Bill goes into Committee.

I am a great supporter of grandparents. When my children were young, my parents and parents-in-law were a tremendous help and support to my wife and me, looking after the children and taking them out. Unfortunately my parents-in-law are now deceased, which is a great sadness. Peggy and Ron Smith did a tremendous job for us as grandparents, though, and I welcome what grandparents do. I shall continue to stress the value of grandparents as child minders, and the fact that we should not write them out of the equation—not that I am suggesting that the Bill does that.

The Bill has potential. Some aspects still need to be addressed, but I think we have overcome the earlier to-and-fro of the debate. It was suggested that Conservative Members were not concerned about child care, or wanted to turn the clock back. That is ridiculous. We want to move forward. We are positive and enthusiastic: we want to give people more choice, and to allow them to return to the workplace in the knowledge that their children are being looked after well in an environment that is conducive to both education and play.

We must always consider the needs and interests of the child. We must bear in mind what is best for children, while also thinking about what is affordable and appropriate for parents. Parents must have a genuine opportunity to decide what is best for their children. None of that will be achieved through bureaucracy. Shortage of funds and uniformity are issues to be borne in mind. I glory in diversity, because I think that that is the best way of securing the best possible provisions.

I hope that the Government will take account of our concerns, because they have been expressed in a positive spirit with the best interests of society in mind.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I support the Bill, and I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett), who I think welcomed it broadly as well.

For decades, my hon. Friends and I have campaigned for decent child care. The Bill brings that ideal one step closer. Nothing is more important than investing in our children's future. The Bill is intended to support families, particularly parents who wish to work or undergo training, and to enable them to take such action safe in the knowledge that their children are being well looked after. It builds on the significant amount that the Government have already invested to support hard-working families with, for instance, extended maternity leave and extended paid maternity leave.

Since 2003, parents of children under six or disabled children have had the right to apply to work flexibly and to have that request considered seriously. Paid paternity leave has also been introduced. Moreover, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), for the first time adoptive parents have been given rights to adoption leave and pay. The Government have invested in Sure Start centres, which are intended to provide excellent child care in a multi-disciplinary setting and a range of services to support young children and their families in our most disadvantaged communities. That programme is being extended, and a pledge has been made that there will be a children's centre in every community by 2010. I applaud that.

An important framework of support for all parents, catering for a wide range of needs, is already in place, but the Bill aims to go further. Under the present Government more people are in work, and that can have beneficial effects on children. Children with working parents are less likely to live in poverty, more likely to do better at school and less likely to become disadvantaged adults. A variety of Government policies and initiatives have been devised with the aim of enabling parents to enter and remain in employment, from the new deal to in-work financial support and extended nursery provision—along with, of course, many opportunities for learning and skills development.

When we consider the employment patterns of families with dependent children, the need for more good-quality child care is obvious. According to data from the Office for National Statistics and on labour force trends, in 2004 most working-age families with dependent children included at least one parent in employment, and half of them included two parents in employment. When only one parent was employed, it was usually the father. Couples with pre-school-age children were much less likely to be dual earners than those with school-age children, and couples with three or more children were less likely to be dual earners than those with one or two children. That may indicate a need for more flexibility in child care provision.

Employment rates among parents have increased steadily in recent years. That upward trend reflects increases in both full-time and part-time employment. Over the 10-year period up to spring 2004, employment rates for couple mothers and lone parents with children under five increased by eight and 12 percentage points respectively.

The need for high-quality child care is clear. As I said earlier, a good start has been made with Sure Start, extended schools and the local focus on "Every Child Matters", but more needs to be done to implement the Government's 10-year child care strategy. Many families have difficulty in finding affordable child care that fits their circumstances and is flexible enough to meet their needs. Services that seek to support families with young children can be disjointed and lack effectiveness. The complexity and inconsistency of the current inspection regime sometimes makes it difficult for parents to secure the assurances that they expect about the quality of the provision on offer.

The Bill attempts to deal with those problems, and to implement the child care strategy further. It should be given credit for building on current public service agreement targets in giving local authorities a new duty to improve the well-being of young children in their areas, and in particular for introducing the requirement for gaps to be closed between the most deprived groups and the better off. That emphasis on tackling inequality is hugely welcome. I urge the Secretary of State to use the powers conferred by the Bill to set targets for the reduction of inequality if they prove necessary.

The new duty imposed on local authorities to secure sufficient child care for working parents is welcome. I explained earlier why that is so necessary. The extended duty to ensure that parents have access to information about services and facilities for children and young people is also a positive step. Moreover, a more robust and appropriate inspection regime is being introduced. Many Opposition Members have spoken of the need to provide quality child care, but we cannot be sure that we are delivering quality child care without a sound inspection regime. That is what the Bill aims to provide.

Local authorities will have a duty to assess all child care provision within a year, and subsequently once every three years. That will be necessary to ensure that provision is adequate, and to test the role of the public sector in the delivery of child care.

A number of measures in the Bill are welcome. There is substance on which local partnerships can build—and, as many of my hon. Friends have said today, there is much on which to build: 525,000 new child care places, nearly 1,300 more neighbourhood nurseries, and nearly 600 children's centres have been provided since the Government came to power.

Let me end by describing a visit I made some weeks ago to a nursery facility at Witton Gilbert school in my constituency. It is a partnership between the school, voluntary sector and local parents, delivering nursery provision at its best, with excellent and committed staff, extremely well resourced facilities and a sound mixture of structured and free play. I had a truly wonderful experience, and I had not realised that I would need skills in sand and water play and storytelling as an MP. It was really pleasant to sit down with the three-year-olds and have free milk and fruit—restored by this Government and disgracefully removed by the previous, Conservative Government, who obviously put the needs of very young children to the bottom of their agenda. That excellent facility also complements two new Sure Start centres in my constituency. If the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) and the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries), who is not in her place, are really not certain about the benefits of Sure Start, I invite them to come to see what is being achieved in my constituency. Those centres are not only giving valuable opportunities to disadvantaged children but helping their parents with parenting skills, training and routes to employment. Importantly, they are also giving essential support to grandparents who provide care for their grandchildren.

As a young student some time ago—I will not say how long—I carried out a comparative study of pre-school provision and the quality of pre-school provision in a range of European and western industrialised countries. Much to my dismay, Britain came bottom of the league table on almost every indicator of child care provision. We had pretty good child care facilities in this country during the second world war and shortly afterwards, but successive Governments failed to invest in child care, so we ended up at the bottom of the league. Thanks to this Government, who have invested in child care, we are now nearly at the top. This Bill should help us to build on the excellent record of the Government so far. We all want excellent child care, such as that in Witton Gilbert in my constituency, to be available to all young children. I therefore urge Members to support the Bill.

Kitty Usher (Burnley) (Lab): I welcome the Bill, which, I believe, encapsulates the heart of our party's values—to aim to break the link between people's income and their opportunities. The Bill will benefit children through a more structured curriculum, better protection for the very young and extended hours proposals, but will also break the link between income and opportunity for those adults who wish to enter the work force but who have so far been prevented from doing so. It is heartbreaking to be told by someone that they want to work but cannot afford the child care, or, in extremis, as I once heard in my constituency, that they want to go to a job interview in order to work but cannot afford the child care to do so. As a result of the Bill, both those occurrences will be less likely. I am proud to follow my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods), whose advocacy of the Bill was intelligent and wide-ranging.

During the opening speeches, some Opposition Members—I apologise for not having been present for the entirety of this afternoon's debate, due to my Select Committee commitments—tried to imply that the Government are introducing this Bill to force parents to work. That is not my understanding. The Government will support all parents as they make their own choices about how best to balance work and family commitments. They understand, as I do, that different people will want to work in different ways at different stages of their life. The Government's job is to make those choices easier.

Let us not beat about the bush. In the past, and unfortunately even now, choice in terms of child care has been a middle-class preserve. If one has a higher income, it is easier to pay to have one's children looked after if one wishes to go back to work than if one has a lower income. Much of what the Government are trying to do is to extend that type of choice to all families. I believe that this Bill will do that.

I welcome the new duty on local authorities to assess the type of child care available in their areas, and to provide more child care through whatever means they consider most appropriate. I note that the Bill is not the vehicle for discussing finance, and that the spending review is the best place for that, but I want to put it on record that the Government are already making a huge investment in various types of child care through free nursery places, funded Sure Start schemes expanding into children's centres throughout the country, the child tax credit and child care tax credit. I would be interested to hear whether the Conservative party can confirm its commitment to both those tax credits in the wind-up to the debate. Once the supply of places is increased under the new duty on local authorities, the Government will, in effect, indirectly subsidise the demand for those places through our tax credit system, which aims to help precisely those people who have been unable to afford to go to work when they have wanted to do so previously.

I notice that the duty on local authorities will be to increase child care supply as far as is reasonably practicable. Can the Minister give some more examples of what "reasonably practicable" will be interpreted to mean? Can a local authority say, for example, that it has other priorities or does not have the finance available? I hope that that is not the case.

The Bill builds on Sure Start, which has been one of the most important programmes introduced by the Government. Constituents have said to me that they are surprised that politicians introduced such a programme, because it will be a long time before its effects are felt. To the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs May), who implied that its effects have not yet been proven, I would say that that is the case almost by definition, because it will be a long time before there is an economic impact. My understanding, however, is that there is a great deal of evidence to show that young mothers who benefit from Sure Start are more likely to quit smoking, access training courses and go into education and then employment if that is what they want, and that both their mental and physical health have been improved. In my constituency, the same applies to some dads, too. I very much welcome the Government's commitment to build on that and to expand the number of children's centres.

I want to share with the House one anecdote from my constituency. When I was campaigning and canvassing in the general election only six months ago, a person who is now my constituent said to me that they would not vote Labour because they could not access their Sure Start programme as they lived just outside the geographic boundary. I had to explain that Sure Start would not exist were it not for a Labour Government, and that our plans were to expand it sufficiently so that every community had a children's centre. Let us make sure that we do not lose the fantastic reputation that Sure Start has, and that we keep the brand. Some people working in Sure Start centres seem to think that it will be replaced, whereas I understand that the opposite is true and that we will build on it.

I welcome this Bill, which is overdue. It will be long-lasting and will have effects not only on our children, but, I hope, on our children's children. I hope that it can be supported on both sides of the House.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I am delighted to be addressing such a packed House at this time of the evening. I feel that the general consensus that was breaking out at one stage has shortened this debate, which has been a good one with well-informed and weighty contributions from both sides of the House.

We started with the Secretary of State, who I am sure has been scuppered by the time adjustment this evening, talking about the £17 billion extra that has gone into child care. She was being a little disingenuous. It would be interesting to know how that figure extrapolates, because a large part of that money is wound up in the additional funding going into Sure Start, which we have supported. We said on numerous occasions before the election that we would ring-fence that money.

Contrary to what the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) said, we are the only party since 1997 that has held debates on children's matters in this Chamber. The Government have never held a debate on children's issues in their own time. In those debates and at questions we said that we supported Sure Start and would protect its funding, although we had ambitions to change some of its emphasis.

It is rather disingenuous for the Secretary of State to claim that there are no new unfunded costs attached to the Bill. The Bill contains a large number of directives to local authorities to ensure the sufficient provision of child care, to carry out assessments, to facilitate training in order to bring about the big increase in staff that is needed and to provide information. All of that will have costs attached to it.

As the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) rightly said, one of the big issues will be providing the child care work force required to make this Bill a reality. The transformation fund allocation of £125 million will just scratch the surface of what is required to provide training and encourage people into that line of work, as well as giving them the sustainable and decent wages that are all too often lacking now. If we do not get the staff, many of the aspirations within the Bill will not be achieved.

The hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), the chairman of the all-party childcare group, made a well-informed speech, as usual. She mentioned the child care element of child tax credits and their relatively low take-up at the moment. She also emphasised the social care input that is so vital for children in early years. She raised many of the questions that many hon. Members wanted to raise in terms of some of the definitions in the Bill and what is involved in the "sufficiency" description in parts of the Bill. She also talked, rightly, as did many other hon. Members, about the problems of children with disabilities and how a relatively small number of their parents and carers are working parents and carers, with all the difficulties attached to that.

The hon. Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey), who is in her place, made a good point; we need to see some of the regulations as soon as possible because a lot of the detail is not included in the Bill. It is vital that we have sight of at least draft regulations so that, in the discussions in Committee—as well as in another place—we can talk about the realities and the detail.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), who is also in his place, rightly mentioned the many stresses on parents struggling to bring up children in difficult circumstances and with financial pressures, and said that parental child care does not feature in the Bill, very important though it is. He also mentioned the word "discovery", which is useful in terms of how children develop in the early years and is different from the terminology of "taught", which features in the notorious clause 41, to which we will return on many occasions.

[Tim Loughton]

My hon. Friend also mentioned the costs that will be imposed on local authorities and the potential increases in council tax that may result from that. He also talked about the need to simplify the funding streams attached to certain aspects of child care.

The hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) said that the Bill was a real transformation and mentioned that we needed to double the number of child care places. She said that she would be setting up the all-party group of play, which is such an important element of the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) mentioned the importance of the family and added that this was a prescriptive Bill in many respects. To give him his due, he gave credit to Sure Start and said that his constituency had benefited from Sure Start projects. Mine has not, because we have no Sure Start project in my constituency even though I have areas of real deprivation. My hon. Friend also said that we needed a level playing field between existing and future providers and cited the issue of differential VAT treatment between private, independent providers and those working through Sure Start.

The hon. Member for Doncaster, North, who is back in his place, spoke in dramatic terms about crossing the rubicon and about the state extending its role. I think he is right and it was very good of him to admit it up front. Some of us have concerns about the state extending its role as a parent when the state's record as a parent is a lousy one, has been for too many years and still is for those looked-after children for whom it has direct responsibility.

The hon. Member for Doncaster, North also mentioned spending. If we analyse the costs attached to the Bill, we see that it is right that we need to spend more, but that spending must be cost-effective and well targeted. The average capital cost of a new nursery place is about £15,000. At the moment, the occupancy rate among the private and voluntary independent providers is about 76 per cent. On the face of it, there are a lot of available places, most of which are described as good quality places that could be used without the considerable capital start-up costs that will be involved in the way envisaged by the hon. Gentleman. We need to have a proper debate about whether the money is being used properly. Much of the criticism of Sure Start projects in the past was that they could not be scrutinised in isolation but must be scrutinised holistically in terms of their effect on other existing providers in those areas where they have been set up. We want to return to that.

Helen Goodman: The hon. Gentleman said that there were many areas with spare capacity. Does he have any sense of which areas those are, and if they are in the same places where there is a shortage of child care places? It is an interesting notion.

Tim Loughton: That is a good point. If one looks at the survey that the National Day Nurseries Association has conducted among a large sample of its members, many of the vacancies are in areas where new providers, heavily subsidised at the front end, are coming in. That cannot make sense and that is why partnership and co-operation, as well as some of the conditions placed on local authorities in determining whether there is a sufficiency of supply, are vital to the Bill. We want more assurances from the Government on that.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) characteristically went on at length and in detail about the problems of providing child care in rural areas and, not for the first time, talked about the shortage of Welsh-medium child care. If he is on the Committee scrutinising the Bill, we may find ourselves talking about those subjects at length, as we have on previous occasions. The hon. Gentleman, in common with many other hon. Members, also talked about the extended family, and he made a good point about the need for some sort of intermediate category between formal and informal child care. There is certainly some merit in that.

The hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) mentioned the problems of child care that affect us all across the country, in particular those relating to disability and the extra costs associated with that. She spoke highly of the Genesis project—a Sure Start project—in her own constituency.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) said that the Bill represents a positive way forward. He referred to costs and factors relating to special needs that hold back many women from returning to the work force, but he rightly said that choice has to be an important part of the Bill. The one-size-fits-all model is inappropriate. He spoke about the high cost of child care places, assuming it is possible to find them, in London and also mentioned the importance of children being encouraged and enjoying their development at an early age as opposed to being formally taught. He cleverly managed to sneak in a reference to his in-laws, Peggy and Ron Smith, as we approach Christmas. I am sure that he will be relying on them for cover during the Christmas holidays—and not least for a present, too. I shall perhaps mention my in-laws later.

The hon. Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) made an interesting contribution about employment patterns, using some of the Office for National Statistics data. She was the only hon. Member to refer in detail to the need to close gaps and to tackle inequality, which is an important aspect of the Bill. She then said that we need to rely on targets to achieve that, which is where we may part company. There are many ways of reducing inequality and we believe that it should start with levelling up rather than levelling down. We will want some assurances about that when we come to debate the detail in Committee.

The hon. Lady also referred to the inspection regime, which is necessary to measure quality. We can tick as many boxes as we like and increase the numbers by as many as we like, but quality is crucial. If they are not quality child care places, we are not doing any service for the children who need them and their parents. The hon. Lady also mentioned the pet Sure Start project in her constituency. It was all going so well until she lapsed into a little partisanship. To mention what happened eight and a half years is no longer sufficient; we have to go back about 34 years to refer implicitly to "Margaret Thatcher, milk snatcher"—all those years ago.

Finally, we had a late entry from the hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher), who made a very good contribution about breaking the link between income and opportunity and raised a fair point about the need to give choices to a wider range of people. That is what the Bill should be all about.

As I said, we have had a good debate and, to reiterate the opening comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), we welcome the Bill and will support it, just as we have welcomed previous child care measures. I was involved in the Children and Adoption Bill and the Children Act 2004. Indeed, we worked together across the House to improve the legislation as it went through its Committee and later stages. I hope that the same will be true of this Bill—that we have a good, well-informed and constructive debate in Committee.

Affordable and quality child care is a subject that is at last coming of age in Westminster politics and, given the significant proportion of our constituents who are affected, that is long overdue. Ahead of the last election, it was interesting that when we produced a manifesto solely on the subject of child care, it generated considerable interest among the Government, such that the Prime Minister had to come forward at that stage and produce his own thoughts on child care. All parties recognise the importance of getting child care right. That has many implications for children, parents, child care providers and children's voluntary organisations now, but, more importantly, getting it right now will have enormous implications for the future social, educational and career development of those children as they grow up.

It is interesting that the under-fives are the only part of the population that is projected to grow by 2012—[Interruption.]—by some 4 per cent. to 2.9 million children. It is clearly the sector of population that we should focus most on while the rest of the population shrinks—[Interruption.]—in numbers, not in size: ho, ho. I am trying to raise the level of the debate a little. As a recent report from the US National Academy of Sciences found:

"A failure to receive care as a child can disrupt the normal development of a hormone system linked with social bonding which has significant implications for whether children develop into good and responsible citizens."

The Bill should be subject to detailed scrutiny, and we welcome the Government's intention to allow, as I understand it, three weeks in Committee without knives, so we can properly study those proposals that require the most detailed examination. A common complaint across the House has been the lack of detail at this stage. I, for one on the Conservative Benches, have form for criticising legislation that leaves too many of the detailed considerations to secondary regulation and codes of conduct, which are all too often not produced until well after a Bill has passed all its parliamentary stages. I therefore ask the Minister whether the Government will make draft copies of their proposed regulations available during the passage of the Bill either through this House or in the other place, as that would greatly assist our deliberations.

The general principles that we should apply to the scrutiny of the Bill are as follows. First, the measures should maximise parental choice. Whether a parent chooses to send his or her child to a state-run nursery, a voluntary-sector nursery, an independent provider, an extended family member or to leave the child at home if possible, they should not be hampered—and certainly not financially disadvantaged—in doing so. They should choose whatever course of action they believe is most suitable for their own children. As the Pre-School Learning Alliance put it:

"Parents should be supported in whatever childcare choices they make, regardless of their personal circumstances."

The second criterion is one of quality over quantity. It would be detrimental if, in expanding the accessibility of child care places, quality was compromised so that the development of children at crucial early years was prejudiced by inappropriate levels of care from inappropriately qualified providers. Inappropriate day care could make children more likely to suffer from emotional problems. Do the skilled work force exist or will they exist in the next few years in order to provide the quality of care that we are all agreed that we need?

Thirdly, we will judge the Bill on the degree of accessibility provided on a level playing field. There is concern that the Government intend to increase provision through working tax credits only, thereby supporting parents into work. Obviously, we need to help the most disadvantaged families—the result of poverty, disability or whatever—most of all, but many non-working families would benefit from access to additional child care help yet that funding arrangement will not apply to them. Lack of affordable child care is a problem for all parents across all social scales. In any case, the take-up of the tax credit is relatively low with only about 300,000 families currently accessing the child care element of the working tax credit. We need some answers about who else will be able to access the new child care places.

The fourth criterion that we will apply to the Bill is simplicity and transparency. Child tax credit is notoriously complex and bureaucratic and any new arrangements for funding child care should avoid bureaucratic procedures for providers and parents—a point made in the briefing note from the National Union of Teachers.

Fifthly, we need to achieve the right balance. What is the right child care balance between care, education and play; and what is the right balance between family care and paid professional care away from home? The Bill is centred almost entirely on the non-maternal care of young children by paid employees.

Sixthly, another criterion that we shall apply in scrutinising the Bill is one of sustainability. It is no good creating new, heavily subsidised child care places only to knock out perfectly good-quality existing ones. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead mentioned, for every two new places that have been created, one has been lost.

The concern is that the advantageous models of capital cost will be paid up front, through various neighbourhood nursery schemes, for child care that is not viable in a financial sense, so that when the funding runs out after three or five years, those schemes' viability will be questionable, even though they have knocked out much of the competition. We need competition, but we need it on a level playing field that is fair to all; indeed such criticisms have been made in the past. So there are many questions that we want the Government to address this evening and during the Bill's later stages.

[Tim Loughton]

Does the Minister genuinely believe that these aims can be achieved without extra funding? The Local Government Association is concerned that extra funding is simply not going to be attached to this Bill, at a time when children's services departments throughout the country are greatly stretched and undergoing significant reorganisation, largely as a result of the Children Act 2004 and the Adoption and Children Act 2002. They are rightly creating new children's services departments and directors of children's services, and new structures for child protection and for greater co-operation between, and working with, all interested parties. Can the Minister be sure that in pushing forward the measures in this Bill, those departments will not suffer from a lack of funding, and from a lack of ability to pay the attention that they must continue to pay to elements of recent legislation that they are still trying to absorb?

According to the interdepartmental child care review, the child care work force needs to expand by some 8 per cent. every year to meet Government targets on child care growth. We need reassurance from the Minister, given the slightly disappointing child care work force strategy that was published in the spring, that the Government are on course to produce those skilled people. Turning to the difference between care and education, and the early years foundation stages innovations, the National Union of Teachers pointed out that there are no initial teacher training courses appropriate for the learning and development needs of children aged from birth to three. Concern has also been expressed about the many other responsibilities placed on local authority children's services departments, which are still absorbing and adapting to recent legislation, as I said.

Can the Minister give us some idea of how we define the Bill's reference to reducing inequalities? Will the definition be very broad? How on earth do we define the various contributions made to society? It was difficult enough to define that in the Children Act 2004; it will surely be much more difficult to define in dealing with children between the age of birth and five. What will be the precise duty relationship between local authorities and their partners? Here, there appears to be some discrepancy with the requirements for co-operation contained in the 2004 Act. What targets are to be prescribed by the Secretary of State, and can we be assured that they will be based on quality outcomes, rather than on the ticking of quantitative boxes? How does all this relate to looked-after children? There is of course a potential conflict of interest when the local authority is facilitator and provider of early-years child care, as well as corporate parent. So we have a number of questions concerning the outcomes for looked-after children.

On the duty to secure sufficient child care for working parents, as outlined in part 2 of the Bill, what does "sufficient" mean? What are the penalties if a local authority is deemed not to have provided sufficient child care? How does a parent complain or exercise their rights if there is insufficient means of child care in their area? Will there be an appeals process for providers if a local authority does not genuinely secure a mixed economy, or encourage proper partnership with all providers?

Turnover of staff could also give rise to the questions of quality and continuity. What measures exist to encourage continuous improvement in quality once the initial targets have been met? How will central Government and local authorities most effectively provide guidance to parents on how to judge what factors will best benefit their children's learning that cannot come from parents themselves? How is affordability to be determined? The Bill leaves that issue hanging in the air.

The sustainability criteria in this Bill are important. The National Day Nurseries Association has warned:

"In many areas good quality provision is being undermined through the creation of child care for the under 5s in schools and in some newly developed Sure Start children's centres."

Occupancy levels in many NDNA nurseries are dropping, having declined in the past year from 82 per cent. to an average of 76 per cent. They are in danger of becoming unsustainable. According to Laing and Buisson, an occupancy level of 90 per cent. is required to guarantee sustainability. What assessment has the Minister made of current spare capacity in the sector?

If schools provide child care for three and four-year-olds, private and voluntary providers will be left to cater for one and two-year-olds. That is an unsustainable model, given the high staff ratios required for under-threes. It is therefore essential that Sure Start children's centre programmes build on existing child care provision, rather than duplicate it. An NDNA survey revealed the following:

"Almost 50 per cent. of day nurseries reported that their local authority is creating a children's centre, with Government funding, nearby to their own setting. This unnecessarily duplicates existing PVI provision, the overwhelming majority of which provides services of good quality ... The principle of a mixed economy in child care, favoured by the Government", is in danger of

"being overlooked, with opportunities for local partnerships being missed. This threatens the sustainability of childcare overall".

Other respondents to the survey said that the majority, 71 per cent.,

"reported that local authorities were not yet involving them in the delivery of local children's centres ... 47 per cent. of day nursery respondents confirmed that a local children's centre or school had launched childcare services aimed specifically at the under-fives, which directly competed and duplicated their own services."

Chapter 2 of part 3 of the Bill, which deals with the requirements to be met by early-years providers, will doubtless lead to some fireworks in Committee. We have major concerns about this issue. The provision has been described as standard assessment tests for embryos. Perhaps the point is encompassed in the use of the word "taught" in clause 41(2)(b), as has been mentioned. The Daycare Trust points out the following:

"It is important that the new Early Years Foundation Stage Framework looks at children's development in the broadest sense and does not simply educationalise services for very young children."

The trust has also referred to this as "the schoolification of early years provision for very young children."

As the Minister knows, the first two years of a child's life are crucial. The way that they develop, and are helped to develop, has a major impact on how they turn out. The wiring of the brain is a physical development—the joining together of neural pathways that takes place between birth and the age of two. At between the ages of six months and 18 months, the "social" part of the brain grows; it is not there at birth. The growth, or lack of it, depends on positive stimulus from an attentive and loving care giver. The satisfactory development of the brain almost entirely depends on the quality of attachment achieved during the first two years. That is basic attachment theory, but the point is that those first two years are very different from the following three. Yet the Bill does not differentiate between the first two years and later years. We need to pay some attention to that point.

Helen Goodman: Opposition Members, including the hon. Gentleman, have repeatedly said that they do not want targeting or the early-years foundation stages, and that they are unhappy with the criteria set out in clause 41. They have also said that they want to know how effective Sure Start and other provision is. Can the hon. Gentleman square that circle for us?

Tim Loughton: I do not think that there is a circle to square. My point is that we are in danger of treating all children under five the same, but basic attachment theory shows that children are very different in the first two years, which are all about the connections that the child makes with the parent or child care provider with whom it comes into close contact. Trying to educationalise or schoolify, as people have put it, those crucial early years threatens to upset the social development of that child. That is why we need to be assured that the early education plans are not as prescriptive as many people fear.

The explanatory notes for clause 41 mention

"six areas of learning and development ... what most young children are expected to achieve ... educational programmes, setting out what should be taught to young children ... arrangements for assessing the learning and development".

That is educational language, not the language of social development. That is why we are so concerned about the prospect of prescriptive schoolification of provision for very young children, when what they need is the chance to interact socially and form attachments. They need to be observed, encouraged and stimulated, not tested and not taught.

As the NUT has warned, the proposal to extend the national literacy and numeracy frameworks downwards to age three will result in formalised learning too soon. We want to scrutinise that closely and, in particular, table amendments to ensure different treatment for children at that early age.

We support the principles behind the Bill, but we want to scrutinise it closely. There is a lot at stake and we cannot risk an approach that puts quantity ahead of quality outcomes. We must not apply to this area the Government's obsession—as shown in so much other legislation—with testing and ticking the boxes, instead of letting children grow up and learn to interact socially with their carers and peers. We need to encourage a child to develop its own sense of self. Subject to the criteria that I have set out, the Bill will have our support where it genuinely extends more choice and flexibility to more parents and their children; where it improves quality; where it complements and builds on what is already there rather than duplicates and undermines it; where it creates a genuine partnership between local authorities and all other interested parties; where it recognises that a child does best when allowed to be brought up by a loving family and parents, where possible; and, above all, if it allows children to grow up as well rounded individuals, given the best start in life that they all deserve.

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): We have had an interesting debate, with some knowledgeable contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House who clearly care about young children, early education and child care. I welcome the fact that Opposition Members support the Bill in principle.

Since 1997, the Government have introduced a new and unprecedented commitment to our youngest children and their families. I can tell the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) that we have invested more than £17 billion in early years and child care; guaranteed every three and four-year-old a free nursery education place; started to integrate education with care in every setting; committed to provide a children's centre in every community; extended services in schools; introduced the working tax credit, which is likely to be worth some £800 million this year, to enable low-income families to access child care; and established more than 500,000 new child care places.

We have done all that for two reasons. First, we know that good quality, regular pre-school provision has a markedly positive impact on young children and their subsequent development. Even after one takes into account the characteristics of the child, the family and the home, the evidence shows significant links between quality child care and better child outcomes. The research to which several hon. Members referred, including my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman), suggests that the difference in child development between having pre-school education and not having it can be of the order of four to six months. For the highest quality integrated centres, the difference can be as much as nine months. That substantial difference is achieved in only a two-year period of a child's life, which is remarkable. Good quality, integrated child care is good for young children and it helps the most disadvantaged children the most. Committed as we are to ensuring that poorer children get every chance to reach their potential and to rise beyond the circumstances of their birth, giving them the best and earliest start is essential.

The second reason is, of course, that today's parents combine family and work—many choose to, but many have to—and need the reassurance of high-quality, reliable child care in which they can have confidence. Such child care is not only safe, but provides stimulation and the kind of developmental opportunities that every good parent provides at home.

The Bill brings child care into the mainstream of the local services that parents can expect to be available. It ensures that parents will get the information and help that they need to gain access to those services. It gives outcomes for our youngest children the recognition and status that they deserve for the first time, and it puts statutory force behind the drive to reduce inequalities among young children. My hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) was right to set the Bill in the context of the drive for equality in the interests of children, their families, our economy and, indeed, our social fabric.

A number of important themes have been touched on by many hon. Members during the debate. The first theme is choice, which was raised by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) in her opening speech. I was somewhat perplexed to understand her contention—I paraphrase, but this is more or less it—that there is less choice under Labour and that private, voluntary and independent providers are going out of business. The facts do not stack up with that analysis.

In 1997, 56 per cent. of three and four-year-olds were in some form of free nursery provision. The figure is 98 per cent. now. In 1997, there were just over 600,000 registered child care places; there are 1.2 million now—an increase of 95 per cent. In 1997, there was a registered place for one in eight children. There is now a registered place for one in four children. There were 6,000 day nurseries then; there are 13,000 day nurseries now. There were 3,500 out-of-school clubs in 1997; there are more than 10,000 now. Given the expansion in all kinds of provision, we can see that the choice available for people is much better now.

A number of hon. Members expressed concern about the position of private, voluntary and independent providers. Today, 75 per cent. of full day care is provided by the private sector; only 3 per cent. is provided by local authorities. Some 63 per cent. of sessional day care—playgroups—is provided by the voluntary sector; only 4 per cent. is provided by local authorities. Far from causing a diminution in the sector's diversity, we have been increasing its diversity, and we want to continue to do so.

None of the Opposition spokespersons picked up the point that, at least for England, the Bill says that local authorities can attempt to fulfil the sufficiency duty and fill identified gaps in child care themselves only as a last resort and when that is clearly the only acceptable thing to do. In other words, they must work with parents and providers to ensure that the gaps are filled outside the local authority sector.

The theme of choice ran through other hon. Members' speeches. The hon. Members for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) and for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) seemed to suggest that, somehow, the Government extending provision and choice is tantamount to pushing parents out to work. I want to say categorically that that is not so. We believe that parents can choose whether they wish to work and, if they wish to work, what child care they want to use. It is not for the Government to regulate the use of relatives or grandparents and subject them to Ofsted inspections. I am sure that the hon. Member for Reading, East did not intend to imply that, but that is what bringing them within the Bill's scope would mean.

Mothers and fathers are free to organise their lives and child care as they think best. I am glad that, in the end, a Conservative Member—the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett)—mentioned fathers. Of course, we know that many fathers—albeit perhaps not Conservative Members—increasingly want to take an active part in the upbringing and care of their young children, so we want to support that. My hon. Friends the Members for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon), for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) and for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) recognised the importance of choice to parents and the economy, and the fact that employers are increasingly recognising the business case for child care.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham was right to say that the issue now is not quantity, but quality. That is of paramount importance, so I share that concern with every hon. Member who raised it, including my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) and for Stockport (Ann Coffey) and the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), who made an intelligent and detailed speech about the importance of quality. I welcome the support of the hon. Lady and my hon. Friends for the Bill and our drive for quality.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport that clause 7 provides the legal underpinning for free entitlement for all three and four-year-olds, including children in need. That is why we introduced the outcome duty, under which local authorities must pursue outcomes for children though integrated education and care. We know that such integration will drive up quality.

That is also the drive behind the early years foundation stage and the integrated regulation and inspection framework. Much of what has been said about the foundation stage has not been helpful. It will not involve formal education and there will be no tests or rigid timetables. It will cover the sort of things that good parents do with their children—I suspect that they are things that hon. Members did automatically with their young children—so people would expect such activities to form part of a good child care setting. The foundation stage will be play-based. Children will be provided with the experiences and activities that they need to grow, learn and develop.

We are building on existing frameworks. Although I do not want to detain the House, I recommend the "Birth to Three Matters" framework to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham—I thought for a moment he had lifted sections of it and incorporated them into his speech. Practitioners will plan for each child. They will adopt a structured approach, but the experience of the child will be spontaneous and free-flowing. Practitioners will assess children by observation and discuss progress with parents.

Bringing together the existing "Birth to Three Matters" framework and the foundation stage will give providers a much more coherent framework to apply and follow. They are applying and following a framework now, but it is in two separate bits and it does not include the care standard. Our aim is to bring forward a coherent rationalisation of what exists at the moment.

Quality and affordability are also important. Quality depends on a qualified, trained work force, and developing the work force can have an impact on costs. As hon. Members have rightly recognised, it is difficult for us to square that circle. We have introduced the children's work force strategy and the development council that is now helping us with it. Local authorities will have to develop their own work force strategies because different situations will exist in different areas. We will be giving £52 million a year to local authorities from next April to develop their work forces. The money will be additional to that from the transformation fund to which several hon. Members referred, through which we will try to support the development of better qualifications among the work force.

On the demand side, the working tax credit is helping more than 330,000 families to afford child care. Of course, the free part-time education offer for all three and four-year-olds is also helping parents. The situation is complex, but with the strategy and the work force development council, and along with local authorities, we have put in place a mechanism by which we can try to ensure that we make progress. Indeed, the duty on child care is framed towards people claiming the working tax credit so that we can ensure that the child care provided is affordable.

A number of hon. Members mentioned the role of local authorities. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) recognised that they are the appropriate lead body to develop sufficient child care and to be accountable for children's outcomes in their areas. Child care has to have a local dimension. Rural areas will be different from urban areas, and it will be different for different groups of parents. That is why it is important, in terms of pursuing the flexibility to which some hon. Members referred, that local authorities take the lead.

I do not accept that the burdens are unfunded. All the duties, in part, are already local authority duties under either the Children Acts or other regulations. Local authorities have received significant amounts in the general Sure Start grant for children's centres, extended schools and work force development. By 2007–08, they will receive £1.8 billion, which is double the figure for 2004–05. That is a substantial resource and is in addition to the £3 billion to fund the under-fives early education offer, which is going to all settings that meet the standards.

Disabled children were mentioned. I assure hon. Members that the focus on disabled children is a result of our determination to ensure that we improve the situation for them and their families. The duty on outcomes will focus on disabled children. The child care duty highlights the needs of disabled children. The early years foundation stage will contain explicit references to children with disabilities and those with special educational needs. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood was right. The findings of a recent Ofsted study show that in a majority of cases a positive attitude and a well trained team of staff make the difference between a disabled child being welcomed and included or not.

This is a landmark Bill. It is the first Bill devoted specifically to early years and child care. It reflects our commitment to give every child the best possible start in life, with enriching experiences that will enhance their development and learning throughout their childhood and the rest of their education. It is a major public service reform, bringing integrated early years education and child care into the mainstream of a modern welfare state. It establishes once and for all that the services will be available to parents, part and parcel of the locally based family services that parents rightly expect in today's society. It is a major commitment to disadvantaged children, with a statutory duty to improve outcomes for all young children and reduce inequalities between the most disadvantaged and the rest. It puts children and parents at the heart of the legislation, and it confirms the role of local authorities as champions of those children and parents. It will give fathers and mothers genuine choices on how best to balance work and family life, and the assurance that whatever choice they make, the system is working to ensure high quality and consistency.

I hope every hon. Member will join us in supporting these radical measures. We have the opportunity to transform permanently the shape, quality and availability of early years services for the youngest children and their parents. I hope that we can do so with consensus. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

CHILDCARE BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Childcare Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday 10th January 2006.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

CHILDCARE BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Childcare Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(1) any expenditure incurred under or by virtue of the Act by a Minister of the Crown or government department, and

(2) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable under any other Act out of money so provided.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

CHILDCARE BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Childcare Bill, it is expedient to authorise the charging of fees by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools in England under provisions of the Act relating to the registration of persons providing childcare.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

NHS (Havering)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Mr. Coaker.]

8.49 pm

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): The issue that I wish to highlight during this Adjournment debate relates to the state of health services in my local area in the London borough of Havering. In opening this debate, I pay tribute to the tremendous hard work of NHS staff in my constituency and more widely in the borough. I put on record and highlight at the outset their professionalism and commitment and the skill that they show in providing high-quality care for my constituents. However, there are a number of concerns and developments in the local health service, which I hope to highlight and which need to be given greater attention by local health care professionals and the Department of Health when seeking to ensure the provision of the high-quality health service that my constituents rightly deserve.

The backdrop to this debate is the fact that Havering primary care trust, which administers health care at primary level in the borough, currently has a deficit of about £3 million. That has raised questions about whether some health service provision is being rationalised and the impact that that is having on local health services. I note in particular a press report at the weekend attributed to the Department of Health about overspends and PCT budgets, which said:

"It is not acceptable for any NHS organisation to spend more resources than it has been allocated or received in income.

That is why organisations posting a pre-audit deficit received a letter from the Secretary of State and the NHS chief executive making it very clear that this is not acceptable and that performance must improve."

Obviously, we are looking for high-quality care and efficiencies in the health service, but such comments raise concern about the pressure that is being brought to bear on health service executives and what that means for immediate care—whether decisions are being made responsibly for the long term and in order to ensure that we maintain high-quality care for everyone in the local community. I know that my PCT works very hard. I have great respect for the management of the Havering PCT. However, they are under tremendous pressure and that is leading to careful consideration of the future provision of a number of services.

I know that the Minister is aware of my concerns about the podiatry service—the foot care clinic that is made available to older members of my community. I am grateful to the Minister for her reply to me in the past day or so about some of the issues that I have been highlighting. I noted in her letter a recognition of the fact that

"Podiatry services are now only available to individuals with limb threatening conditions or those with a high clinical need as assessed by a podiatrist."

I draw the Minister's attention to comments made by one of my constituents who formerly used the podiatry service. Following her reassessment, she no longer receives the benefit of it. She said:

"In short, if you are not diabetic or have peripheral neuropathy you are not eligible. They do not take into account that I have chronic and severe arthritis in both knees. Therefore, with the best will in the world I cannot bend them to cut my own toenails. Furthermore, due to a long-ago accident my toenails grow unusually thick . . . You would just not believe how painful they become when they grow too long . . . Surely this . . . new criteria must make some exceptions."

I know that the Minister is aware that Age Concern, effectively, provides an alternative service, for which people pay about £8. My constituent comments:

"I am embarrassed to say, I simply cannot afford the £8 they charge. I'm a widow and an OAP and that's three dinners! When one is surviving on just the state pension, that's the grim reality!"

Given such concerns, I am worried about the impact of the measure on older people in my constituency who are not lucky enough to have high incomes so that, in the case of that particular constituent, they cannot afford to access those services. The most vulnerable members of society may not necessarily receive the attention that they deserve. In such cases, there will be an impact on people's mobility. If it is too painful for them to walk they may not be able to leave their home, which could lead to a deterioration in their mental health, depression and many other problems. I am therefore worried about people who cannot afford to obtain such a service elsewhere or who they feel barred from using it.

I have highlighted the issue of mental health. In the past few months, the Duchess of Kent day hospital, which provided services, particularly psychological therapies, to people suffering from mental health conditions, has closed. A decision was made earlier this year to re-examine those services and provide them in a different way, because the facility was not close to Havering. The review concluded that the Duchess of Kent day hospital should close on 30 September this year and that new provision would be put in place in the next financial year. The problem is that there is a gap between 30 September and the beginning of the next financial year. Services provided at the Duchess of Kent hospital are no longer being made available, and my understanding is that no long-term psychological therapies are available to mental health patients in my constituency and in the London borough of Havering, who must wait for new tier 3 mental health services to be put in place in the next financial year.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

James Brokenshire: My hon. Friend has given me notice of his wish to intervene, so I will give way to him.

Mr. Bone: My hon. Friend was talking about extended waiting times. Is he aware that in column 897 of Hansard on 15 November, the Government motion stated that no one waited more than six months for NHS treatment? I have discovered that 397 people in Wellingborough have waited more than six months for treatment. Has he encountered similar cases in his constituency?

James Brokenshire: I am aware of services with considerable waiting times, some of which I shall highlight. Access is an issue, and if a target is not set for a particular treatment to ensure that someone is given a consultant's appointment or a diagnosis, there will be a long wait. In the London borough of Havering, it probably takes someone about a year to seek a digital hearing aid, given the demand and the available appointments. The issue has arisen in my hon. Friend's constituency, and it is a problem in Hornchurch and for my colleagues in neighbouring constituencies in Havering.

I was highlighting the issue of the Duchess of Kent day hospital and the gap in provision. A further problem was the delay in notifying patients of the closure. I understand that some staff were not in agreement with the decision and had reservations about the closure process, and the delay in notifying patients was exacerbated by the fact that the decision was taken just before the general election, so the primary care trust was unable to go through the usual processes of the overview and scrutiny committee of the local council.

If that is the case, the Minister might reflect on the entire process. If there is a significant change in health service provision, such as the closure of a facility, it seems odd that the calling of a general election should prevent health bodies from telling patients and local residents that that change is coming into effect. We ended up in the bizarre situation where the Duchess of Kent day hospital closed on 30 September, yet letters notifying patients of its closure went out only a week before. The report on a complaint that was made to the North East London Mental Health NHS Trust concluded that "it is clear that the closure process was not robustly managed and that the clients of the Duchess of Kent were probably caused some distress through the delay of information regarding the service closure and the future plans for following them up as individuals. It is right and proper therefore that an apology should be offered to the former clients of the Duchess of Kent. Assurance should also be given that lessons will be learnt from this process, that will be used in future service redesign processes."

Because of the hiatus that I have described, some of my constituents who were mental health patients receiving support from the Duchess of Kent had to form their own self-help group. I understand that in the past few weeks one patient who was using those facilities has unfortunately been readmitted to Mascalls Park, which is the acute facility dealing with mental health patients in the London borough of Havering. Although I could not say that that is directly connected, it suggests that if the therapies to help such patients are not in place, acute episodes may occur as a result, and people who need more significant care and attention may have to be taken into an acute hospital. That is not how we should be dealing with the care of mental health patients. We should ensure that care is available in the local community to support them, and provide the therapies that they need. I know that that is the thrust of general health policy, and I wholeheartedly endorse the provision of primary care support for mental health patients.

It is very bad that there is a gap in service provision for patients trying to access tier 3 support. I was assured in July that patients' needs for on-going clinical care would be met "in a timely and appropriate manner".

I do not see it as timely or appropriate if there is a six-month hiatus in services and people have to wait that length of time for psychological therapies that they were previously receiving at the Duchess of Kent hospital, particularly as one in four people are likely to suffer from some form of mental illness during their lifetime. Does the Minister regard the provision available to people in my constituency as an acceptable level of care?

A further example relates to parentcraft classes for expectant mothers and fathers. As a young father with two little daughters—one of whom will celebrate her birthday tomorrow; I hope she will wake up to find daddy at home in the morning, as that would make her very pleased—I remember clearly how important the run-up to the birth of a child is in preparing for a traumatic situation, when things happen quickly. When people go into hospital, they are unsure about what is to happen and parentcraft and antenatal classes are important in helping us to understand what is likely to happen. In sharing our experiences with other expectant mums and dads, we realise that we are not alone and that there are support mechanisms to get us through a traumatic and difficult time. The Minister is nodding, so I am sure that she understands what I am talking about.

I was thus astonished a few months ago when I received letters from constituents pointing out that antenatal classes in the community were being stopped. Parentcraft classes were no longer being supported in the NHS, which would mean that expectant mums and dads had to try to find private or non-NHS provision. The Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust accepted that there was a problem, saying:

"This is due to the increasing number of births compared to the number of midwives providing acute care and as such we do have to concentrate on the more critical areas of the service".

In other words, the trust had to prioritise women in labour. Antenatal check-ups would not be affected; only the parentcraft classes would go. That may be all well and good in terms of service management, but I found parentcraft classes valuable and important and am disappointed, to say the least, that preparation for parents appears to be a casualty in the service.

At the other end of the health service is the treatment of older people. My particular concern relates to services based at St. George's hospital in the centre of my constituency. The Minister may be aware of some of the concerns about the future of St. George's hospital in Hornchurch that I highlighted on my website and during my 18-month-long campaign. The facility currently has about 177 in-patient beds, mainly for the rehabilitation of older people recovering from strokes and similar ailments. In spring 2004, the PCT published an outline business case setting out various options for the future of services at St. George's hospital. Its preferred option was simply to close the whole hospital site, with one or two small exceptions, and relocate all the facilities outside my constituency, at Harold Wood in the north of the London borough of Havering, because significant changes are taking place in the property estate of the NHS, with the opening of the new Oldchurch Park hospital in the neighbouring constituency of Romford. I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) has joined us in the Chamber this evening. A new hospital is opening there, with the result that certain other facilities are due to be closed or reused in some way.

The primary care trust saw that as an opportunity to review services, and to examine the care of elderly people living in the borough and how those services could be best provided. Its preferred option was to relocate those services to Harold Wood. That was due in part to the fact that around a third of the 117 beds that are currently at St. George's hospital are allocated to the Barking and Dagenham primary care trust—two thirds are allocated to the Havering primary care trust. The Barking and Dagenham primary care trust has indicated that it wishes to move its beds closer to its local community. As a consequence, 60 of the 117 beds in all likelihood are to be moved off the St. George's site. Therefore, the facilities at St. George's, and how services are to be provided from there, needed to be considered.

The problem was that all that seemed to be happening without sufficient local consultation. When I contacted local residents to find out what they thought about the way services would be provided and what was important to them, they emphasised heavily the need to retain health care facilities on the St. George's site.

Let us look at the demographics and the way the area is changing. The Thames gateway area is partly within the constituency itself in south Hornchurch and Rainham. There is the prospect of a lot of housing development in the southern part of the borough. It is important that we retain a significant health facility in the centre of the borough. The problem is that, if all the resources and facilities were relocated to the north of the borough, which was what the primary care trust suggested, effectively people's journey times on the transport links across the borough would increase.

I do not see that as the most sensible way to proceed. If one is looking to provide a service that is at the centre of things, at the heart of the borough and close to where people live, St. George's is the right site to examine, particularly when we consider the fact that we are talking about elderly patients who may have relatives living nearby. We need to ensure that they are able to see their relatives and that they are given the best chance to recover and to get back into the community, which is what we all want.

Since all this started, there have been a number of delays in deciding what the future of the services at St. George's would be. That inevitably prompted me to ask a written question to the Secretary of State for Health recently. I was somewhat disappointed that the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), gave me a rather anodyne reply. I asked whether the Secretary of State would make a statement on the future of St. George's hospital. The response was merely that that was "a matter for Havering primary care trust (PCT) as PCTs are responsible for commissioning services for the population that they serve."—[Official Report, 23 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 2121W.]

That is true, but it is a little disappointing that it took the Department a month to tell me that. Given that primary care trusts are effectively creatures of Government and report to strategic health authorities, which report to the Department of Health itself; given that, as I have highlighted during this debate, the Secretary of State is bringing considerable direct pressure to bear as regards primary care trusts; and given that the matter is a significant concern to constituents living in the area, I was somewhat disappointed with that response from the Department.

Whether this was a coincidence or not, however, within the past couple of weeks, the primary care trust and the strategic health authority have issued a joint press release basically saying that the decision on the future of the hospital has been delayed for another year, so there is continuing uncertainty as to the future of that site. The Minister may think that, from my perspective, that is all well and good because no decision has been taken to close the hospital, or to transfer services from the existing hospital site. However, I remain deeply concerned about the hospital's future. In the past fortnight, I have been told that bed numbers have reduced significantly and that some wards have closed. I assume that that is part of the reorganisation, with the withdrawal by Barking and Dagenham primary care trust of some of its beds from St. George's. From the feedback that I have received from some staff, it appears that that was not communicated to them as effectively as it might have been. Anecdotal evidence suggests that morale is currently low at St. George's and that there are fears of job losses.

There are also concerns about whether services are being scaled back even more. I said that two thirds of the 177 beds are allocated to Havering. That would reduce the number to approximately 117. However, it has been suggested that the number might decrease even further, to 90 beds. That makes the staff worried about what the future holds, especially given that the services at the day hospital appear to be reduced. That gives an impression—rightly or wrongly—that services are being scaled back slowly but surely. I am worried about that, and I would be angry if such scaling back were presented as a fait accompli and if, in six months, everybody told me, "Services have been scaled back; this isn't viable any more and we've got no choice but to close the hospital and reallocate resources"—to, for example, Harold Wood hospital, which was the PCT's preferred option.

There is also the problem of whether the site is being redesignated outside the green belt. Again, that gives the impression to the local community of a fixed agenda to close the hospital—whether now, in six months, 12 months or two years. I ask the Minister for an assurance that she will ensure that services are not run down and that the local community will not be presented with a fait accompli. I ask for a further assurance of proper engagement with the local community and proper consultation before any final decisions are made about services that are currently provided from the St. George's site.

I want to consider the future, especially the new Oldchurch Park hospital in Romford, which will act as the new acute hospital for the surrounding area. I greatly welcome the opening of the new, state-of-the-art facility and I look forward to that happening at the beginning of 2007. However, I am worried about whether it can cope with demand. The bed numbers at the new hospital will be fewer than the combination of those at the existing Oldchurch hospital and Harold Wood hospital, which the new Oldchurch Park is intended to replace. Although some additional flexibility has been built into the design so that it is possible to open a new ward if required, I emphasise that there will be fewer beds than in the two existing hospitals.

I appreciate that the plans are based on business and healthcare models that expect additional resources in the community. It is therefore argued that so many beds will not be needed because efficiencies in theatre use, better facilities and primary care mean that there will be sufficient space, beds, resources and facilities at the new Oldchurch Park hospital. I have listened to that argument, but I remain sceptical about it. Although various local improvement finance trust—LIFT—projects are being financed in the local community to put additional primary care resources in place, I remain worried that they will not go in early enough, given that the new Oldchurch Park hospital is due to open at the beginning of 2007. I am also concerned that patients' attitudes to the NHS and to the way in which they gain access to services will not be sufficiently changed to ensure that, when the wonderful, new, sparkling hospital opens in January 2007, it will not create additional demand and people will not view it as their gateway to the health service. That is particularly the case in areas such as Rainham and south Hornchurch, where access to GP services is not the best. Sometimes it can take longer to get access to a GP there, and they are very overstretched. I know that steps are being taken to address that problem, but it will take time. Looking at the services that will be offered by the new hospital will require a different mindset; there will need to be a step change in terms of how services are accessed. I am genuinely concerned that, when the new hospital opens, it will not be able to cope with the demands that are placed on it.

Theatre time is a key element in these arrangements, and it is extremely important that it should be used efficiently and effectively. I will continue to raise my concerns in this regard with the acute trust, to ensure that the necessary changes are implemented now, because they will need to be in place well before the new hospital opens. The new practices and approaches—the road testing, if I may use that term—must be well in place before the new hospital opens so that they are ingrained in the surgical teams, to ensure that the bookings and all the other arrangements run efficiently and effectively, and that we do not experience problems after the new Oldchurch Park hospital opens.

I prefaced these comments by welcoming the new hospital, but I am worried that the demand and the way in which services there will be handled will create additional pressure, when people see that it is there and seek to access health care at the site. However, I welcome its opening at the beginning of 2007. I also welcome the tireless hard work that so many health care professionals provide in Havering and in my constituency of Hornchurch. They work tirelessly to ensure that my constituents and those of my hon. Friends in Romford and Upminster receive a high quality of care. However, I am worried that they are not being given the correct support, motivation or direction to ensure that they feel motivated and positive about the services that they provide. I am sure that the Minister will tell us the amount of resources that have been put into the local and national health service, but given the issues about access to health care that I have mentioned, I am worried that those resources are not getting to the front line to ensure that those issues are dealt with effectively and that all patients get the quality and standard of care that they expect and deserve.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): I am grateful for the opportunity to share this debate with the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), and I congratulate him on securing it. This is clearly a matter of great concern to him and to his constituents. I am grateful to him for advertising the detail of his speech on his website; that was a great help in preparing my response. I also compliment him on the depth of knowledge that he has displayed, and on the coherent and cogent way in which he has advanced his case. I am sure that that will not have been lost on his Whips, and that they will draw it to the attention of whoever wins the Conservative leadership contest. I am sure that he has a bright future here. It particularly gives pause to a Minister to hear someone who clearly understands the nature of the challenges that the health service faces in their area.

I give credit to the hon. Gentleman for—and join him in—paying tribute to all the staff in the local health service in Havering, whose hard work and commitment are delivering improvements to the local health service, notwithstanding the challenges that the hon. Gentleman has described. It is because we believe that local people are best placed to take decisions on the shape of local health services that we have now devolved more than 80 per cent. of the health service budget to the front line, for decisions to be taken at primary care trust level. As a direct result of that, the hon. Gentleman's local primary care trust will benefit.

The hon. Gentleman is right. It is incumbent on me to remind the House and the public of the investment that the health service has received. His PCT will receive £303 million in 2006–07 and £331 million in 2007–08. That represents a cash increase of £52.6 million, or 18.9 per cent., over the next two years. Those resources should deliver significant benefits to the local population.

Only last week we announced a further £2.6 million for choice and control pilot projects, of which there will be 13 in England. One will be run by the London borough of Barking and Dagenham council, and another by Essex county council. Those pilot schemes will enable older and disabled people across England to receive, as part of an innovative programme, a virtual money box, which will allow them to take control of their own social care budgets to manage their support and to choose the services that suit them best. It will help them to lead the lives that they want.

I am particularly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to discuss certain subjects, such as mental health services. I take a close interest in mental health, although it is not part of my portfolio. Let me deal, however, with the local issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, particularly mental health services but also podiatry services and antenatal classes for expectant mums and dads in his constituency.

Havering PCT's planned investment in mental health services delivered by the North East London Mental Health trust has increased from £14.9 million in 2002–03 to just over £16.5 million in 2004–05. The trust now has—is to be applauded for it—six crisis resolution teams with 55 staff, compared with the single team that it had in September 2001 with only 12 staff. It also has four assertive outreach teams with 41 staff. I should add that since 1997, North East London strategic health authority has been given over 3,267 more nurses, 445 more consultants, 385 more doctors in training, 121 more GPs, 1,882 more health care assistants and 174 more qualified midwives.

The hon. Gentleman was careful not to say that nothing was going well, although he rightly highlighted areas of concern. He mentioned the £245 million new hospital. I am sorry that I could not attend the celebration earlier in the month, but I hope to rearrange that. An extra £410,000 has been invested in primary care mental health services in the 2004–05 financial year. Much good work is being done, and a great deal of real, serious financial investment is leading to real improvements in local services.

Before I talk about podiatry, I should deal with the hon. Gentleman's questions about the Duchess of Kent day hospital, which relate specifically to the mental health problems he described. I was interested to hear his description of the break in service that he believes some of his constituents will experience. Havering PCT decided to close the unit following the expansion of primary care-based services, which resulted in an increasingly limited range of services being offered at the day hospital. Before the closure, a formal meeting was hosted by the borough director and the therapy service manager in June 2005. Approximately 20 service users attended, so there was prior consultation. I will look into the hon. Gentleman's points about the lack of formal consultation, but care was clearly taken to ensure that service users were advised of the changes that would take place. They were given an opportunity to discuss their concerns and raise questions with clinical staff and others, who were also given the chance to discuss their concerns although they could not attend the meeting. When the unit closed, the majority of service users had completed their therapy. A very small number of service users—only six, I understand—were referred for additional therapeutic work elsewhere. I will examine all the issues that he has raised, but I wanted to reassure myself about that point.

With regard to podiatry services, I want to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the rationale for changes to those services was based on clinical need—I accept that he does not quarrel with that—to ensure that those patients who had medical conditions that placed their lower limbs at risk, such as diabetes mellitus, peripheral vascular disease, and rheumatoid arthritis, and who were in the greatest need had access to services to improve their quality of life. I listened carefully to his representations with regard to his constituent, and he might want to write to me following the debate with the details of the case that he has in mind, and I will look into it further. He is right, however, that the PCT has sought to prioritise the way in which it uses its resources and has made those decisions. I will not offer to second-guess the decisions that the PCT has made. It is rightly charged with the responsibility of making those decisions.

On the issue of parentcraft classes, he is right that it is a scary time for parents-to-be. The London strategic health authority cabinet has commissioned a review of maternity services across the whole of London, in direct response to the increase in births in the capital in recent years. That rise is expected to continue, which is the reverse of the national and international trend. Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust maternity services, the main provider of maternity care for women living in the three boroughs, has developed initiatives to improve midwifery services. Those initiatives include the home birth support team, which has seen home births increase from 1 to 3 per cent. in the past year, and the small team of midwives focusing on the special needs of teenagers in Barking and Dagenham, which has the highest level of teenage pregnancies. I was delighted to learn that the trust won "Nurse of the Year" for that innovative service, which is in fact being driven by young mothers in the area. Midwifery-led care has been introduced for a proportion of low-risk women who are cared for solely by midwives and not consultants, who are obviously carefully selected in line with the national service framework. That is an innovative development in delivering maternity services locally. In line with the reshaping of maternity services, we expect the report from strategic health authorities in London early in the new year.

A final new initiative was the realigning of the current skill mix for support workers in maternity services and training them to support women, both at home and in hospital, in relation to breastfeeding. Barking, Havering and Redbridge hospital is part of the Department of Health pilot for that. That does not address his specific concern about the loss of parentcraft classes, but it demonstrates the way in which the PCT has been realigning the resources that it has available in line with the priorities that it has determined locally.

James Brokenshire: I hear what the Minister has said, but will she accept the importance of parentcraft and antenatal classes in preparing parents for the birth of their children? To return to podiatry services, does she acknowledge that some users will clearly no longer be able to access the service and the fact that that might have an impact on them?

Jane Kennedy: I am happy to acknowledge that when local decisions of that nature are taken, clearly, some patients will not be able to access services that would previously have been available to them. The hon. Gentleman is right about that. Parentcraft classes are an important way, particularly for new parents and those who have not gone through the process—when people have done it once, they are old hands—to reassure parents-to-be, who can be very anxious. Those decisions have been weighed in the balance by the local PCT.

The hon. Gentleman raised concerns that Suttons House is to be closed, and referred to discussion about St. George's hospital. I want to assure him and his constituents that I am advised that there are no current plans to close the older people's day hospital at Suttons House. I can tell him categorically that there are no secret plans in the Department of Health. I am not advised that there are any secret plans anywhere. Clearly there will be a consultation process.

I also note the hon. Gentleman's optimism following the North East London strategic health authority and Havering PCT's recent decision that further work was required on the re-provision of services currently being provided from St George's. The press release said that the PCT and the SHA believed that there was a need to further develop the overall strategic context within the local health economy.

The SHA and the PCT also wish to see what impact the anticipated White Paper on care outside hospital and changes arising from "Commissioning a Patient-Led NHS" will have for their local health service and therefore they feel now is not the time to make such a major decision on the way services are provided for this vulnerable group.

James Brokenshire: The Minister was careful to mention only Suttons House day hospital, which is only a small part of the services provided at St. George's hospital. Could she clarify those words, given that this is an important issue?

Jane Kennedy: I was just about to come to that point. I am anxious to get him home so that he can get a good night's sleep in order to share his daughter's birthday, for which I wish her many happy returns.

The decision not to continue, for the time being, with the proposed changes at St. George's hospital does not mean that the PCT will not continue to develop its strategy for older people. In fact, it means quite the opposite. I am advised by officials that the SHA and the PCT will continue to develop the strategy and refine their model of care, working in partnership with the local authority to ensure that the quality of service it provides to older people continues to improve. I will look to be kept informed on the issue.

I have listened to and appreciated the comments made about mental health services, podiatry services and antenatal classes. I am always happy to hear hon. Members represent the views of their constituents, which helps to keep Ministers informed as to how the policies we develop in Whitehall are carried out on the ground. However, as I have mentioned, decisions about the configuration of local services now rest with the NHS locally. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's comments will have registered with local decision makers.

I would urge the hon. Gentleman to continue to work with his local strategic health authority and primary care trust to ensure that his views and those of his constituents are taken into consideration for any changes to services in his community.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

EU Budgetary Reform

1. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): What discussions he has had with his EU counterparts about the prospects of reforming the EU budget. [32388]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): Many.

Mr. Swayne: I am tempted to ask "Why?" The Secretary of State has told us that reform of the budget is predicated on reform of the common agricultural policy. What proposals for the reform of the CAP have the Government put on the table during their presidency? Has the Agriculture Council even met during the British presidency?

Mr. Straw: I am very happy for the hon. Gentleman to ask me why; that is the purpose of the House. The reason we have had many discussions on the European Union budget is that there is an awful lot to discuss, and even more to explain to some of our European counterparts about how, to take an example at random, the United Kingdom has historically been paid significantly more than France over many years, notwithstanding the abatement that was secured in 1984—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): By Mrs. Thatcher.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman—

Mr. Forth: Right honourable.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Member for fancy ties reminds us that the abatement was secured by Mrs. Thatcher. That is true, although in the debate that took place thereafter, in which I took part, that deal was treated with some scepticism—

Mr. Forth: Not by me.

Mr. Straw: No, by me. And I was right, because, as we predicted at the time, the deal failed to ensure any long-term reform of the common agricultural policy or of the EU's budget. Twenty years on, it has been left to the Labour Government of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to secure that reform.

Interim agricultural reforms have been secured, above all, through the efforts of the United Kingdom, although perhaps the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) has not noticed. Thanks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs we have for the first time achieved significant—36 per cent.—cuts in sugar subsidies, which is a major achievement for the British presidency.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): The cuts in sugar subsidies represent an important step forward in agricultural reform, but will my right hon. Friend ensure that the new arrangements do not disadvantage our traditional allies in the Caribbean? Will he also ensure that sufficient money is put aside for the right transitional arrangements for them?

Mr. Straw: I share my hon. Friend's great concern about the inadvertent but none the less powerful impact of the changes in sugar subsidies, which could affect many of the Cotonou countries—the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries. I discussed this issue with a delegation from the ACP countries at the United Nations General Assembly in September, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister discussed it with Commonwealth ACP countries at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting. We have been pushing the European Union for cushioning support, with a two-year phase-in. So far, there has been a proposal, which has still to be agreed, for €40 million for 2006. We are pushing the European Union to increase that and to ensure that there is sufficient provision in the 2007–13 budgets, which have yet to be agreed, for the ACP countries.

Mr. Forth: Ugly rumours are circulating that the Prime Minister is prepared to give away Lady Thatcher's rebate in return for some vague promise or undertaking on CAP reform. Will the Secretary of State give the House an absolute assurance now that there is no question of our rebate being given away without the absolute certainty now of substantive CAP reform?

Mr. Straw: I thought that Ugly Rumours was a band with which the Prime Minister was associated. I am happy to say that I have never heard any of its tracks—

Mr. Forth: Let's keep it that way.

Mr. Straw: Indeed.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 20 June, as on many other occasions, that the rebate was an anomaly, but an anomaly that was justified by a much bigger anomaly, namely the distorted spending of the common agricultural policy. Yes, we are ready to discuss the removal of that anomaly, but only in the context of significant reform of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): Workers at the Nestlé chocolate factory in my constituency very much welcome the proposed changes to the sugar regime. They would have welcomed them even more had they gone a bit further. On the general question of the contributions, does my right hon. Friend agree that the question of who pays how much should be resolved among the richer countries of the European Union, and that the interests of the accession countries should be protected?

Mr. Straw: On the sugar subsidy, we would always like these things to go further, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his generosity. This was a significant deal, and it was achieved only as a result of the work of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

I agree with my hon. Friend's second point. Let me make it clear, however, that whatever deal is agreed, the United Kingdom will pay a fair contribution towards the cost of enlargement. That is our duty and responsibility, which all parties have agreed. All parties in the House have supported enlargement. All the E15 wealthier member states must make fair contributions towards the cost of enlargement. That is a separate issue—although it is bound to mean that our contributions will rise— from whether or not we get rid of the rebate in return for reform of the CAP.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): President Chirac is reported as saying that a deal on the EU budget is being impeded by the power struggle between the Chancellor and the Prime Minister. The former Minister for Europe, the right hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), warns Ministers in The Daily Telegraph today that he will not accept a one-sided deal that only moves on the rebate. Would not it help the Foreign Secretary to present a clear, united position if he were now to come clean, publish the Government's budget proposal and give absolute guarantees, first, that the whole rebate will be kept until there is fundamental CAP reform—delivered and not just promised—and, secondly, that no budget will be agreed that costs the British taxpayer more, not less? Does he agree that the worst of all worlds would be for Britain to give way on our rebate with no guarantee of real CAP reform?

Mr. Straw: Our—[Interruption.] There is a lot of chitchat among Conservative Members as they try to work out their policy. Our position on the rebate has been made clear, and I spelt it out again today. I intend to publish proposals to our EU colleagues—which, of course, will also be made available to the House—at the beginning of next week, for what has been delicately described as a conclave of European Foreign Ministers, which will take place tomorrow week.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that the majority of countries with which he must deal on this matter, and particularly the agri-protectionist countries, are governed by parties of the centre right, sister parties of the Conservative party? Is not it a real worry for Britain's future standing in Europe that the incoming leader of the Conservative party has said that he wants to break all political links with conservative parties in Europe? Is not it a fact that it is betraying British interests to uphold its anti-Europe—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is totally out of order.

Israel

2. Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): If he will make a statement on the situation in Israel. [32389]

3. Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the Palestinian Authority about the peace process in the middle east. [32390]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I am sorry that the previous question was out of order, Mr. Speaker, as I had a very good answer, but I am not challenging your decisions.

I had discussions yesterday in Barcelona with Ehud Olmert, Vice Prime Minister of Israel, and Mahmoud Abbas, President of the Palestinian Authority, about the middle east. Although, of course, many difficulties remain to be overcome, I am more hopeful about the prospects for a lasting peace between Israel and the Palestinians than I have been at any time in the past four and a half years. The withdrawal of the Israeli defence force from Gaza, and from some settlements in the northern west bank, was a hugely significant first step towards the creation of a separate and viable state of Palestine alongside a secure state of Israel, as was the opening of the border at Rafah between Gaza and Egypt, where the European Union is providing international monitors.

I have often commended Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his courage in setting those events in train. I should like to do so again. He has now broken from the Likud party to form a new party, Kadima, which stands for "forward". A general election in Israel is due on 28 March.

Mrs. Villiers: The Secretary of State has acknowledged clearly that Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza strip and parts of the northern west bank is a major step towards a peace settlement and completion of the road map for that peace settlement. In the light of Israel's significant step and concession, will the Secretary of State guarantee to the House today that he will redouble his efforts to ask the Palestinian Authority to live up to its obligations under the road map, and to do everything it can to cease the attacks against Israel and its citizens by too many terrorist groups?

Mr. Straw: I have already placed on record my commendation of President Sharon, and I am glad that the hon. Lady agrees with it.

We must return to the road map as quickly as possible. The withdrawal from Gaza was a major first step, but there is much more to do. All sides have obligations that must be met. Under the excellent leadership of President Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority is making significant moves forward. It is getting a grip on its security forces, although it needs to do more. Self-evidently, no attacks were perpetrated by the Palestinian Authority on Israelis, including Israeli citizens. Some rejectionist terrorist groups are still operating from within the occupied territories and from across the northern border, and we look to the Palestinian Authority to continue its efforts to control those organisations.

Mr. Jenkins: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer, but he knows that no one can compromise from a position of weakness. We recognise the brave leadership that Ariel Sharon has given to Israel. Does my right hon. Friend recognise that it is incumbent on all parties in the region to leave their entrenched positions if we are to achieve a peace that the international community can support?

Mr. Straw: I do recognise that. Following a period during which everyone was digging into preordained or preconceived positions, there has been a dramatic change in the politics of both the Palestinian Authority and Israel over the past 12 or 13 months. The position now taken by Prime Minister Sharon and members of his breakaway party—including Ehud Olmert, whom I met again yesterday—has moved significantly from the position that the Israelis were taking four years ago at the height of the armed intifada. The Palestinian Authority is also moving. I believe that gradually both sides have recognised that the only future for Palestinians and Israelis lies in peace and in two states.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): What will the British Government do to prevent the illegal encirclement of Jerusalem from continuing?

Mr. Straw: We continue to make strong representations both directly to the Israeli Government—I keep doing that—and to the Government of the United States, the Government with the most influence in the world over the Israeli Government.

The sooner we reach final-status negotiations, the easier it will be to resolve the issue of the wall. The Israelis say that they are ready to shift the wall, as they shifted an earlier line of control in the Lebanon, as soon as there is political agreement on the borders between the new state of Palestine and the state of Israel. Those issues are to be resolved in the final status negotiations. My reply to the Israelis is that while in one sense shifting a wall is straightforward, it would be profoundly objectionable for settlements to be built within the wall to pre-empt any shifting of it later.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will know, there will be elections for the Palestinian Authority on 25 January. Does he agree that it will be impossible for the elections to be seen to be free and fair while more than 600 road blocks are operating in the west bank—an area the size of East Anglia—and that it is essential for everything possible to be done to allow the elections to take place freely? Otherwise, only the terrorists and those who oppose the peace process will benefit.

Mr. Straw: I accept that the election operation will become very difficult while the road blocks are there. That is a responsibility of the Government of Israel, but it is also a responsibility of the Palestinian Authority's security personnel and of the rejectionist terrorist organisations, which are subject to sophisticated political control from outside Israel. We look to all three parties to take steps to ensure that the elections can take place in reasonable order. The matter will be discussed at the ministerial level of the Quartet, which will meet in the second week of December.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Is not the key to further progress towards peace, and removal of the wall and the road blocks, further progress on the question of security for the Israelis themselves, so that moderate leadership in Israel can be supported? In view of what he said about rejectionist elements—including Hezbollah, which during the peace process has launched rocket attacks on northern Israel—will the Foreign Secretary do all that he can to bring international pressure to bear on rejectionists and the states that have supported and encouraged them, including Iran, whose leader has made such reckless remarks?

Mr. Straw: I share the views expressed by the hon. Gentleman. Putting pressure on Iran, but also on Syria, which hosts Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas, is extremely important. That is the subject both of our private representations to the Government of Syria and of very public condemnation, which I issued during the debate in the Security Council three weeks ago in respect of the Syrian Security Council resolution.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): My right hon. Friend referred to the encirclement of Jerusalem by the wall. Does he agree that the increasing destruction of Palestinian homes in and around Jerusalem is also a matter of concern, and that the international community needs to resist the "de-Arabisation" of east Jerusalem? Will he make urgent representations to the Israelis about that, and take up the suggestion of the EU heads of mission that we should press for the reopening of Palestinian institutions inside east Jerusalem, such as the chamber of commerce?

Mr. Straw: I accept what my hon. Friend says, and its implication—that if east Jerusalem were detached from the rest of the west bank, a functioning state of Palestine would be nigh on impossible to operate. That would be wholly unacceptable to the international community, as it would be to the Palestinians. We have made very strong representations to the Israelis—particularly about not encircling east Jerusalem and not continuing to build what is known as the E1 area, north-east of east Jerusalem—and we shall continue to do so. The suggestion by the EU heads of mission is an interesting one, which Ministers will consider within the EU General Affairs Council.

European Constitution

4. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of the European constitution. [32391]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Following the rejection of the treaty in the French and Dutch referendums, the June European Council agreed unanimously on the need for a period for reflection to consider the right way forward for Europe. The position remains that the Council will return to the issue of the draft constitutional treaty at the June Council in 2006.

James Duddridge: What discussions has the Minister had with his counterparts in Germany, given that Chancellor Merkel has said that she wants to press ahead with the constitution, but the British public clearly do not want it?

Mr. Alexander: The Prime Minister has now met the incoming Chancellor of Germany, but it is to state the obvious to say that it is ultimately for the Germans to reach a decision on the ratification of the draft constitutional treaty on behalf of the German people, just as it is the perfect entitlement of the British Government, and ultimately the British Parliament, to reach a judgment on the right response of the United Kingdom to the decisive rejection of that treaty last spring by the French and the Dutch.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Clearly a period of reflection is in the interests of the whole of the European Union. However, there are elements of the constitution that match Britain's reform agenda. Is my right hon. Friend confident that during our presidency we have achieved what we set out to achieve in connection with reforming the structure of the EU? Will he assure the House that if we do not get those agreements by the end of the presidency, he and the Foreign Secretary will pursue this agenda until the EU is made more efficient and effective, irrespective of what happens to the constitution?

Mr. Alexander: My hon. Friend's question contains a number of points. First, the judgment that the British Government reached, in the light of the decisive rejection in France and the Netherlands, was that the best use of the time during the British presidency was to engage in a broader conversation about the future of Europe. That explains the agenda that we set for the Hampton Court meeting in October in relation to specific future reforms of the European Union. Of course we have made substantive reforms in policy areas—for example, on the sugar regime, as was mentioned earlier—but in the coming six months further reflection is needed on the correct way forward, not least given the disparate range of opinions now being expressed in Europe on the future of the constitutional treaty.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Will the Minister confirm that existing treaties and EU rules remain in force, including guarantees on the rule of law, democracy and human rights? What is the UK presidency doing to clarify the serious allegations about detention camps and rendition flights, which are surely against all decent standards?

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has, on behalf of the European Union, written to the United States Secretary of State on exactly that matter.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that, rather than concentrate on what people might view as abstract issues of constitutional detail, there should be an emphasis on bringing home to the British people the benefits of EU membership?

Mr. Alexander: I certainly agree that people in both France and the Netherlands were voting on the text, and we need to respect the judgment that they reached. The broader context of how Europe can meet the challenges of globalisation explains the broader conversation in which European leaders engaged when they met at Hampton Court in October.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): As the EU presses on with the defence agency, criminal law code and the strengthening of foreign policy in many other crucial elements of the constitution, should not the Prime Minister keep his word to this House and the British people by holding a referendum in this country before the constitution returns to the EU agenda next year? The promise was unequivocal: we were told that we would have a referendum irrespective of what other countries did.

Mr. Alexander: That was a worthy attempt, but the position of the British Government has been set out several times in the House and elsewhere. The draft constitutional treaty would be ratified by means of a referendum in the United Kingdom, but the right hon. Gentleman is right to recognise that there needs to be a legal basis for decisions taken by the European Commission and, indeed, by the other institutions of the EU. That continues to be the case, notwithstanding the period of reflection for the constitutional treaty.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Given the reality that the constitution is as dead as the Monty Python parrot, would it not be better for Britain to propose a more sensible alternative: the idea that, in future, Europe should be an association of independent, democratic states responsible for their own internal affairs—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—co-operating only where there is mutual benefit to be gained?

Mr. Alexander: I think that the cheers of Conservative Members reflect the candour with which my hon. Friend has revealed his true agenda, which underlies so many of the questions that he asks—not only in Foreign Office questions but in wider debates on the issue. It is, however, continually the case and remains the case that the draft constitutional treaty was agreed by 25 member states, so it is not the role of any one member state to declare it dead. That explains the unanimous decision that was reached back in June, which will be the basis of further conversations in the European Council next spring.

World Trade

5. Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): If he will make a statement on the EU's role in the Doha round of world trade talks. [32392]

7. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with EU partners regarding the World Trade Organisation talks in Hong Kong. [32394]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): The Doha round provides an opportunity to tackle some of the most fundamental injustices at the heart of world trade. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary chaired EU Foreign Ministers' discussions on the trade talks earlier this month. During our EU presidency, we have consistently made clear our ambition for a successful and balanced outcome to that round.

Mr. Harper: This year, the common agricultural policy will cost about £33 billion—equivalent to the gross domestic product of Ethiopia. Given that the Doha round talks are designed to liberalise trade and drive forward the millennium development goals and development more generally, does the Minister believe that the CAP should survive the World Trade Organisation talks in December?

Mr. Alexander: We have consistently made it clear that we want a fixed date to be set for the removal of export subsidies—one of the central elements of the CAP. I am glad to say that other countries, including the United States, have joined us in setting a time scale that they would like to be agreed at Hong Kong during this round. It is important to recognise that agriculture should not crowd out the other elements of a necessary agreement in Hong Kong—whether that means non-agricultural market access or the issue of services. A great deal of potential benefit not just for Britain but for the whole of Europe will follow from a successful conclusion to this round.

Chris Mole: Recent media reports have speculated pessimistically about the outcome in Hong Kong. Does the Minister share that pessimistic view?

Mr. Alexander: It is correct to acknowledge that recent expectations, not least as a result of the comments of the new secretary-general of the World Trade Organisation, Pascal Lamy, have begun to be lowered ahead of the critical meeting in Hong Kong next month. The British Government's position, during our presidency of the EU, has consistently been to argue for the continuing need for an ambitious and balanced outcome. That remains the Government's position.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): The EU Commissioner responsible for the trade negotiations in Doha is prepared to advocate reductions of 40 per cent. in some import tariffs, despite the fact that certain products—beef from Brazil, for example—cause considerable environmental damage and exploit labour. Will the Minister assure me that he will intervene and ensure that the reductions will not take place until those products are made without the abuse of environmental damage?

Mr. Alexander: From the question, I am not entirely sure towards which products the hon. Gentleman directs his concern. There has been an offer forthcoming from the Trade Commissioner, and the European Union now looks particularly to Brazil, and also to India, to match the offers that it has made, in order to regain some of the momentum that was apparent in the early autumn but that appears to have been lost in recent weeks.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Where does the UK stand, in respect of the EU's negotiating position, on deregulation of services? In particular, what is our position on the potentially damaging impact of a prescribed list of services that must be privatised by developing countries?

Mr. Alexander: Britain will not only be represented by Cabinet Ministers in Hong Kong, but will speak with the collective voice of the 24 other members of the European Union, and will be represented collectively at the world trade talks by the European Commission. That is right, because given the challenges that we face from countries such as Brazil, India and—not least—the United States, it is better to speak with the collective strength of 24 other members of the EU to maximise our influence. There are discussions at the moment on the issue of services and non-agricultural market access. I will ensure that my hon. Friend's representations are directed to the Department of Trade and Industry and that a reply is forthcoming.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that Benin, Burkina Faso, Mali and Chad depend on cotton for between 30 and 40 per cent. of their export earnings, will the Minister undertake to work with the EU as a bloc to exert remorseless pressure on the United States to end its obscene $3 billion annual subsidy to 25,000 large-scale and inefficient cotton manufacturers and stop dumping that produce on those four countries? That policy is morally wrong, economically counter-productive and serves to exacerbate the plight of some of the most destitute people on the planet.

Mr. Alexander: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are pressing the United States on that issue, but his very specific points also make a general point. All of us who are genuinely concerned for the interests of developing countries—I certainly count the hon. Gentleman in that group—have an interest in seeing the multilateral talks succeed. The experience after Cancun was not that it led to a radically better deal being offered to such countries as he mentioned. In fact, it led to the US signing bilateral trade deals, with great imbalances in negotiating strength represented within those individual bilateral discussions. If we want to avoid a rash of bilateral deals that are disadvantageous to the interests of developing countries, all of us—and certainly the British Government—have an interest in ensuring a successful outcome to the Hong Kong meetings.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments about the reduction in export subsidies from the EU, but will he stress—not only with the EU, but with other countries—that the huge potential benefits to be gained from the cancellation of world debt for developing countries could be undermined unless the developed world recognises the need to reduce export subsidies that undermine the economies of those countries?

Mr. Alexander: I take my hon. Friend's point. We have always seen 2005 as the opportunity to align the progress that was made in June, when European Ministers agreed effectively to double bilateral overseas development assistance from the European Union, with the decisions reached by Finance Ministers—confirmed at Gleneagles in July—on the significant multilateral debt relief that my hon. Friend mentions. The third element of the trinity was the need to try to make real progress in Hong Kong. All of us recognise that if we have the right outcome in Hong Kong and when the round is concluded, it will offer the opportunity not only for more jobs and prosperity in the European Union but will be fairer for the developing world.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The UK has enjoyed traditional trading links over many years with Commonwealth countries, as the EU has with the ACP countries. In particular, sugar and bananas have had a great role to play in the Caribbean. What future will there be for those products and, in particular, for the Caribbean countries that export to the EU and to the rest of the world after the Hong Kong round?

Mr. Alexander: A range of issues are related to the hon. Lady's question. First, on sugar, fundamental reform was agreed last week, thanks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. There is ongoing consideration as to what level of support can be provided directly during a longer transitional period than was initially envisaged.

Secondly, there is the issue of economic partnership agreements. Before the European presidency, the British Government set out a position that, I am glad to say, has found favour not just with NGOs in the United Kingdom but with other countries that are affected by changes such as those of which the hon. Lady speaks; but we need to continue to work, as the British Government, during the British presidency to make these cases to our European partners. That is why, when my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary chaired a meeting on trade talks, I took the opportunity to make the case to other European partners that if we got this round right there would be an opportunity to be both pro-jobs in Europe and pro-poor in the world—and that, particularly in relation to the sugar and banana regimes, a successful outcome would provide considerable gains not just to those individual countries but to us all.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): Given the Government's laudable commitment to millennium development goal 8, does my right hon. Friend agree that the issue of trade far transcends even crucial matters such as aid and debt; that the European Union can indeed exercise a substantial role, coupled with the United States; and that, on these matters, transparency would indeed be welcome?

Mr. Alexander: My right hon. Friend makes an important point. It is hard to overstate the contribution that trade can make to the fulfilment not just of the millennium development goals but of those countries' potential. That point was driven home to me recently when I was reading speeches made by President John F. Kennedy during his term in office in the United States, when he spoke at the beginning of one trade round of the potential of helping developing countries such as Japan. If one looks around the world, one realises that it is hard to find an example of a country that has managed to lift its population out of poverty other than by having an open trading system. That is why we regard Hong Kong as having the potential to take forward the work that we have begun during 2005, but I fully accept the point that my right hon. Friend makes that it is a vital and very significant element in that trinity of increased development assistance, reduced debt payments from developing countries, and, of course, the fairer trade system that I know he favours.

St. Helena

6. Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): If he will make a statement on his policy in respect of St. Helena. [32393]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): The Government are firmly committed to the defence and security of St. Helena; and to working closely with its Government to ensure the highest standards of probity, law and order and good governance of the island. We want to see St. Helena develop socially, economically and in a sustainable way, to bring lasting benefit to the island while protecting the environment.

Norman Baker: The Minister will be aware that St. Helena has a unique environment—indeed, Charles Darwin referred to the "unique flora" on the island—and that therefore the proposal to build an airport is highly controversial on the island. Does he agree that before any airport is built there should be a full environmental impact assessment, which should conclude that the flora and fauna of the island will be properly protected? If so, can he explain why Clive Warren, the Department for International Development's head of overseas territories, told a public meeting in St. Helena on 26 April that "the airport will happen, come what may"?

Is that the Government's position?

Ian Pearson: I assure the hon. Gentleman that there will be a full and rigorous environmental impact assessment. That is ongoing and there has been extensive public consultation as a result of the inquiry.

We are not rushing headlong into anything. The first environmental analysis of airport options was carried out in 1999, and further environmental scoping studies were conducted in 2001 and 2004. We want to ensure that we can bring an airport to the island, but we want to do it in a sustainable way that does not damage the environment, and we shall continue to press forward with that objective in mind.

Middle East

8. Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the threat to peace and stability in the middle east region posed by Hezbollah. [32395]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): Hezbollah's stated aim of the elimination of the state of Israel is totally unacceptable, as are Hezbollah's military and terrorist activities, particularly along the blue line, in the occupied territories and in Iraq. We call on Hezbollah to contribute to peace and security in the middle east by renouncing violence, disarming in compliance with UN Security Council resolution 1559, and entering into the democratic process on an exclusively non-violent basis.

Mr. Wright: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the actions of Hezbollah, which attacked the Sheba'a farms in northern Israel last week, precipitating some of the worst violence on the border since Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon in 2000? I welcome the fact that Hezbollah is on the UK's proscribed terrorist list, but it is not on the EU's list. In the remaining weeks of the British presidency of the EU, will my right hon. Friend work to rectify that?

Mr. Straw: I do, and I have, condemned the attack by Hezbollah on the Sheba'a farms. I just point out that the Sheba'a farms are in Syria. They are not in Israel; nor are they, as Hezbollah claims, in Lebanon. They are unquestionably in Syria.

On the second point that my hon. Friend makes, we in the United Kingdom—I did this as Home Secretary—have proscribed, banned, the military wings of Hezbollah. We have not banned the whole organisation—the political wing. Discussions inside the EU continue about a wider ban, although I frankly do not anticipate that there will be any change on that by the end of our presidency.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): What distinction does the Foreign Secretary draw between Hezbollah and Hamas?

Mr. Straw: As the hon. Gentleman knows, they are two distinct organisations. Hezbollah is partly a terrorist organisation, and it is partly operating within Lebanese law, as a legitimate political party in Lebanon. It has one Minister in the Lebanese Cabinet and another Minister is associated with Hezbollah. In that respect, they are different. In other respects, they are similar: they are rejectionist terrorist organisations and the way in which they operate in the occupied territories and against Israel is very similar. Those who have been the victims of terrorism would not notice the difference if they had been killed or injured as a result of that violence. That is why we call on both those organisations and on Islamic Jihad to stop their terrorist activity. We also call on the state of Syria to take action to prevent those organisations from operating, as they do, in its territory.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): The Israelis are currently rehousing 1,000 settlers every month in the west bank—11,000 so far this year alone—which is greater than the number of settlers withdrawn from Gaza. Surely is that not also a threat to bringing peace between the two sides in the middle east?

Mr. Straw: We constantly make representations to the Government of Israel about their settlement policy, particularly where the settlements are on Palestinian land, and about the way in which some of the settlement activity is, in our view, intended to make unalterable facts on the ground and thereby restrict the opportunities available in final-status talks. That said, the quicker both parties get back to the road map and the current, more hopeful environment is pursued, the better it will be for Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The Foreign Secretary, Foreign Office Ministers and Foreign Office officials have pointed out to the British public that sophisticated munitions, probably supplied from Iran, have gone into southern Iraq thanks to Hezbollah and have caused death and injury to British troops. The Foreign Secretary has rightly, in a broad sense, condemned Hezbollah. He has obviously outlined that there are limits, perhaps outside the UK, on what the British Government can do, but the British public would be surprised to think that the political wing of Hezbollah is allowed to function in London, given the facts that the Foreign Secretary and his officials have produced. What practical measures does he intend to take against the political wing of Hezbollah?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman said, overall. However, all organisations operating in the United Kingdom must do so within the law. Some organisations, including those that he mentioned, are kept under close scrutiny by law enforcement agencies. If there is any evidence that they are transgressing and they thus become candidates for proscription under the Terrorism Act 2000, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary examines that evidence with great care. These are not just the usual warm words, because the matter is kept under continuous review.

Iran

9. Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): When he last met his EU counterparts to discuss Iran's nuclear programme. [32396]

12. Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): What discussions are taking place between the E3 and Iran concerning nuclear facilities. [32399]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): European Union Foreign Ministers and their senior officials are in close and continuous touch on the issue of Iran. I spoke to Iranian Foreign Minister Manuchehr Mottaki last Tuesday—22 November. The issue was discussed at the EU General Affairs Council on Monday 21 November and at the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors on Thursday last.

Mr. Hamilton: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. Today, in a committee room at the CBI, the Prime Minister indicated that the possible expansion of nuclear power would be part of the review of Britain's energy requirements. What gives us the right to say that we can expand our nuclear energy, but at the same time tell other countries that they cannot have it?

Mr. Straw: I am glad that my hon. Friend asks that question because it highlights a popular misconception. Under article IV of the non-proliferation treaty, we are fully entitled to develop nuclear power, and so are the Government of Iran—we give them every support in doing so. However, under article II of the treaty, Iran, as a non-nuclear weapon state, which it has voluntarily declared that it is, has no rights whatever to use its nuclear power technology to develop nuclear weapons. It is on the latter point that the whole of the international attention is focused.

Dr. Starkey: To continue that point, will the Foreign Secretary explain what efforts are being made to involve Russia, China and India in those discussions with Iran, given that those three powers have strong interests in obtaining fuel from Iran and a common interest with us in not permitting Iran to become a nuclear military state?

Mr. Straw: I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend that there has been increasing co-operation in recent months with India, Russia and China in respect of the Iran dossier before the IAEA board of governors. India helpfully voted with the E3 in the board of governors on 24 September, which meant that there was a significant majority, rather than a bare majority, when Iran was declared as non-compliant with its safeguards agreement under the non-proliferation treaty. We have been involved in intensive discussions with the Russian and Chinese Governments—at Head of State and Government level, as well as Foreign Minister and senior official level—and I believe that they are likely to bear significant fruit.

One of my concerns during the long-running saga inside the board of governors with my French and German colleagues on the Iran dossier has been to try to maintain effective international cohesion and solidarity, because that is the surest way in which we can bear down on those in Iran who are trying to use the nuclear power programme to develop nuclear weapons. If we are divided, we will end up in a position in which there are far too many opportunities for those in Iran to exploit the situation. That is why we work with such care. If and when we need to take tough decisions in the IAEA board of governors, I hope that India, China and Russia will actively support us.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): Available evidence suggests that the Iranian regime is moving apace with the development of nuclear weapons and, equally importantly, the delivery vehicle, Shahab 5, which could well reach the channel coast. On the basis of the Foreign Secretary's last answer, will he tell us what specific plans he has to deal with a situation that the Israelis will call the doomsday situation in defence of this country's interests?

Mr. Straw: The fact that the Government of Iran are developing longer range missiles is incontrovertible, but whether they are using their nuclear power programme to develop nuclear weapons is not yet incontrovertible. There is a lot of circumstantial evidence that has raised significant anxieties in the minds of the international community. That evidence is published—it is not intelligence. I laid a significant amount of it before the House in January this year and am happy to do so again. We are taking steps through the IAEA, in which we, France and Germany have been in the lead for the past two and a half years. If we judge that Iran's non-compliance is continuing and is unacceptable, and if we have international support, it remains open to us to refer the matter to the Security Council, and we will do so. However, I believe that the approach by the three countries, now backed by a wider alliance, including Russia and China and, in terms of votes, the United States, is the best way forward in what is a very difficult situation.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): Very worryingly, at the IAEA meeting last week, Peter Jenkins, the British delegate but speaking for the European Union, said that the EU

"is disturbed to see that Iran has now admitted to having in its possession a document which related to the casting and machining of enriched uranium metal into hemispherical forms . . . Such a process has no application other than the production of nuclear warheads."

Does not that make the case against Iran clearer?

Mr. Straw: It is my working belief that Iran is at the very least developing the options for a nuclear weapons programme. Given the beliefs that we had on the basis of some published information and some intelligence on Iraq, we have to look at the evidence with great caution and care. The evidence, which originally came from a document from AQ Khan Research Laboratories in Pakistan, tells us that the Iranians had in their possession information that could lead to the development of the hemispheres, which for certain have no purpose other than the development of nuclear weapons. What the evidence does not tell us for certain is what Iran intended to do with that. It is a piece of circumstantial evidence and we need to treat it as such. It is not incontrovertible evidence—it is not a smoking gun—that makes us certain that Iran has a nuclear weapon.

Dr. Fox: President Putin said that he is convinced that Iran is not trying to develop nuclear weapons, and we recently saw some to-ing and fro-ing on a potential deal between Iran and Russia. What contact has the Prime Minister had with President Putin on the subject? Will the Secretary of State guarantee that a potential deal between Iran and Russia, and the time taken to finalise that, will not be used as an excuse to delay or avoid referral to the UN Security Council of an increasingly dangerous state?

Mr. Straw: There have been a lot of discussions with the Russians at Foreign Minister level. I was also present at a detailed discussion on Iran between President Putin and our Prime Minister when the President was here a few weeks ago, and there have been many other discussions. I do not recall that comment by President Putin. I certainly recall his comments that he would be opposed to Iran developing a nuclear weapon. The Russians are very alive to the significant risks that would apply if Iran developed a nuclear weapon because it could destabilise not only the middle east, but the southern republics of the Russian Federation. It would be a serious development.

Russia is involved in the Bushehr refinery and in agreeing to supply the Iranians with a nuclear power plant, lock, stock and barrel, including the fuel. There are separate discussions on whether Russia, under international supervision, would be willing to enrich the uranium, which is converted in another facility in Iran.

We are discussing that with the Russian Federation. It may be one way to provide what the Paris agreement described as the objective guarantees, which we are all seeking, that Iran's nuclear programme is entirely peaceful in its purpose.

Israel

10. Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): If he will make representations to the Israeli Government on their policy of building a separation wall in Palestinian territory, erecting gates and turnstiles in the city of Hebron, and obstructing movement by the establishment of permanent checkpoints. [32397]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): We frequently raise our concerns on free movement and the route of the barrier with the Israeli Government. While we understand Israel's need to take security measures, the building of the barrier east of the green line is contrary to international law. Israel also has the obligation to ensure that Palestinian free movement is disrupted as little as possible.

Sir Gerald Kaufman: With the illegal line of the Israeli wall forcing transfers of the Palestinian population that amount to ethnic cleansing; with the centre of Hebron emptied because Palestinians cannot move while illegal Israeli settlers move randomly and at will throughout Hebron; with illegal settlements on the west bank being expanded constantly; and with my right hon. Friend's representations, which I respect and admire, being utterly ignored by the Israeli Government, what can be done to stop the Israeli Government breaking international law every day of the year?

Mr. Straw: It is a frustrating situation, particularly for the Palestinians who are adversely affected by it. As I have already spelt out to the House, we are putting continuous pressure on the Government of Israel directly through the European Union and through our friends in the United States to convey the message that if they wish to secure what they say is their stated aim—a viable, stable state of Palestine living alongside a secure state of Israel—it is not in their interests to pre-empt the decisions that are necessary to that two-state solution.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): In the Foreign Secretary's discussions with the Israeli Government would he make it plain that the need for those controls would be greatly reduced if there were early evidence of substantial movement on the status of Jerusalem?

Mr. Straw: I would do so, but the status of Jerusalem is the most difficult issue in final status negotiations, and it will not be resolved, if it is resolved at all, until then.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): Despite reservations about my right hon. Friend's protests, will he repeat such protests, particularly about Bethlehem, as the opening of the new crossing at Rachel's tomb is an abomination? That district is deep inside Palestinian territory, and there is no justification for choking off its tourism industry and economy. In the run-up to Christmas, it is particularly important that reassurances are given and that my right hon. Friend supports, I hope, the "Open Bethlehem" initiative.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend should not have any reservations about the representations that my colleagues and I are making.

Joan Ruddock: My reservations are about their success.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend can certainly have reservations about their lack of success and I share her frustration. It is not in Israel's interests, still less is it in the Palestinians' interests, for the Israeli Government to resist those representations. I welcome, however, the strong pressure that I receive from Members on both sides of the House, including the eloquent language of my hon. Friend. We shall certainly continue to make those representations.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Is it not the case that there would be no need for a defensive fence if terrorist attacks on the state of Israel did not take place? With that in mind, what steps are the Government taking to ensure that countries such as Syria and Iran, and perhaps even elements in Saudi Arabia who pay what some call protection money, do not support terrorist organisations that attack Israel through that fence?

Mr. Straw: First, it is legitimate for any state to erect a security wall to defend its citizens. The issue is not whether Israel is entitled to a security wall—the issue is the route. The objection is about where it goes: not on Israeli land but on Palestinian land—let us make that clear. Secondly, I have made very, very strong representations to the Government of Iran and particularly to the Government of Syria, both privately and very publicly in the Security Council, to pressure Syria to do what it says it is doing but what, frankly, it has not done until now: force Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah to wind up all the activities that operate out of its territories. As for Saudi Arabia, I am not aware of any provenance for the hon. Gentleman's statement. These days, however, the Government of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia are strongly opposed to any terrorist activity anywhere across the middle east.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): As the Foreign Secretary has acknowledged that the wall is illegal where it passes through Palestinian land, will he tell us what sanctions he proposes to take against Israel, since the Government of Israel clearly have not responded to the pressures that he and others have applied, asking them to abide by the World Court ruling that the wall should not pass through other people's territory?

Mr. Straw: There are no proposals in respect of sanctions, not least because I do not think we would get a resolution through the United Nations Security Council. That is a matter of fact. However, although it is a relative matter, I believe that the deep international concern about the line that the wall has taken and behind that, the even bigger concern about the settlements on Palestinian land, is having and should have an increasing effect on policy in the Government of Israel.

European Union

11. Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Whether the UK rebate from the EU budget forms part of current negotiations on the future structure of the EU. [32398]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): May I briefly take the opportunity to clarify for the House in relation to question 4 that Germany is one of 13 member states that have ratified the draft constitutional treaty?

In relation to the question from the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), I refer him to the answer given a few moments ago by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Among all the confused drift of the Government's European policy, at least they have been consistent about their promise not to give up the British rebate, which limits our contributions to the EU budget to about £3.5 billion a year. Does the hon. Gentleman remember the Prime Minister saying at that Dispatch Box on 8 June:

"The UK rebate will remain and we will not negotiate it away. Period."—[Official Report, 8 June 2005; Vol. 434, c. 1234.]?

In view of the earlier remarks by the Foreign Secretary which referred to the so-called anomaly of the rebate, was that earlier promise by the Prime Minister worthless?

Mr. Alexander: It was not worthless. It reflects the fact that the rebate came into existence—we have already discussed this afternoon the historic origins in 1984 in Fontainebleau—because of the structural imbalance in a European budget which meant that Britain did not gain either through structural cohesion funds or through common agricultural policy funds the level of resource coming back from the European Union that many other large contributor countries to the EU did. It is therefore entirely consistent to recognise and acknowledge, as our Prime Minister has done, that the abatement is an anomaly, but that it is based on a much wider anomaly.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): On point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 17 October, when I asked the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence if there were likely to be any advances on the £87 million cost increase in the troubled landing ships dock (auxiliary) contract with Swan Hunter, the Minister said:

"All that the hon. Gentleman has done is recite figures that we have already reported to the House in previous answers. To ensure the delivery of the ships from Swan Hunter, we amended the contract arrangements."—[Official Report, 17 October 2005; vol. 437, c. 624.]

Yet on 3 November, in a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), the Minister stated:

"Both companies have indicated likely cost increases to their programmes".—[Official Report, 3 November 2005; vol. 438, c. 1264W.]

The answer also revealed a further £62 million payment to Swan Hunter, which had yet to be revealed to Parliament. Following that, my hon. Friend learned that the Ministry of Defence learned about that in June. So why, when the Minister learned of these further cost increases in June, did he not indicate when asked by me directly on 17 October that further cost increases were expected? Will you ask the Minister to come to the House and correct that misleading statement?

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that in February this year, you were obliged to rebuke Ministers for failing to reveal that there had been cost increases of £87 million—no less than 60 per cent.—in the cost of those landing ships dock (auxiliary) vessels which had been contracted with Swan Hunter. When my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) failed to obtain from the Minister at oral questions last month an updated estimate of the cost, I tabled further questions and wrung out from Ministers the fact that in addition to the £87 million, they had sanctioned a further £62 million in payments to Swan Hunter for what they called lead yard equipment and services in support of the two ships being built to Swan Hunter's design by BAE Systems. That information was not revealed to Parliament at the time that you rebuked Ministers, although the additional payments had been agreed in 2001 and 2002. Although I have some sympathy with the Minister of State, who has to answer in this place for the noble Lord Drayson, is it not unacceptable that my hon. Friend was not given, in your words at the time of the rebuke, by the Minister of State, and that it required persistent questioning by me for the information to be made available to all Members of the House?

"a full or up-to-date picture of the facts relating to the contract in question"—[Official Report, 9 February, 2005; vol. 430, c. 1522.]

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to both hon. Members for giving me notice of that point of order. I am happy to remind Ministers of their duty to give accurate information to this House. I note that the point is based on information provided by Ministers in answer to questions, and the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) is now asking me to comment on the answers, which I am unable to do. I suggest that the matter will be best pursued by debate, and he knows the opportunities very well.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that considerable disquiet was expressed on both sides of the House at last Thursday's business questions about the cancellation of the debate on police restructuring. Today, we had a one-and-a-half hour debate in Westminster Hall, which we are extremely grateful to you for granting to the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook). Unfortunately, only six hon. Members were able to get into that debate—I am not making a special plea, but I reduced my contribution to two minutes to allow others to participate. [Interruption.] It was hugely appreciated.

During her closing remarks, the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety implied that the Government have already made up their mind about the restructuring of the police service. We all know that the expression, "Government consultation", is an oxymoron, but the Government should at least do the House the courtesy of discussing the matter on the Floor of the House and, I submit, they should do so in response to a substantive motion, so that all hon. Members affected—all those who represent English or Welsh constituencies—can properly discuss and bring to the House their constituency and area concerns.

My concern is that the Home Secretary and his junior Ministers are riding roughshod over the rights of this House. They refuse to have a debate because they do not want to have a debate; they are trying to box us into short debates in Westminster Hall, which are not adequate fully to discuss the issues; or they want to postpone the matter until the new year, because the consultation period finishes on 23 December, when the matter will be dead, so far as they are concerned. Will you invite the Home Secretary, in the reasonable way in which I have addressed you, to come to this House and explain himself. Otherwise, the Home Secretary will let down himself and this House.

Mr. Speaker: Two-minute speeches by highly learned QCs are few and far between, and I only wish that I had heard such a short speech. Debates on the Floor of the House are matters for the usual channels, and the hon. and learned Gentleman has certainly put that matter on the record. Because there was one debate in Westminster Hall, it does not mean that we cannot have others. Ballots are held for Adjournment debates, and on a Thursday the Speaker can award an Adjournment debate. If the hon. and learned Gentleman applies for an Adjournment debate, I might be able to help him. I know that the matter is highly sensitive in England and, perhaps, Wales, and I am keen to see hon. Members debate it.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Between now and Christmas, there are two non-sitting Fridays. Will you advise hon. Members whether one or both of those Fridays could be used for that debate, if the House is so minded?

Mr. Speaker: Once again, that is a matter for the usual channels. However, I would not interfere with non-sitting Fridays.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have been kind enough to refer us to Westminster Hall debates and the possibility of securing another. That is fine, as far as it goes, but the problem is that it is not on a substantive voteable motion. That is why we want it on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman what I said to the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale)—that is a matter between the usual channels. The case has been put by several Back Benchers, and it must be heard by the usual channels.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm that if hon. Members scan Standing Orders carefully, they will find that under one of the very few remaining procedures left unravaged by the Government, application can be made to you for certain other kinds of debate that would bring matters before the House and could be on a voteable motion? Without wanting to pre-empt what your very wise decision might be, Mr. Speaker, that is the sort of process that colleagues might wish to pursue on matters as substantive and urgent as this.

Mr. Speaker: I have always said that the right hon. Gentleman is an expert on Standing Orders, and he knows how to use them. I will say no more than that.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have an extremely difficult job in representing the best interests of the whole House, but do not you feel, Sir, that a fundamental change to the structure of the police force in this country is a matter on which the House should express a view, on a substantive motion, before the end of the consultation on 23 December?

Mr. Speaker: My job is made very easy because hon. Members do not draw me into the debate.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to raise a different matter that is causing me some concern. This week, I received a letter from the House authorities inviting me to have a Visa travel card. A few weeks ago, I mentioned to the Leader of the House that I was nearly being knocked off my motor cycle because of the change in the narrowness of the road outside the Palace. My staff cannot get passes. I am worried that the House authorities may not be doing as much as I would like to make life as straightforward as possible for us and our constituents instead of their departments. This is a difficult subject, Mr. Speaker, and I need your advice on it.

Mr. Speaker: Let me say to the hon. Gentleman that the officials of this House have great difficulties with security. As he knows, that is not a matter that I would discuss openly on the Floor of the House. All I would ask is that hon. Members are patient with the security staff because, believe me, they have a very difficult job indeed.

Representation of the People (Reduction of Voting Age)

3.42 pm

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to reduce the voting age for parliamentary, local government and European parliamentary elections to 16.

Twenty years ago, at a Welsh party conference, I first heard a debate on reducing the voting age to 16. I was one of the youngest people in the room, but I voted against the motion. In the two decades since, I have been involved in many elections, seven of them as a candidate. In that time, I have moved from being a sceptic to a doubter. After the 2001 general election, I became a firm believer that the time had come to reduce the voting age.

Like all of us, I have visited many schools and colleges during, and in between, elections. I have always been impressed by the penetrating and incisive questions and by the open way in which ideas are debated. Contrast that with a typical wet evening during an election when one meets someone on the doorstep who has no time, is not interested, would rather be watching the television, or offers an opinion that they say is fact but actually matches what they read in the newspapers that morning. Reducing the voting age to 16 is an idea whose time has come. It is a shame that the Government failed to grasp that opportunity for change in the Electoral Administration Bill.

The parliamentary franchise was extended six times between 1832 and 1969. Each extension was met with opposition and scepticism. Indeed, after the Second Reform Act 1867, the Prime Minister of the day, Lord Derby, described his own measure as a "leap in the dark". Robert Lowe, who was to become Gladstone's first Chancellor of the Exchequer, remarked that the Government would have to "educate our masters".

In the 21st century, our eyes can be open and we can see that we have the best ever educated, informed and politically interested cohort of 16 and 17-year-olds. In recent times, young people's interest has been awakened in politics. Perhaps one of the few silver linings of the Iraq war is that young people take an interest in the Chamber's deliberations and the fundamental decisions that we can make in this place.

All hon. Members will have been lobbied here and in our constituencies by young constituents about issues such as third-world poverty and climate change. Young people will shortly take an interest in controversial education measures, which will be determined here, just as they recently took an interest in decisions that affected their access to higher education.

Like the rest of us, young people can pick and hoover up information 24 hours a day through television and the internet. In schools, citizenship is compulsory at key stages 3 and 4 for all 11 to 16-year-olds in England, stimulating community involvement and political literacy. In 1969, when Parliament previously decided to extend the franchise, the school-leaving age was 15 and most people left school at 15. Few went on to further education and even fewer to higher education. In 2005, the educational world is totally different. I am sure that today's teenagers have the same social interests as their counterparts in the 1960s, but this decade's 16-year-olds are better informed and of a similar maturity to 18-year-olds of nearly 40 years ago. It is now time for them to use their knowledge and maturity and for us to extend the vote to them.

The Prime Minister often talks about rights, responsibilities and respect. Young people already have various rights and responsibilities when they are under 18. At 16, they can leave school, go to work and join the Army. In both latter circumstances, they will pay taxes. They can marry or—shortly—enter into a civil partnership. All of us would agree that entering into a marriage is a long-term commitment and a fundamental decision that is far more important to someone's life and future than choosing between candidates in an election.

At 17, one can learn to drive. My hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) could learn to pilot a plane but he was not trusted with the vote. We give young people many rights and responsibilities but, as politicians, we do not always give them the respect of listening to their opinions.

Many of us have expressed worries about democracy in our country and especially about turnout at elections. I believe that voting at 16 could boost turnout in the long run. The Social Market Foundation conducted some interesting research on the topic. It undertook a study of 17 and 18-year-olds who either just missed out or just qualified to vote in the April 1992 general election. Those who missed out in 1992 had to wait until they were 22 or 23 before they could vote in the 1997 general election. In 2001, that group of people was studied and it was found that 49 per cent. of 17-year-olds who had just missed out in 1992 voted in 2001 but that 65 per cent. of the 18-year-olds who qualified for the vote in 1992 voted in the general election nine years later. That is a 16 per cent. gain in turnout through an exercise of the franchise at the earliest opportunity.

Bristol's twin city, Hanover, has recently extended the vote to 16-year-olds and it was found that they are twice as likely to turn out to vote in elections as people in their late 20s.

Let me trespass briefly on the territory of the next debate. Cigarette manufacturers believe that a person whom they can get to take up smoking by the age of 16 is likely to be addicted for many years but that, of those who resist the temptation into their 20s, few take up smoking. Votes for 16-year-olds will be a healthier habit for people to take up.

What are the arguments against extending the franchise to 16 and 17-year-olds? Some people argue that there is pressure from families, campaign groups and political parties, especially in marginal seats in elections; that the voting age in all but a handful of democracies throughout the planet is the same as that in the United Kingdom. It is argued that young people are not mature enough, even with education. It is claimed that knowledge may be one thing but mature judgment is another and that young people do not see the broader picture. All of those opinions will have been offered in the past few years while the debate has been on the agenda, and I am sure that they will be offered in time to come. I obtained all of them through a perusal of Hansard from November 1968, when the House decided to reduce the voting age from 21 to 18. Similar arguments were advanced in the 19th and 20th centuries when it was said that middle-class paternalism could protect the interests of the working classes, or husbands could make decisions on behalf of their wives, or parents on behalf of their children. Those were Aunts Sallies then and I think that they deserve to be knocked down now.

Voting at the age of 16 is supported by Members of all parties in the House. Early-day motion 801, tabled by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson), now has the support of 90 signatures. Outside Parliament, the campaign is supported by children's charities and political campaigners from Barnardo's and the Children's Society to the National Union of Students and the YMCA.

Extending the franchise to 16-year-olds will not be a leap in the dark. Rather than having to educate our new electoral masters, we would find them the most responsive and responsible constituents. I believe that young people are informed, engaged and ready to vote. I hope that by introducing the Bill, I have contributed to a debate that will eventually lead to a franchise that is fit for the 21st century.

3.51 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): It is worrying that the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams) drew a parallel between smoking and voting. If the Labour party gets its hands on it, it will be banning voting just as it wants to ban smoking.

The Electoral Commission is investigating national voting at 16 at great length. Its report, which was published in April this year, concluded that the minimum age for all levels of voting in UK public elections should remain at 18, although it said that the minimum age for candidacy should be reduced to 18. I welcome the latter move, and that has been put forward by the Government in the Electoral Administration Bill. My party and I support that. Having candidates aged 18 would be valuable.

In its report on reducing the voting age, the commission, which conducted wide-ranging public consultation, concluded:

"On the little hard evidence available, it would appear that overall turnout would almost certainly drop in the short-term as a result of lowering the voting age and the longer-term effects on turnout are disputed."

It also said that

"lowering of the voting . . . age was unlikely to have as significant an effect as the much more fundamental cultural shift required in how young people are engaged in the wider political process."

In my constituency, Speech House—the home of debate—was host to much discussion on this subject when Forest sixth-formers met during local democracy week in the Verderers' court. The Royal Forest of Dean college, Wyedean school and Newent community schools sent students to debate whether the minimum age of voting should be lowered to 16. Even among an audience made up entirely of 16 to 18-year-olds, there was almost a 50:50 split. Even among the target age group there is not a clear wish for change.

The hon. Member for Bristol, West said that there are a number of things that young people are permitted to do at 16, but he did not give the full picture. It is true that someone can join the Army at 16, but that person cannot serve on the front line until 18. It is true that we can get married at 16, but until 18 people have to have their parents' permission. We make distinctions in this country and there are certain things that can be done only when someone achieves the age of majority, when he or she is deemed to be an adult. A line must be drawn somewhere. If we move to 16, no doubt there will be arguments to move the age even further. Without a clear line there is no obvious end.

The Electoral Commission conducted a wide-ranging survey that involved ICM. In an unprompted survey, 64 per cent. of the public said that 18 was the correct age. Only 18 per cent. thought that 16 years was preferable. When given a choice between 18 and 16, 78 per cent. said that 18 was the correct age. Interestingly, those below the age of 18 wanted the voting age to be lowered, but once they had reached the age of 18, they expressed overwhelming support for the 18 limit.

The Electoral Commission's survey, conducted by ICM, came up with some solid conclusions. It stated:

"These results represent a solid affirmation of the status quo. There may be valid reasons for reducing the voting age"— the hon. Member for Bristol, West has outlined some that he found convincing—

"but the general public are . . . unimpressed by them. Indeed, a reduction in the voting age could only be justified . . . by attaching more importance to the wishes of current 16–17 year olds than to the views of the public at large".

It went on to say:

"Rarely does a research survey produce a truly remarkable statistic."

We have to draw the line somewhere, and traditionally we have set 18 as the age at which one becomes an adult. That is a sensible settlement. It is sensible to reduce the age of candidacy to parallel the voting age, but this measure does not deserve the support of the House.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):—

Orders of the Day

Health Bill

[Relevant document: The uncorrected Minutes of Evidence taken before the Health Committee on 20th October, 17th November and 24th November 2005, HC (2005–06) 485 i-iii.]

Order for Second Reading read.

4.7 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am proud to introduce a Bill that is a landmark in the protection of public health and the improvement of our health services. It does three key things. It gives us power to ban smoking in enclosed public places and workplaces, it strengthens our hand in the battle against methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus and other hospital infections, and it contains a series of measures that will strengthen control of dangerous drugs, improve pharmaceutical and ophthalmic services and help to deal with fraud in the national health service.

I realise that the House may be particularly interested in the provisions on smoking, but I want to make a few brief points about other aspects of the Bill first to ensure that they are given due attention. The first commandment of the medical profession is "Do no harm". Unfortunately, as we all know, there are occasions when patients are harmed, not healed, by their hospitals. It is not surprising that MRSA and other health care-associated infections are of great concern to members of the public, particularly if someone in the family or neighbourhood has suffered from them. Part 2 of the Bill—clauses 13 to 15—gives us stronger powers to reduce MRSA and other infections to the absolute minimum.

We were the first Government to require surveillance for MRSA, and we are already using the information to help drive down infection rates. We set a target of no later than 2008 for the halving of MRSA infections. Indeed, some of our specialist hospitals such as Guy's and St. Thomas's, which treat some of the most complex cases in the country, and in early 2004 had among the highest MRSA rates, had already nearly halved their infection rates a year later.

The Bill builds on the work that we are already doing; it provides for a legally binding code of practice on health care-associated infections, which will apply to any relevant NHS body. The code will be based on existing best practice, and a draft on which we consulted earlier this year was well received. It will be backed up by new duties for the Healthcare Commission to ensure that it is observed, including the power to serve an improvement notice.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): The Secretary of State referred to the statutory code and the consultation held on it. Last year's National Audit Office report on hospital-acquired infections found that half of all NHS managers are struggling to reconcile meeting Government waiting time targets with managing hospital infections. That issue came through again in the response to the consultation on the code.

[Mr. Paul Burstow]

The NHS wants to know what priority the Government will attach to the code, compared with other health priorities—so can the Secretary of State make that clear today?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. It is not acceptable to try to achieve infection targets at the expense of waiting list and other targets, nor is it acceptable to try to achieve waiting list targets by compromising on patient safety and infection rates. Throughout the country there are hospitals that are both improving the number of patients whom they treat, thus getting waiting lists and waiting times down, and getting a grip on infection control, thus bringing MRSA and other infection rates down. The answer is that hospitals need to do both.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I fear that the Secretary of State has not answered the perfectly reasonable question asked by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow). The essence of the question, which we have asked Ministers time and again, is this: will the Secretary of State give a simple guarantee that when, after a suitable risk assessment, infection control teams in a hospital recommend that beds or wards should be closed for infection control purposes, they will not be overruled in pursuit of waiting time targets?

Ms Hewitt: That would be a matter for the Healthcare Commission to consider, under the new code and under the Bill.

As we increase even further the capacity and the number of hospital beds available to the NHS, as we are doing, it will be possible to reduce occupancy rates in acute wards, which will help. It is not essential, but it will certainly help, as hospitals get their MRSA rates under control.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Ms Hewitt: I shall give way one more time to the hon. Gentleman on this point.

Mr. Lansley: The Secretary of State does not have to give way to me, so I am grateful to her for doing so again—but does she not recall that two weeks ago I presented to the House data that showed that although in 2000 the NHS started with 186,000 beds, with a target of 7,000 additional beds, the number went down by 4,000? On present indications, we estimate that this year, as a result of NHS deficits, the number is likely to reduce by another 2,500, so there will be fewer than 180,000 beds. The number of beds is going down, and bed occupancy rates are persistently far higher than the Government said they would be when they responded to the National Audit Office five years ago.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is doing exactly what he did in that debate two weeks ago, and ignoring the fact that with modern medical techniques and technology, far more operations can be done on a day-case basis. He is also confusing acute beds with beds available for mental health patients, for whom far more treatment is being carried out within the community.

Mr. Lansley indicated dissent.

Ms Hewitt: I make again the point that I have made before: thanks to our investment and unprecedented funding for the NHS, which the Conservative party failed to make available, and thanks to our reforms, we are bringing waiting lists down, and as more capacity becomes available to the NHS both in NHS hospitals and in independent sector treatment centres, as is happening now, it will be possible to get the waiting lists down even further, with lower bed occupancy rates, which in turn will help to build on the good results already being achieved with infections. The other point to consider on this particular issue is that, if a hospital is still failing to abide by the new code and to reduce its infections, even after an intervention by the Healthcare Commission, I—or in the case of the foundation trusts, the regulator—have the power to intervene.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the Government can have all the codes that they want to try and tackle ESBL—extended-spectrum-lactamases; VRSA—vancomycin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus; MRSA and all the superbugs, but if primary care workers are unable to obtain flu jabs this winter, patients will be put at direct risk? In my constituency, primary care workers are unable to have flu jabs, putting my constituents at risk.

Ms Hewitt: As I have already told the House, more people are being vaccinated against winter flu than ever before in our country—even more than last year, when we achieved a level twice that achieved under the Conservatives.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): The Secretary of State has been talking about the code of practice that will be introduced to enforce better standards in NHS hospitals. When we come to consider the enforcement of those standards within hospitals, will the Secretary of State explain why she is not planning to extend the sanctions regime that applies to private sector hospitals to their NHS counterparts?

Ms Hewitt: The right hon. Gentleman raises an important point. As for private hospitals and the independent sector generally, the same standards will apply, using the same code provisions but under the existing legal powers of the Care Standards Act 2000. The obvious reason why we have a somewhat different enforcement regime is that we have direct management controls—or through a monitor, direct regulatory controls—on NHS and foundation trust hospitals that do not exist in respect of the private sector.

The new code that we are introducing, backed up by the new powers of the Healthcare Commission, will help to ensure that our NHS, which is treating more patients faster than ever before, will also provide the highest possible standards and quality of care.

I want to refer briefly to parts 3, 4, and 5 of the Bill, which deal with drugs, pharmaceutical and ophthalmic services and various other matters. We are strengthening the management of controlled drugs in response to some of the shortcomings identified in the Shipman inquiry's fourth report. Those provisions, which are UK-wide, will require every health care body to appoint an accountable officer who will have to take personal responsibility for the use of controlled drugs within that organisation

We are also taking steps to continue improving pharmaceutical and other services. Community pharmacists are already playing a much wider role than they used to within the NHS—for instance, providing screening services and reviewing medicine use for people with long-term conditions. We know from our recent consultation on community health and social care services that the public welcome the work of community pharmacists and would like to see it increased. The Bill, by freeing pharmacists from the requirement personally to dispense every item, will allow them to expand the other services that they offer without in anyway compromising patient safety.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for her remarks on community pharmacies. I am sure that they will be greatly appreciated by the many thousands of community pharmacists who work so hard to provide front-line health care services. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that, when she relaxes the requirements for pharmacists to be on the premises at all times as they are now, at least one pharmacist will be available so that we avoid the situation in which one pharmacist has, in theory, to manage more than one premises at the same time? I am concerned that that could compromise standards.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an important point, which we will look into carefully when we draw up the detailed regulations to give effect to the provision. In order to ensure that patient safety is in no way compromised, a responsible pharmacist will have to be in charge of every pharmacy. However, because he or she may not have to dispense every item, it will be possible to make much better use of the range of skills within the pharmacy team.

We are also reforming the entry requirements governing the provision of pharmacy services by implementing in England the final elements of the balanced package of reforms that we published in response to the Office of Fair Trading report two years ago. Similarly, in modernising ophthalmic services, we are relaxing the current restrictions on who can provide them.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): As someone who has been using opticians since the age of seven, may I ask my right hon. Friend about the logic behind devolving general ophthalmic services to PCTs? Will she give an assurance that PCTs will not be able to restrict the number of opticians who provide sight tests?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend raises an important point. We want to give PCTs the ability to secure the best services for people in their area, and that is exactly what we are doing by devolving responsibility for dental services—[Interruption.] Yes, they will be able to respond to some of the very real problems that we are addressing. On ophthalmic services, PCTs will be able to use a wider range of providers to obtain the services that people need. The changes will simplify entry requirements for the provision of NHS services and help to support better service provision.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I accept that PCTs are often well placed to drive up the level of provision in their area, but does my right hon. Friend understand the concerns of optometrists in my constituency, such as David Austen, who provides an excellent service but is fearful that quality may be reduced if the PCT is driven by the need to make economies? The changes should be about driving up standards, not reducing them to a level playing field.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend's final point is right. These changes will help to continue improving the quality of care that opticians are able to provide. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for ophthalmic services has recently met the opticians to reassure them on that point, because it has been raised not only by the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) but by many others.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I wish to make some more progress, because I know that there are many other issues that hon. Members will wish to—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State said that she does not intend to give way.

Ms Hewitt: The Bill will also strengthen the powers of the NHS Counter Fraud and Security Management Service, which has—

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: No. The hon. Gentleman is very persistent, but I have already said that I will not give way, because I wish to make some progress and there are many other issues on which I anticipate hon. Members will wish to make interventions.

The counter fraud service has performed a highly important job since we established it in 1998. By the end of the last financial year, it had produced a financial benefit to the NHS of £675 million, which is a 13:1 return on its total budget since 1999. The service is an important part of ensuring that we get value for money for every additional £1 of taxpayers' money that we put into the NHS.

I come to my final point before I turn to smoking. In part 5 of the Bill, we respond to an important report published in 2003 by the Public Administration Committee, which was called "Government by Appointment", by establishing a new non-departmental public body, the appointments commission, to replace the current NHS Appointments Commission. In the Committee's estimation, the NHS Appointments Commission was working well and the Committee recommended that other Departments should be able to use its services. The Bill provides the legal framework to do that and reaffirms our commitment to an independent appointments process.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way before she discusses smoking. In her responses to interventions by Labour Members, she did not appear to give an assurance that she would not allow PCTs to restrict patients' choice of ophthalmic practitioner. Will she assure the House that she will carry out a full review of general ophthalmic services, in consultation with the profession, so that people in England receive the same quality of treatment as is available in Wales and Scotland?

Ms Hewitt: The measures in the Bill are designed to increase the choice that is available to patients in England. The Bill will enable primary care trusts to contract with a wider range of providers, and indeed, as you would expect, Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing this very closely with the opticians, with the profession, and we shall continue to do so as we bring forward regulations on this matter.

Ms Hewitt: I am not going to take further interventions because I wish to turn to another very important matter—part 1 of the Bill, on smoke-free places. The provisions that we are introducing in part 1, which extend to England and Wales, fulfil the commitment that we made last year, in the "Choosing Health" White Paper, to legislate to shift the balance significantly in favour of smoke-free environments.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that many of us see a fatal flaw and contradiction in the Bill—[Interruption.]—in part 1, which is otherwise admirable in its intent. I am sure that everyone on the Labour Benches would wish to protect workers from being exposed to smoke in their workplaces, and probably all of us in the House would support that aim. Part 1 is fatally undermined, however, by providing exemptions for private clubs for instance, or pubs that do not serve food, where people still have to work and where, in practice, it is impossible to separate those working there from the smoke. My right hon. Friend must be aware that there will be serious moves to amend that part of the Bill.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend has raised early in this debate what the exemptions should be, but I would refer him first to the manifesto on which he and I were both elected earlier this year—[Interruption.] Perhaps I may just finish this sentence, which is rather an important one, if I may say so, for all my hon. and right hon. Friends. We were all re-elected this year on a manifesto that promised we would legislate to ensure that "all enclosed public places and work places other than licensed premises will be smoke-free . . . that all restaurants will be smoke-free, all pubs and bars preparing and serving food will be smoke-free".

The Bill delivers on that promise by introducing a complete ban on smoking in enclosed public spaces and workplaces, but allowing for limited exemptions about which I shall say something more in a moment.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine).

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that I was not actually elected on the manifesto, coming in, as I did, in October, and she will be aware that many of us in this place would like us to follow the lead of the Scottish Parliament and the Dail in banning smoking totally in all public places. But I wonder whether she is aware of the British Medical Association report that was produced in October, which compared the respiratory function of bar staff in Northern Ireland and in the Republic, before and after the introduction of the smoking ban. It showed that the respiratory function of bar staff in the south had increased substantially, and the conclusion was that the smoke-free law—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can leave that for a speech. Interventions should be short.

Ms Hewitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston makes an important point, to which I shall return not only this afternoon but in Committee.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I shall make a little more progress at this point and then I will take further interventions.

Today, only 51 per cent. of the work force enjoy a totally smoke-free environment. The Bill, even with the limited exemptions that we are proposing, will give 99 per cent. of the work force complete protection from smoking. That is an enormous step forward for public health and for the health and well-being of our people.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I shall give way in a moment. Smoking is already—thank goodness—far less common than it used to be. Many of us can remember when it was the norm for people to spoke in cinemas, on trains and buses and in most factories and offices. Today, smoking is banned on almost all public transport and in many other public places. Thirty years ago, about half of men and almost half of women smoked; today, only one in four people do so. That number is continuing to fall, in part thanks to the excellent smoking cessation services provided on the NHS.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Can the Secretary of State clarify a simple factual question: did she try to persuade the Cabinet to go for a total ban?

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Hand on heart.

Ms Hewitt: My hand is always on my heart. We had a debate in the Government on how best to implement our manifesto promise, just as we will have a debate this afternoon and in Committee, but I stress that Labour Members are completely committed to legislating for public health and for a smoking ban to strengthen the provision of smoke-free places.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, and I hope that he will tell us whether he proposes to vote for the Bill or against it.

Philip Davies: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way, but I would prefer to put points to her. I do not smoke. I do not like going into smoky places, so I choose not to. Does she not agree that, if I own a pub, I should be free to decide whether or not people are allowed to smoke on my premises based on the feedback that I get from my customers and my employees? This should not be a matter for more nanny-state interference.

Ms Hewitt: I take that as a statement that the hon. Gentleman and, no doubt, many of his hon. Friends will vote against the Bill, because they do not accept that the Government have a responsibility to act in this respect.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I will take further interventions in a moment, but I want to make a little progress because there is an extremely important point of principle, which divides Labour Members from the Conservative party. Fewer people now smoke and more people demand smoke-free public places and workplaces.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I have just said that I will make a little more progress before I take further interventions.

I have no doubt at all that, even without legislation, in the fullness of time, we would eventually see a self-imposed ban on smoking spread to virtually all public places and workplaces. The reason why that is not good enough is that it would take too long. Smoking kills and so does second-hand smoke. Even if the Opposition cannot make up their mind, the Government have a duty to legislate. The public consultation that we conducted made it plain that the public agree. They want the Government to speed up the change that is already happening. They want the Government to do more to protect people from second-hand smoke.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I do not know whether the Secretary of State managed to hear Mr. Tony Benn—a former Member of Parliament for Chesterfield, whom I am sure she knows well—on the radio on Saturday morning. He said that he found it rather odd that, at this stage of their life, the Government were allowing 24-hour drinking, with all the damage that alcohol can do to people, yet they somehow believe that smoking should be banned.

Ms Hewitt: There will not be 24-hour drinking as a result of very sensible changes in the licensing laws, which, of course, Opposition Members have called for and which will enable responsible adults to drink rather more without the current restrictions—[Interruption.] We will enable responsible adults to drink without the restrictions that are currently imposed by out-of-date licensing laws, but we will give the police much tougher powers to deal with the minority who binge drink and then attack other people.

Helen Jones: I accept that the Bill is a great step forward. I feel a bit like a bag of ailments this afternoon—as well as being short-sighted, I am asthmatic. Breathing in second-hand smoke doubles the chances of an adult developing asthma and inhibits the action of the drugs that are used to control asthma. Can my right hon. Friend explain why someone who works in a pub that does not serve food should be exposed to that risk, when someone who works in a different establishment is not exposed to it?

Ms Hewitt: I will return to that very point in a moment. It is precisely the damaging effects of second-hand smoke that have led us to conclude—in striking contrast to the Conservative party—that we need to legislate on the matter.

Ann Keen (Brentford and Isleworth) (Lab): The Government are putting forward a strong public health message. Will the Secretary of State examine the line of the Royal National Institute of the Blind on the effect of smoke on sight, especially on macular degeneration of the retina? Will she consider putting warnings on cigarette packets that smoking can cause blindness?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend raises an important point. We will shortly be consulting on strengthening the general health warnings on cigarette packets by putting pictures on them to illustrate the damage that smoking does to people's health.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will know that I admire what she tried to do at earlier stages of the Bill's life. Does she agree that we must set against the drift downwards of the prevalence of smoking in the general population—she accurately described that as about one in four people—the fact that two groups buck the trend? One such group is in working-class communities. Work done by SmokeFree Liverpool, which is an immensely effective organisation, shows that in the most deprived wards, as much as half the population smokes. From her observations and statistical analysis, my right hon. Friend will have noted that the number of younger women who are starting to take up smoking is increasing significantly. What does she believe can be done in that regard?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. The prevalence of smoking in England and other parts of the country is going down among all groups, including working-class men. Indeed, the evidence on young women is not as clear cut as he suggests. Smoking rates are going down. They are going down even faster among better-off groups. Of course, we need to do more on smoking cessation programmes, in particular, alongside the Bill.

The Bill is an enormous step forward for public health. It will help to reduce the number of people smoking by a further 500,000 to 750,000 over time. It will help to reduce the number of deaths of people in the work force that are associated with second-hand smoke, which is estimated at some 500 to 600 a year.

In framing the legislation—this was the point of many debates and the public consultation that took place before the publication of the "Choosing Health" White Paper and, indeed, the election—we are striking a balance between two extremes: on the one hand, an over-prescriptive state; and on the other, which is represented by Conservative Members, an irresponsibly laissez-faire Government. We are responding to the clear wish of the public to be protected from other people's smoking in public places, especially restaurants, on the one hand, and on the other hand allowing people who want to have a cigarette with a drink to do so.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for moving forward with the Bill, not least because in the Rhondda more people now contract chronic obstructive pulmonary disease from smoking than they did from the mines. She will know that the Welsh Assembly has made it clear that it will not introduce exemptions along the lines of those proposed in clause 3. Will she go a little further and consider time limiting any exemptions that might be in the Bill for just two or three years?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I have made various changes in response to the consultation that we have had since May this year. For example, my hon. Friends will recall that the proposed implementation date for licensed premises was originally the end of 2008. I have brought implementation forward to the summer of 2007, when all the provisions relating to smoke-free places will take effect.

Ms Hewitt: I want to finish this point.

I have also made it clear that we intend to monitor the impact of the ban, with the exceptions, from day one and to complete that review within three years. As I said, the Bill provides for a complete ban, but exceptions can be made by regulation. If, in the light of that review and monitoring, the Government and Parliament decide that they no longer want some or all of those exceptions, it will not require further primary legislation. It would be a simple thing to change.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): On the exemptions, my constituency, like many other former mining constituencies, has a large and lively network of miners' welfare clubs. They are not strictly speaking membership clubs. Do they fall under the exemptions?

Ms Hewitt: I am confident that those clubs, which many of us have in our constituencies, will be covered by our proposed exemption for membership clubs. However, I stress that the membership clubs that will be exempted will have to comply with the much narrower definition of a genuine membership club contained in the Licensing Act 2003.

Mr. Burstow: Will the Secretary of State explain how she came to the balance that she has struck and, in particular, why she appears not to have taken into account her regulatory impact assessment? It compares a comprehensive ban with a partial ban and shows that more than 200 additional people a year will die from second-hand smoking if we stick with a partial ban. Will not more people die if we do not go for a comprehensive measure?

Ms Hewitt: Some 95 per cent. of deaths that are related to second-hand smoking occur as a result of smoking in the home. That is where the real problem lies. It is why we have to continue to invest in the smoking cessation programmes and, more generally, to raise awareness so that adults who choose to smoke do not do so either in their homes, where their children might be present, or, indeed, in their cars. Unfortunately, about a third of parents who smoke do so in the car when their children are with them.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Is the Secretary of State aware that according to Macmillan Cancer Relief, which is to be applauded for the excellent way in which it supports patients and families in the community, approximately 37,000 people in the UK are diagnosed with lung cancer each year? Surely that figure alone should mean that she considers completely lifting all exemptions so that there are none across the UK. There should be a total ban. Nothing else will do.

Ms Hewitt: Macmillan Cancer Relief does excellent work. It is precisely because of the damage that smoking and second-hand smoking do to people's health that we are taking this enormous step. I remind the hon. Lady that 99 per cent. of the work force will be guaranteed a completely smoke-free environment as a result of the Bill, along with the ban on smoking in virtually every enclosed public space.

Ms Hewitt: I intend to make a little more progress before I give way.

On exemptions, clause 2 gives the National Assembly for Wales and, in the case of England, the Secretary of State the power to make exemptions, some of which I hope will be uncontroversial. They include private dwellings, along with premises that are clearly private space, such as bedrooms in a hotel or a bed and breakfast, and other places, such as care homes and prisons, that are a person's full-time place of residence for an extended period, although not necessarily as a matter of choice. We are respecting people's private lives and their freedom of choice.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Is the Secretary of State aware that the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward), informed Smoke-Free Liverpool that the main reason that he wanted a total ban on smoking in Northern Ireland was that he did not want two classes of workers—people exposed to smoke and people not exposed to smoke? If that is good enough for Northern Ireland, why is it not good enough for workers and employees in this country?

Ms Hewitt: Inherent to devolution and the constitutional settlement is the fact that different decisions will be made in different parts of the United Kingdom. Although the Northern Ireland Assembly is suspended, we are proceeding in Northern Ireland in the spirit of devolution. Just as different provisions are made on the NHS in Wales and in Scotland which we do not choose to follow, so we are making our own decision to strike the right balance on licensed premises.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): The Secretary of State clearly acknowledges the position of Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales, but does she think that it is fair that workers and the public in England should be treated differently from Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland? Will she take into consideration the content of the Smoking in Public Places (Wales) Bill, which my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) presented in the last parliamentary Session?

Ms Hewitt: As my hon. Friend is well aware, health is a devolved matter, so there are different approaches to NHS policy in Wales, Scotland and England. Not surprisingly, there are different approaches not to a general ban, but to the specific issue of whether there should be an exemption for licensed premises.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Secretary of State, no doubt inadvertently, implied that a decision made by a Northern Ireland Minister was a result of devolved government. Will you confirm that the Northern Ireland Assembly and devolution are not functioning, so that cannot possibly be a devolved decision? Can you help the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The right hon. Gentleman must not draw me into the argument. I am sure that there are right hon. and hon. Members who can help themselves in this matter.

Ms Hewitt: I am most grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Indeed, I said that the Northern Ireland Assembly was suspended but that we were proceeding in the spirit of devolution.

In making our judgment about licensed premises, we have taken into account the fact that England already has the lowest smoking rates in the United Kingdom. Our smoking rates have fallen faster and to a lower level than in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. We have also taken account of the tension in public attitudes. I referred earlier to the extensive public consultation that we conducted before publishing the "Choosing Health" White Paper. It demonstrated enormous support for a ban on smoking in restaurants and pubs where meals are served. People clearly want to be able to enjoy their meal without someone blowing smoke over their food and into their face. Similarly, people want an extensive ban in most enclosed public spaces, but when they are asked about membership clubs and pubs that do not serve food, most of those who do not smoke—the majority—believe that smokers, even though they are a minority, should none the less have some freedom of choice. They clearly view membership clubs as private clubs run by members for members. Such clubs have always been treated differently from other licensed premises because they are non-profit-making organisations.

Ms Hewitt: May I make this point before accepting further interventions? Those clubs are non-profit-making organisations in which the members make the decisions, just as people make their own decisions in their own homes. It is therefore right to exempt membership clubs, just as it is right to allow people who continue to smoke to do so while they have a drink, provided that they are in licensed premises that do not serve food. This is a difficult judgment to make. It is one on which there has been much argument. I shall give way to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), then I will take further interventions.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. Given that we are debating a public health measure and that the public may take the view that we should not interfere with smokers' right to continue smoking among smokers, where is the public health evidence that the impact of second-hand smoke differs according to whether one is in premises where food is consumed, as distinct from other premises? What is the evidence relating food to second-hand smoke?

Ms Hewitt: I regret that the hon. Gentleman did not tell us whether he supports the measure or not. It would appear that the Opposition cannot make up their mind whether there should be legislation. I have made it clear that in legislating on this matter, which is a matter that directly affects people's own choices about how they behave, we have made the judgment that the right balance to strike is between banning smoking in virtually every enclosed public space and work space, and exempting the membership clubs and the licensed premises that do not serve food, in order to protect freedom of choice for that minority of people whom nobody is forcing to go into a pub that allows smoking, but some of whom none the less continue to do so.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): In respect of the consultation that my right hon. Friend carried out, what account has she taken of health inequalities?

Ms Hewitt: The issue of health inequalities and reducing health inequalities is central to our purpose as a Government, whether it is in health policy and the work that we are doing to improve the national health service, or a series of other aspects.

The point I want to make in relation to the narrow but important proposed exemptions is that bar staff everywhere will have protection against smoking, which does not currently exist. There is at present no law at all in that regard. We will consult on the regulations in this and other areas, and ensure that even in the membership clubs and non-food pubs that decide to allow smoking, smoking will still be prohibited, at least in the area around the bar.

Andrew Mackinlay: What constitutes that?

Ms Hewitt: I hear my hon. Friend from a sedentary position. He anticipates the point that I was about to make. We will consult in particular on whether the best way to achieve that is to designate an area that does not include the bar to be a smoking area or smoking room—a discrete, separate smoking room or smoking area that does not include the bar.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Hewitt: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It would be helpful if the right hon. Lady could make it absolutely clear to whom she is giving way, when there is a forest of hon. Members rising.

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. Gentleman wait a second? My second guess was that the Secretary of State was giving way to Mr. McFadden, but I shall take a point of order from Mr. Hesford.

Stephen Hesford: I am obliged, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Should it not be an ASH of interventions, rather than a FOREST?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the House appreciated that. I call Mr. Pat McFadden.

Mr. McFadden: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will my right hon. Friend clarify what she said a short time ago about the exemptions and a review? Is she saying that if the proposals go through the House in their present form, the Government will give the House an opportunity to review the exemptions in—I think she said—three years, and that those who favour a full ban will have an opportunity to revisit the issue then?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising an extremely important point. As I have said, the Bill provides for a full ban with the power to make exemptions, which will be made by statutory instrument and which will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. If after the review, which we propose to complete within three years, the Government and Parliament decide that they do not want to retain some or all of those exemptions, the matter will simply involve the repeal of the relevant regulation and not further primary legislation.

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North) (Lab): What consideration has been given to making an exemption for what I term "inherently dangerous workplaces"? For example, Acordis Acetate Products has a large chemical site on the edge of my constituency, where there has been no smoking for 40 years because of the inherent danger. It has always provided smoking rooms, so there has been no mix between smokers and non-smokers. If an exemption is not made, employees, who cannot leave the huge site for a quick smoke, may, against all instructions and contracts of employment, smoke on site, and if they were to smoke in the wrong place, the repercussions for public safety would be serious. Has any consideration been given to granting exemptions for such sites?

Ms Hewitt: As far as I know, that particular point has not been put to us—we have considered the specific issue of oilrigs, where workers cannot leave the site. I undertake to consider my hon. Friend's point more closely, but at this stage my response is that we expect workers in such factories, as in other workplaces, to go off the site to smoke, if that is what is required by safety regulations.

As I have said, we shall seek to protect all staff, even in the limited number of premises that allow smoking, through the consultation on smoking areas. We are following the example of virtually everywhere else that has considered how to legislate on smoking in public: California, New York, Norway, Sweden, Australia and many others either have moved or are moving towards a full ban, and they all began by exempting licensed premises and, in some cases, the hospitality industry, before removing those exemptions as public support for the ban grew.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Secretary of State keeps referring to the fact that licensed premises will be exempt. Is she aware that these days almost every pub serves food, so—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that that is not a point of order for the Chair. The Secretary of State is being very generous in taking interventions. Equally, she is taking a generous amount of time and, hopefully, other hon. Members will be able to contribute in due course.

Ms Hewitt: I am drawing my remarks to a close.

It is important to remember that the Government cannot force people to be healthy. The clear message from the public consultation and the central proposition in "Choosing Health" is that people want the Government to help them become healthy and stay healthy, but they do not want the Government to dictate to them. The huge public health challenges that we face as a nation, such as smoking, drinking and obesity, concern people's lifestyles. We must move with public opinion, because we need to help people make different, healthier decisions for themselves, rather than trying to impose such decisions.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: I want to bring my remarks to a conclusion because I am keen that as many hon. Members as possible should contribute to the debate.

This part of the Bill has already aroused considerable debate. Yet the changes that we propose will transform our public places. They will provide a modest degree of choice to those who continue to wish to smoke outside their own home, far better protection for all employees, and far greater choice for workers in the hospitality industry who want to work in a smoke-free environment. The provisions will help us to reduce the number of smokers by a further 0.5 million or more and save up to £100 million a year for the national health service. The measures that I mentioned earlier will help to protect patients from MRSA and other health care infections and modernise the provision of pharmacy and ophthalmic services. I am confident—

Lynne Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Some time ago, before she took a large number of interventions, the Secretary of State was moving on to discuss exemptions in respect of care homes, prisons and other establishments, but she has not continued with the relevant passages of her speech—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to say to the hon. Lady, as I said to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), that that is not a matter for the Chair. I certainly cannot determine the content and shape of the Secretary of State's speech.

Ms Hewitt: I am most grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did indeed say that we would legislate for prisons and for care homes, and that I trusted that those exemptions would not be controversial. If they are controversial, I am sure that they will be discussed in more detail, not only this evening but in Committee.

Lynne Jones: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: I really want to bring my speech to an end.

The Bill is a landmark in the protection of people's health and of public health in our country. It will continue to improve our national health service. I am confident that all my right hon. and hon. Friends, whatever their views on the specific matter of exemptions, will join me in supporting it—unlike the Conservatives, who had 18 years in which they could have acted on this scourge to public health but chose to do nothing.

I commend the Bill to the House.

5.2 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am sure that the House is grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way so frequently, although I hope to be considerably briefer to allow time for the many Back Benchers who wish to speak.

We are not, I am afraid, presented with a landmark Bill in public health. It was our intention, had we been elected in May, to introduce a public health Bill that would have achieved landmark changes in public health. It would have reorganised public health to enable public health directors to use dedicated resources across the public and private sectors, ending the fragmentation of recent years. It would have addressed the whole range of public health issues, including sexually transmitted infections, where the Government have failed lamentably. I have discovered in the past few days that there is to be no advertising of positive sexual health messages to young people this year, in circumstances where sexually transmitted infections are at epidemic levels. A Government who abolished the Health Education Authority and have presided over the highest rate of rising obesity in western Europe have allowed sexually transmitted infections to reach epidemic levels, as compared with a Conservative Government who acted on the problems relating to HIV and AIDS in the 1980s and secured a much lower incidence of HIV. This country now has the fastest rising levels of HIV since 1997.

The Bill is not a landmark measure in public health even as regards smoking. The reduction in the prevalence of smoking was faster in the 1980s than it has been since 1997.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Why does the hon. Gentleman believe that it has taken more than 50 years since the epic work of Sir Richard Doll, who sadly died this year, to do something about the problem? The Conservative party was in office for a large part of that time and did nothing about smoking, although the evidence for second-hand smoking and smoking among doctors existed since the work of Richard Doll. Has that failure anything to do with the dirty tricks campaign of the tobacco industry, which tries to defend the evil weed in the United States?

Mr. Lansley: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to speak later when he can explain what he means by that last comment. I am not an apologist for the tobacco industry. I was simply pointing out that the reduction in the prevalence of smoking was faster in the 1980s. He knows that—I attended the conference that he chaired on the battle against cancer. There has been a long-term reduction in, for example, lung cancer mortality but there are worrying indications. It was wisely noted earlier that difficulties remain with the prevalence of smoking in elements of the population. That is especially true of working-class communities and young women. Smoking by young people has barely reduced in the past five years. He knows from the statistics that were presented to his conference of the all-party parliamentary group on cancer last Thursday that not only has the incidence of lung cancer mortality in young women risen, but overall mortality rates for women are not reducing compared with the substantial reductions in men.

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the proposals that a public health Bill would have contained if the Conservative party had won the election. Would such a Bill have provided for a full ban on smoking?

Mr. Lansley: Before the election, we made it clear in a document that was published in February that we believe that individuals are primarily responsible for their health. Indeed, the Secretary of State made more or less the same point. We therefore want to proceed when possible through voluntary measures and self-regulatory solutions rather than legislative ones.

If I am to disappoint Labour Members, I will disappoint some of my colleagues, too. As we made clear before the election, we would have included provisions in a public health Bill to enforce a reduction in smoking in circumstances in which a self-regulatory solution had not been effective in three years. We did not propose a comprehensive ban. We proposed that, first, wherever non-smokers had access—including licensed premises as well as workplaces—they should not be exposed to second-hand smoke. That is different from private houses and private clubs. Secondly, wherever children had access, they should not be exposed to second-hand smoke. Thirdly—again reflecting a point similar to one that the Secretary of State made—workers in the hospitality industry, such as people who work behind a bar, should not be exposed to second-hand smoke.

Although not a comprehensive ban, our proposals bore a close resemblance to those that the Secretary of State reportedly pressed on her Cabinet colleagues before the publication of the Bill but was prevented from implementing. The proposals that we are discussing are not those that the Secretary of State wanted to introduce.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): My hon. Friend makes some excellent points. On self-regulation and choice, does he agree that, for the Bill to be more effective, we need clarity on the position of private members' clubs, especially those that serve food, and the way in which they can hold annual ballots on smoke-free places in those clubs?

Mr. Lansley: I accept my hon. Friend's contention that we need clarity. That applies to many provisions. The detail of many aspects of the Bill will be filled in later. That is an all-too-depressing characteristic of measures that the Government have presented in recent years.

Chris Bryant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, I want to answer the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) about private members' clubs. The Secretary of State appeared to accept that we were making substantial progress with self-regulatory solutions but claimed that it was not fast enough. She is not proposing to give the industry any additional time to achieve that. For the industry, the flexibility that is inherent in self-regulatory solutions is important commercially.

Whatever may be said about the desirability of limiting the liberty of smokers, private members' clubs should be treated as an extension of a private home in the sense that a club has members who can make decisions about what happens in their club. It seems burdensome for legislation to interfere in that and to prevent members from taking such decisions.

Chris Bryant: As far as I can understand the hon. Gentleman's argument, he is saying that, if the Conservative party had been elected, it was hoping that the market would provide, over the next few years, substantial numbers of clubs and bars where people would be able to go without having to suffer passive smoking. Can he name three bars, apart from those in the House, or pubs anywhere in the country that have gone non-smoking already?

Mr. Lansley: Yes, there is one in Cambridge, which Greene King owns. There is also a large Wetherspoon pub. Unfortunately, it took the Regal cinema in Cambridge and turned the premises into the largest bar area in the country. As it is Wetherspoon, that is non-smoking. I think that I can find the hon. Gentleman at least three such pubs.

To correct the hon. Gentleman—having done so, I must move on to what is in the Bill rather than what might have been in Conservative legislation—I did not say that the market would deliver these things. I said that there would be a self-regulatory solution. I appreciate that there are market pressures, but such pressures can take a long time to have an impact. We were aiming for a self-regulatory solution. He should accept—although Ministers appear not to have accepted it—that, throughout the hospitality industry and in the British Beer and Pub Association and elsewhere, substantial measures have already been put in place to try to deliver smoke-free solutions for customers. The way in which the Government propose to interfere with what might otherwise have been achieved on that basis is excessive.

I am a shadow Secretary of State for Health, and in my view there is no acceptable outcome other than that we deliver much reduced smoking and smoke-free environments for everybody who wants them. There should be smoke-free environments for children, but there is no reference in the Bill to children. There is nothing that says that, wherever children are present, second-hand smoke should not be permitted, although the evidence of the Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health points to the impact of second-hand smoke on respiratory disease, on asthma and on sudden infant death syndrome.

Andrew Mackinlay: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No. I shall carry on because I want to get the evidence on the record. Curiously, the Secretary of State did not get the evidence on the record. I remind my right hon. and hon. Friends that it is not acceptable for us not to make progress. That was at the heart of what we were proposing at the election. We must make progress towards smoke-free environments because the evidence of health effects is increasingly strong.

The Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health set out the evidence straightforwardly. The increase in the risk of lung cancer among non-smoking partners of smokers is about 24 per cent. for women. For non-smoking men who are partners of smokers, there is about a 37 per cent. increase in risk. For those who have workplace exposure, there is an 11 per cent. increase. It estimates a 25 per cent. increase in risk of coronary heart disease resulting from exposure to second-hand smoke.

Insufficient attention has been drawn to this, but what has become most interesting most recently is the significant increase in the risk of coronary heart disease associated with small increases in exposure to second-hand smoke. I shall read the relevant extract from the committee's report:

"The increased risk associated with exposure to SHS"— for coronary heart disease, it is about 25 per cent.—

"is ... a substantial fraction of the risk from active smoking, although uptake of smoke by non-smokers is typically only about 1 per cent. of that by active smokers. Thus it appears that substantial risk arises from quite modest exposure to SHS."

That is the most important extract from the updated advice of the scientific committee. There is not a linear relationship between dose and risk; if anything, there is a non-linear relationship that shows substantial risks associated with modest exposure.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: Did my hon. Friend discuss secondary smoking with the previous Health Secretary, who said that if smoking were banned in most pubs—as it will be, because most pubs serve food—people would be likely to stay at home to have a drink and smoke? That is exactly where their children are. People have a choice whether to go into a pub, but children do not have a choice about breathing in smoke at home.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. The essence of our proposals would have made it possible for non-smokers to be in a smoke-free environment. They would also have made it possible for smokers to continue to be in smoke-filled environments—[Interruption.] The Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) asks how from a sedentary position. It is actually rather similar to what her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was proposing, that is, if a public house can segregate smokers in smoking rooms, it would be able to allow smoking. If it could not, smoking would not be allowed. A public house is open to the public, but it would not be allowed to invite people in if they were likely to be exposed to second-hand smoke against their wishes.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): I want to return to my hon. Friend's earlier point about children. Tomorrow, in the House, I shall launch children's cancer awareness month for CLIC Sargent, and that is an important issue. However, I want to raise exemptions on behalf of a company in my constituency. Does my hon. Friend agree that there should be an exemption under clause 3 for certain workplaces involved in the tobacco trade? A business in my constituency, Hunters and Frankau, is a specialist importer of cigars, but under the Bill, it will not be able to test its products on its premises. The business is located in one of Britain's most deprived wards. [Interruption.] Labour Members may well talk among themselves, but there was a majority for the governing party of only three votes in that ward. That company also imports products from some of the world's most deprived countries, including Cuba. Is it not therefore unreasonable that it should be banned from testing its products on site?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, and I hope to be at the launch of children's cancer awareness month tomorrow. I am also aware of his point about specialist tobacconists. I understand that they have made those points to the Government, but have had no clear answer. I hope that we shall be able to explore the matter further.

I shall come to the other issues in the Bill shortly, but I want to stay with smoking for a moment. I have talked about all the risks involved, but what has been the response to these points? Curiously, no one has mentioned the fact that the Government had plenty of advice on how they should respond to these issues. The chief medical officer's annual report in 2002 made it perfectly clear that he recommended a comprehensive ban on smoking in enclosed public places. He believed that that would lead to a 4 per cent. reduction in prevalence, from 27 per cent. to 23 per cent., which would represent a substantially greater impact on prevalence than anything that the Government anticipate from their own proposals.

How are other people responding to the risks? The Scottish Parliament—whether I agree with it or not—says that, from April next year, it wants a comprehensive ban on smoking in enclosed public places. As the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) pointed out, the Welsh Assembly wants to use the Bill to deliver a comprehensive ban. Speaking about Northern Ireland, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward) has said that "no-one has a right to subject colleagues and workmates to the dangers and hazards of second-hand smoke and passive smoking. No-one has a right to subject members of the public who do not smoke to those same dangers in enclosed public spaces."

Responsibility on this matter is not devolved but held here in Westminster, and that Minister has decided that the only proper course of action would be a comprehensive ban.

Mr. Forth: In exactly that context, does my hon. Friend know whether there will be a total ban on smoking in prisons in Wales and Northern Ireland in order to protect the health of prison warders?

Mr. Lansley: I am happy to confess to my right hon. Friend that I do not know, and perhaps the House does not yet know. I stand to be corrected if the necessary regulations have come forward in relation to Northern Ireland to make that clear. The issue arises in relation not only to prisons but to some care homes and mental health institutions.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The workplace argument does not apply to older people who have retired. Does my hon. Friend concede that large numbers of older people have a habit of decades, dating back to the days when the health risks were not known and tobacco advertising presented the habit as glamorous and sophisticated, and are often beyond smoking cessation programmes? Are they to be confined to their homes? Should not restaurateurs and publicans have a choice, so that if they wish to have smoking premises, those who wish to smoke can opt to go to them, and those who do not wish to smoke can go to non-smoking premises?

Mr. Lansley: I understand my hon. Friend's point, which is important, and it is one of the reasons why exemptions would be needed for people who, to all intents and purposes, are at home, such as people in long-term care. There are limits to liberty, however, and the limit to the liberty to smoke is that one should not impose second-hand smoke and its risks and dangers on others. However sympathetic we might be about the addiction to or habit of smoking among older people, we should not allow that to turn into a risk to the health of others through second-hand smoke.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): As a member of the Science and Technology Committee, I am much interested in the evidence and in what we are trying to achieve. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is most important to achieve air quality standards and that the debate is not so much about smoking and passive smoking as about air quality standards in public and other places?

Mr. Lansley: I understand my hon. Friend's point and we might not have explored fully all the engineering solutions that might help to reduce exposure to toxins emitted through tobacco smoke. Indeed, the aetiology of the increased risk might not be entirely clear. Rather than the nicotine content, which is what is typically measured, other toxins might get into the system and change metabolic responses. We need to be clear about that. It might be intensely difficult, however, to remove the carcinogenic material from tobacco smoke that affects other people.

Lynne Jones: On prisons, care homes and other places where people might reside involuntarily, the Bill provides for an exemption of such facilities from the ban. I accept that a total ban might not be in the best interests of prison officers, carers or residents, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that people who are in prisons or care homes, who might have mental health problems or learning difficulties, are among the most disadvantaged, and might also smoke heavily due to the regime that they are under and the boredom factor? What proposals has he to deal with those health inequalities?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, and she got the chance to make the point that she would have made to the Secretary of State. She will know that the Bill allows for the possibility of such exemptions, although, as on many other matters, it does not say what kind of exemptions the Government propose in respect of care homes, prisons or mental health institutions. Clearly, in many such instances, it will be necessary to construct a regime that protects staff as best one can while avoiding harm to inmates. If one were simply to introduce a smoking ban in mental health institutions tomorrow, for example, serious risk would be posed to some of the care and clinical plans for some of the people inside them.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): My point is supplementary to what my hon. Friend said about mental health institutions. As he suggested, the damage to the health of people in such institutions would be great. Does he know whether the Government have made any provision for increased spending on mental health to try to repair that damage?

Mr. Lansley: I do not know of any specific allocation by the Government. I only know that, in South Cambridgeshire, a significant reduction in mental health resources is expected, and I imagine that that is reflected elsewhere. If my hon. Friend will forgive me, however, I will not proceed down that path.

The debate in which we have engaged during the past few minutes illustrates the difficulty. Even if the Government proposed a comprehensive smoking ban, it would be necessary to explore in detail how it would be applied in specific circumstances. I do not pretend that that would be easy, but we should at least be clear about the objective, which is to enable people to live in smoke-free environments and, wherever possible, to create such environments in order to reduce the prevalence of smoking.

Where does the issue of food come into the debate? I asked the Secretary of State that question, but I am afraid she did not reply. When the Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health published its otherwise admirable report to the Government and the chief medical officer—it appeared alongside the public health White Paper in November last year—it was clearly deficient in not mentioning the instrumental relationship, in health terms, between the consumption of food and exposure to second-hand smoke. That must surely have motivated the Government's conclusion that second-hand smoke was dangerous where food was being prepared, but where no food—or only shelf staples and pre-packaged food—was being consumed, it was not dangerous at all.

What will be the consequences of the structure that the Government propose for future regulations? In September, the British Medical Journal published the report of a survey conducted in Telford and Wrekin. I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) is here. I should have told him that I was going to mention this—I apologise. The survey covered pubs, and all licensed premises, in the borough. Those who conducted it tried to work out what proportion of premises would be exempt, and concluded—on the basis of what they found in Telford and Wrekin—that two thirds of English pubs in deprived areas would be exempt, whereas only a quarter would be exempt in affluent areas. Action on Smoking and Health has made not dissimilar observations; if anything, it has slightly underestimated the proportion of pubs in deprived areas that will continue to be exempt. The survey of all licensed premises, including members' clubs, found that two fifths of establishments in affluent areas and four fifths in deprived areas would be exempt.

Can the Government really imagine that their proposals will result in anything other than a worsening of health inequalities? I am not arguing that the prevalence of smoking would not be somewhat reduced, but we should not exaggerate that. Last year's report to the chief medical officer on smoking in workplaces revealed that there was no smoking in 50 per cent. of workplaces, in 36 per cent. smoking took place only in designated areas and in 5 per cent. people worked alone rather than with others, so only 9 per cent. of people at work would be exposed to second-hand smoke if they did not wish to be. However, the Government's proposal to discriminate between premises on the basis of whether food is prepared and served clearly drives to the issue of health inequalities. It means that health inequalities will widen, when inequalities in health and mortality expectations between the most affluent and the most deprived areas have widened already.

Steve Webb: I follow the hon. Gentleman's logic about health inequalities being exacerbated by the Government's approach, but does that not also apply to his own desire to keep the exemption for private members' clubs? Are they not too concentrated in less privileged places?

Mr. Lansley: Yes, I am not disputing that. There is a balance to be struck between continuing to give smokers the right to choose and protecting everybody else from smoke. I have never pretended otherwise. However, I do not understand where the distinction in relation to food has come from. It will entrench smoking in many clubs and pubs in deprived areas, with no expectation of that ever changing. The Secretary of State said that things would improve over time, but what pressures will there be? When we enact legislation we introduce hard and fast distinctions, and I suspect that this will be one of those.

Andrew Mackinlay: I would like to clear up some confusion in my understanding of the positions of those on both Front Benches with regard to private clubs. As I understand it, both the Opposition spokesman and the Secretary of State are saying that even in private clubs, people will not be able to smoke at the bar because of the duty of care to employees. But what about another point, which the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) has already raised? What about the duty of care to children in clubs in working-class places? If there is a duty of care to one category of people—staff—surely there is a duty of care to children in private clubs. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was with me on that subject.

Mr. Lansley: Actually, I am with the hon. Gentleman. I said that we had three objectives, the first of which was that non-smokers should not be exposed to second-hand smoke. The second applies wherever children are present, so if a private members' club wants to admit children, it should have to choose whether to do that or whether to allow second-hand smoke. It should not be able to do both. I want to speak about other aspects of the Bill as well as smoking, so I shall finish talking about this issue now.

The Government know perfectly well not only that there is no evidence to support their supposition, but that 90 per cent. of the 57,000 responses to the consultation opposed their partial ban and wanted something more comprehensive, in many cases, or something more voluntary, in other cases. People on both sides of the argument regard the Government's proposal as the worst outcome. Astonishingly, when appearing before the Health Committee last week, even the chief medical officer made it clear that in terms of health inequalities this is the worst outcome—worse than no ban at all.

David Taylor rose—

Mr. Lansley: This is the last time that I will give way on the subject of smoking.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify something for the House and extend his earlier comments? It is true that more than 90 per cent. of the 57,000 responses were hostile to the proposed exemption—but he should have gone on to say that those people supported a simple, comprehensive, workable and enforceable ban.

Mr. Lansley: I thought that I did go on to say that most people said that, although some who opposed the Government's proposal wanted a more voluntary approach. However, that is not the point. The point is that people on both sides of the argument do not see any merit in the Government's proposals.

It is for that reason, and considering the range of views in the House, that my right hon. and hon. Friends have agreed to have a free vote on this issue. This is a genuine issue of judgment, which Members of Parliament are perfectly capable of dealing with, and it is not proper to use whipping to try to constrain people to exercise their judgment contrary to their conscience. The official Opposition will have a free vote, and I hope that the Secretary of State will take the opportunity to say that she has thought hard and concluded that there should be a free vote on the Government side as well. [Interruption.] Apparently not.

I now come to the other measures in the Bill. On infection control—a curious theme appears to be emerging—the chief medical officer told Ministers in October 2004 that they should act, through legislation, to provide additional statutory backing. It was not that the Government did not already have the powers, as the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Act 2003 more or less gives Ministers the power to set standards and it is possible to proceed in a similar way with respect to standards in the codes of practice. In 2004, however, the CMO said that we needed additional focus then, but Ministers did nothing about it that year. I cannot blame the Secretary of State for that as she did not hold her present position then, but action could have been taken earlier.

Many things might have been done earlier. The story of MRSA and infection control over the past few years has been one of continuous failure to take the urgent action that is required. I shall provide just one example. The Secretary of State is fond of making a comparison between food hygiene legislation and the responsibilities that should be met in the NHS. The CMO, in "Winning Ways", published in December 2003, said:

> "The new Inspector of Microbiology and the National Patient Safety Agency will work jointly to ensure that the techniques of 'root cause analysis' and the methodology of Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Point . . . are developed for healthcare associated infection and applied in every local NHS organisation."

That is a direct transfer of experience from food hygiene legislation into infection control. I have searched for any evidence to demonstrate that the inspector of microbiology at the NPSA has acted on that or that it is being applied in any local NHS organisation, but I simply have not found it.

When the Secretary of State arrived in office after the election, she discovered that there was a big difference between food hygiene legislation and what went on in the NHS. Anyone could have told her that and anyone could have told her that things could have been done about it. We know that some measures will make a difference: hand hygiene, isolation facilities, clear lines of management accountability, pre-admission screening before operations, post-discharge surveillance after operations, accurate reporting of infection data by clinical departments, optimum bed occupancy—the Secretary of State appeared not to know that the number of beds in the NHS was reducing—24/7 access to high standards of cleaning and expert infection control teams. We know that all those things work, but we also know that, in too many cases, those measures are not being taken.

The Government say that they will bring in a code of practice, so let us look at the draft code to see whether any of those actions that will make a difference are reflected in it. There is no requirement for one board member to have responsibility for infection control and cleanliness. There is no requirement for the standards of cleaning to be in line with the model cleaning contract. There is no requirement for access to 24/7 cleaning on wards. There is no quantitative measure for the availability of isolation facilities. There is no specific requirement for the number of infection control nurses. There is no specific requirement for pre-admission screening before operations. There is no reference at all to post-discharge surveillance. There is no requirement to reduce excessive bed occupancy rates, although we know that there is a strong correlation between that factor and infection rates. There is no requirement for the comprehensive recording and reporting of infections in the terms recommended by the National Audit Office report of more than five years ago.

Although it has many other elements that are laudable in themselves, the code is not actually about outcomes or enforcing actions that we know will have effect. It is actually about processes and policies. Time and again, we have seen what the Government approach to infection control amounts to—a tick box to say that the policies are in place or that the appropriate processes are being undertaken, but too little emphasis on the actions that will make a difference. Patients have a right to know that action that has been demonstrated to work is being actively pursued within the NHS.

We need to know—I note that the Secretary of State refused to answer a question on this matter—that targets and financial pressures will not lead to the compromising of patient safety. We must be sure that the NHS is putting infection control at the forefront of its priorities because all the evidence now shows that that is at the forefront of the public's priorities. If it is to deliver, the draft code must be made stronger. The Government's draft code will not survive. At the moment, the Government propose not to supply us with the final code of practice, which would facilitate debate as the Bill passes through Parliament, but to delay it until after the Bill has been passed. That, frankly, is unacceptable to the House.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue of hospital-acquired infections. Does he agree that while many of us are worried about the uncleanliness of many of our local hospitals, it is a particular concern for vulnerable elderly patients, many of whom are now sadly frightened of going into hospital because of the infections they may pick up there?

Mr. Lansley: I understand exactly the point that my hon. Friend makes and he is right. At the heart of what we need to achieve is an assurance that action will be taken by the NHS that delivers vastly improved infection control procedures across the board, so that our constituents are reassured. I have visited Kettering district general hospital and I know that it is a very good hospital, but—as my hon. Friend knows—the public need reassurance.

I shall give my hon. Friend an example of the kind of measures that need to be taken. We have pressed on the Government for a long time the need for more comprehensive recording of data on infections by clinical department. That is not only because that is the basis on which action should be taken inside a hospital, but because it provides more meaningful measures for those outside the hospital. For example, when I visited the Lister hospital in Stevenage, there was much local concern about the level of MRSA infections. When I talked to staff, it became clear that the hospital's problem was associated with the fact that as well as being a district general hospital it was also a regional centre of excellence for kidney dialysis. It had problems with access to operating theatre time and the extent to which patients on dialysis had to be catheterised, which led to infections. Those distinctions were not known and understood by the local public, because the one figure published by the Government showed that the hospital had a lot of MRSA. The public need to know what is really going on. Information is at the heart of the issue, but the Government continue to resist the National Audit Office's proper call for data to be published by clinical department.

Mr. Devine: In Scotland, over a 15-year period when the Conservatives were in power, compulsory competitive tendering and cuts in cleaning services led to the loss of 15,000 jobs. MRSA increased as the number of domestics in hospitals was reduced. At least this Government have faced up to a problem that the Conservatives denied was happening.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman should ask the Department of Health and the Secretary of State about that. The Department published a report that showed that there was no correlation between the contracting-out of cleaning services and the levels of infection. NHS hospitals with contracted-out cleaning are as likely to have high levels of infection as those with in-house cleaning. However, there is a correlation between the quality of cleaning and rates of infection, and that is why I mentioned the model cleaning contract. The code of practice should directly reflect the standards in the model cleaning contract.

The Government propose to legislate to transfer the responsibility and budgets for general ophthalmic services to PCTs, which raises three issues. First, why are the Government pre-empting the review of general ophthalmic services that is expected to report shortly? Would it not be more sensible to legislate after the review? It will be difficult, in the circumstances, for people to take seriously the Government's approach to the review. Secondly, the Secretary of State made the comparison with dental services, but that is exactly what people working in ophthalmic services are afraid of. How many letters of complaint have MPs had in recent years, before the publication of the Bill, about the quality of local ophthalmic services compared with the number of letters about quality of and access to dental services? Those figures tell the story. As with the 2003 legislation, the Government propose to legislate for a transfer of responsibility to primary care trusts. The National Audit Office made it clear that PCTs did not have the expertise to conduct the commissioning of dental services and still less, probably, do they have the expertise to conduct the commissioning of ophthalmic services.

What will PCTs do? Under current circumstances, in which—in the last financial year—91 PCTs broke their statutory duty to break even, they will be given an additional budget that they will use to try to offset their overall financial problems. People working in ophthalmic services are rightly worried that the consequence will be a reduction in quality and a reduction in access. From a Government who say that they are about choice, what will we have? A reduction in choice for patients, because it will no longer be true that those who are registered with the General Ophthalmic Council will automatically be able to supply services locally to NHS patients; that may be restricted by primary care trusts in ways that we cannot at the moment even anticipate.

Finally, the Secretary of State transferred from the Department of Trade and Industry, where she was previously responsible for competition policy, the issues relating to community pharmacies after the consequences of the review of control of entry regulations. I told her before, in that respect, that one needed to have regard to the health issues associated with maintaining community pharmacies—and I say it again. We should not underestimate the difficulties that might accrue if, in the course of this legislation, we were significantly to shift the balance of advantage towards the large stores with their new pharmacies, which are able to provide a service with relatively limited amounts of professional pharmacy cover. The pharmacists are concerned—and I share their concern—that we strike the right balance in the span of control of pharmacists and the responsibility that they take for the provision of services.

At my count, the Bill has nine issues. Perhaps I have not done justice to any of them, but we will do them all justice later in the Bill's passage. Most of it is a shell, into which regulations are intended to pour decisions. During its passage, we in Parliament should make a few decisions about what goes into it and what happens to our constituents. I hope that we shall do that in a substantive way in respect of smoking by striking out the Government's partial ban, and I leave it to my colleagues and those across the House, perhaps on a free vote, to determine what goes in its place.

I hope that we will get to hard outcomes and clear measures for reducing the impact of health care-associated infections. I hope that we will maintain choice in ophthalmic services, that we will give certainty to pharmacists and protect the profession, and that the Bill, while making progress, will be amended substantially during its passage. On the basis that I hope and expect that the House will amend the Bill, it is not my intention to ask my colleagues to divide against the Bill tonight.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches, which operates from now.

5.48 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): I shall first declare an interest—I am a lay member of the General Medical Council. I have been very conscious in recent years of the events surrounding the deeds of Dr. Harold Shipman, so I want to start by commenting on the measures in the Bill that go some way to redress some of the issues that were found when the Shipman inquiry reported in July 2004 about the regulation of controlled drugs in the community.

The case of Harold Shipman was a very dark chapter in the history of doctors in this country. The fact that he was able to obtain such large quantities of controlled drugs, and the failure of the system to detect his inappropriate use of those drugs over many years, had to be not just found, but corrected if we are to ensure that, hopefully, it never happens again. Dame Janet Smith identified serious weaknesses in the system of regulation of controlled drugs and highlighted the need to introduce a number of changes to strengthen the system, while accepting—as I think we all must—that no system can be totally immune from fraud.

I congratulate the Government on clause 16, which relates to the appointment of accountable officers and provides details of their responsibilities. I understand that those new senior executive posts were proposed in Dame Janet's fourth report, although the report uses the term "proper officer" rather than "accountable officer". Under clause 16, accountable officers will have overall responsibility for the management and use of controlled drugs in such organisations, as well as the arrangements for the audit, inspection and training of staff who work with controlled drugs, thereby ensuring better patient safety than in the past.

Dr. Stoate: Dame Janet concluded that the control of such drugs should be passed to the Royal Pharmaceutical Society, yet clause 18 refers to a constable or other officer being responsible. Do you think that that point needs clarification? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that needs to be brought out properly before the Bill is passed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There were two things wrong with that intervention: first, the hon. Gentleman used the second person when he should not have done so; and secondly, most of his remarks were not addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Barron: I will leave clause 18 to my hon. Friend the Minister, who may talk about that issue. I am more concerned about the fact that health trusts other than strategic health authorities will have someone specifically responsible for such drugs. That is the most important thing, no matter who in the system does it.

[Mr. Barron]

I am concerned that the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) talked about the weakness of the codes that are likely to come into being to protect us from health-care acquired infections. I may be wrong, but I thought that he said that the draft code was not good enough, but that he had not seen it. That seems a bit of a jump that should be addressed. I understand that the Bill will give the Secretary of State the power to provide a statutory code of practice and to place a duty on NHS bodies to comply with that code, as well as the power for the Healthcare Commission to issue improvement notices to non-compliant bodies. I spoke to Healthcare Commission representatives at a meeting yesterday and they want the Bill to ensure that that can happen. They also want the existing intervention powers of the Secretary of State and Monitor—the Independent Regulator of NHS Foundation Trusts—to be used to take enforcement action.

Mr. Lansley rose

Mr. Barron: I will certainly give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I would have thought that he was reasonably happy with that aspect of the Bill. Given that that seems to be the only health policy on which the Conservative party fought the last general election, I would have thought that Conservative Members were cock-a-hoop about the fact that what they said that they would do with health care within about 12 to 18 months of winning a general election has been done.

Mr. Lansley: For the purposes of accuracy, I did not say that I had not seen the code of practice on health care-associated infections, but simply that the Government consulted in July on a draft that struck me as deficient and that they are not proposing to show us a new code, following the consultation, until after the Bill has completed its passage.

Mr. Barron: I misheard the hon. Gentleman.

I want to move on to the aspect of the Bill that is more contentious. I am very conscious of the fact that I am the Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, which is investigating smoking in public places. The Select Committee has not yet reported to the House, so I want to limit my remarks to the three evidence sessions on 20 October and 17 and 24 November, which are marked on today's Order Paper as relevant to the debate on Second Reading.

The Government's intention to exempt drink-only pubs and membership clubs has inevitably caused frustration and anger, not just among the health community but in large sections of the leisure industry that did not want to ban smoking in the first place, but would now prefer a comprehensive ban as that would create a level playing field for them. They do not want to have to consider whether or not they should get out of food and into drink only, given that some sort of ban will be introduced under the Bill.

During a number of evidence sessions, I talked about my apprenticeship as a young man drinking in South Yorkshire pubs. They were largely full of smoke and men and there was little food beyond a packet of crisps. I hope that that culture has changed in many of those public houses, which I sometimes frequent, and that food and families can be seen in them. They are a lot better than they were in years gone by. I would hate to think that we were going to reverse that change in the culture of drinking in our public houses by introducing a Bill that was not specific.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is more than likely that pubs serving grub will eventually give up food and that massive redundancies will therefore take place in the catering trade?

Mr. Barron: I am not too sure whether that is the lesson of the Irish Republic. None the less, there is a danger, and no one knows what will happen on day one if exemptions are granted in the way that the Government propose.

The Health Committee has obviously considered enforcement. Under the Government's proposals, enforcement will be more difficult to achieve, more open to misinterpretation and more costly than under a comprehensive ban. The Health Committee went to Ireland for two days, and one thing that jumped out at us when we talked to people there is that the ban was enforced by people who used the pubs, not by people who work in them or own them, or by people whose duty it is to visit pubs occasionally to ensure that they are run properly. The people who went into the pubs had the opportunity to complain if their pubs were not meeting the requirements set down by their legislation.

Of course, another issue that has been touched on several times in the debate is health inequalities. Exempt pubs and clubs are more likely to be found in areas where health inequalities already exist. The current proposals are likely to work against meeting the Government's targets. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is not in her place, said in her opening address that health inequality targets are central to Government policy. Some of the information received by the Health Committee would suggest that the proposed exemptions will not help to reduce health inequalities.

Most Members have received correspondence from the Local Government Association, whose research shows that in Newcastle 47 per cent. of pubs and clubs would be exempt; in Northamptonshire, 54 per cent. would be exempt; and in Corby, the figure is as high as 85 per cent. Not every pub in my constituency has changed the culture in the way that I explained earlier, and quite a large number of pubs and clubs that are on the wrong end of health inequalities will suffer if the proposal is introduced unchanged.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that by exempting bars that do not serve food, young people will be particularly at risk? Certainly, in many city-centre pubs in Cardiff, young people tend to stand in big groups, drinking without food. Would not such an exemption be very dangerous?

Mr. Barron: It is likely to be very dangerous, but I do not want to go into all the issues about drinking. I see that the clock is ticking away and I do not know whether I have any added time for interventions this afternoon, so I will move on very quickly to what I want to say.

Listening to the Government's arguments, one of the conclusions that I reach—it may be that no one else, including the Health Committee, reaches this conclusion—is that the Government do not want to introduce a complete ban because they believe that it is unpopular. I think that they are wrong. I beg to differ with them. I will briefly look at two issues. First, hon. Members will know that the Office for National Statistics conducts an annual smoking-related behaviour and attitude survey. In the autumn of 2003, 20 per cent. of people believed that no smoking should be allowed anywhere and 51 per cent. believed that there should be mainly no smoking, but that there should be separate areas where smoking could take place. In the autumn of 2004, those figures had changed to 31 per cent. and 47 per cent. respectively. The fact that the second figure had dropped a bit is understandable.

Action on Smoking and Health got YouGov to do the same survey in August 2005. First, people were asked the straight question that the ONS asks in its surveys. It found that 41 per cent. of people believed that no smoking should be allowed anywhere in places they visit when they go out, while 39 per cent. of people believed that there should be separate smoking areas. YouGov then told people about the science of secondary smoking before asking the question again, and found that the proportion of people who said that they would ban smoking in all public places rose to 52 per cent. The evidence shows what has happened in other parts of the world where a ban has been brought in, so I would like to think that we could act a bit more strongly.

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Barron: No, I will not give way again.

The Health Committee and I did an experiment with "You and Yours", the well-known and popular Radio 4 programme. I went on the programme the other week and did a half-hour phone-in. A mixture of people phoned in and all the evidence from the letters and e-mails that the programme received was collated. Some 60 per cent. of listeners—626 people—said that there should be a complete ban.

All I want to say is that what can happen in the rest of the UK should happen in England as well. It is inequitable and I find it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has had his allocation.

6.1 pm

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the Chair of the Select Committee, the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who made a thoughtful and well-informed speech. His and his colleagues' evidence sessions have informed our debate, so it is a shame that the Secretary of State had a higher priority than listening to what he had to say.

I congratulate the Secretary of State and the Government on consulting extensively and listening to what they heard. We cannot deny that the Government consulted the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid) and listened to him. They have done what he asked them to do, so they were consulting and listening. They did not listen to what 90 per cent. of the public wanted, but the right hon. Gentleman is obviously the person who counts.

The priority for Liberal Democrats is the freedom of people to work in a smoke-free environment. As far as I am concerned, this is an issue about the health and safety of employees in England. The health and safety of employees of England is just as important as that of employees in Scotland, Wales, and north and southern Ireland.

I can cite examples of what has happened around the world. I want to take you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—albeit not literally—to the land of the free. No fewer than 300 cities and seven states in the United States have a total ban. Since a ban was introduced in California in 1998, the respiratory health of bartenders has significantly improved. That shows the point of the exercise and where we are coming from. After a six-month trial in Montana, there was a 40 per cent. drop in hospital admissions due to heart attacks. People who are sceptical about the evidence should look at what is actually happening on the ground.

There are those who say, "You may be worried about the welfare of workers, but it is their choice because they can choose to work in a smoky bar or somewhere else." However, if asbestos was found in the roof of a bar, people would not say, "You don't have to work there—go somewhere else." We would say, "It's bad for your health, so we'll do something about it." The onus should be on the workplace to be good for the health of the people who work there and not to harm it.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman, as I do to all his speeches. However, if we were to follow his point to its logical conclusion, we could not allow people to work down coal mines. I am not aware that the Government are going to introduce a ban on that.

Hon. Members: Because you closed them all.

Steve Webb: Yes, the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues went a long way towards achieving that. I draw a distinction between avoidable and unavoidable risk. Being exposed to second-hand smoke is not an inherent part of working behind a bar, so we can, and should, do something about that.

I want to say a word or two about the two major exemptions. As several hon. Members have eloquently said about the exemption for food, there is no logical basis for saying that whether food is served has anything to do with whether second-hand smoke is bad for people. As far as I understand it, people may smoke if pork scratchings are served, but if pork chops are served, they may not. If pork sandwiches are served, it might depend on where they were cooked, whether they were hot or cold, and whether they were brought on to the premises. Nothing in the exemption has anything to do with the welfare of people working in pubs. It is entirely irrational.

Allowing people in so-called wet pubs—I have never quite followed that phrase—to be exposed to second-hand smoke seems to be in conflict with a recent campaign of which I have become aware. The campaign is an attempt to raise awareness of something called the "invisible killer". There will be adverts to "highlight the fact that 'Secondhand smoke is a killer'".

One of the main advocates of the campaign says:

"smokers and non-smokers don't appreciate the full dangers of secondhand smoke. Tobacco smoke contains around 4,000 different chemicals, including . . . 50 known cancer-causing substances, such as arsenic, formaldehyde and ammonia".

The campaign is, of course, the Department of Health's. The person who gave that evidence was the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who will wind up the debate. The NHS campaign was launched on the Department's website this autumn. How can the Department cite all these terrible things about second-hand smoke, which are true, yet say that it is all right for people who work in pubs that do not serve food to breathe it in? I do not understand how the Minister can simultaneously hold those two opinions.

I want to warn the House about the rise of death burger. Many of us who went to university will remember the burger vans that used to ply people on the high streets and what their products used to do to our health. If people can smoke in pubs provided that no food is served there, there will be an explosion—if that is the right word—of death burgers. Burger vans will park outside pubs, and people who want to smoke and eat will go out of the pub to buy a burger and quite possibly bring it back into the pub to eat it. As the burger would not have been provided on the premises, that would be no problem. Such people would get a triple whammy. They could go out to drink, nip outside for a burger and go back into the pub and smoke. The Department of Health is approving that behaviour, so I think that we are missing the point.

It is not only the exemption for food that is irrational, but the link between that exemption and the alcohol policy. It is clear that pubs that serve only a bit of food and do not make much money from that will stop serving food altogether. We will see more of what is inaccurately called vertical drinking—I have never quite understood why it is called that. There will be more pubs in which people will stand and drink, rather than sit and eat. All the concerns about alcohol abuse will increase.

Dr. Stoate: May I assist the hon. Gentleman? He says that it is difficult to define food and to determine whether a particular type of food constitutes cooked food. I met one of my constituency's publicans at a public meeting last night who made the interesting point that beer, by definition, is a food. Does that not rather confuse the situation under the Bill because any pub that sells beer will technically be selling food?

Steve Webb: I had not considered that point, but I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is keeping in close contact with his local publicans, as ever.

I have a further worry, which I have not really thought through, about the exemption's link with alcohol policy. Given the extension of licensing hours—we do not necessarily need to be talking about 24-hour licensing—the situation for bar staff will get worse. If licensing hours are longer, they will be exposed to second-hand smoke for longer. The case for doing something about that, which is the case against an exemption, thus becomes more pressing.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I think that we understand the hon. Gentleman's position on smoking tobacco. I hope that he will comment on his party's position on smoking cannabis. There appears to be some confusion about why he is focusing on smoking tobacco, but ignoring cannabis.

Steve Webb: The hon. Gentleman's comment gives rise to the interesting point that enforcement will be difficult if what is being smoked effectively has to be inspected. Some environmental health officers argue that if we stick strictly to addressing tobacco products, people could always claim that they were smoking something else, which would mean that an investigation of what was being smoked would be required. A broader definition of smoking could thus make enforcement action easier.

The exemption for private members' clubs also makes no sense. As the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) accepted, that exemption will increase health inequalities. Again, we must ask why the health and welfare of people working in private members' clubs is less important than that of other people. What can the Minister say about the danger of "The Rose and Crown" becoming a private members' club, which would allow people to circumvent the ban by becoming members of "The Rose and Crown"? It would not be beyond the wit of a landlord to circumvent the ban by setting up a membership scheme. How can a ban that is full of exemptions that allow it to be circumvented so easily be worth the paper that it is printed on?

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): There is an instance of that in my constituency, where one pub is considering redesignating itself as a membership club. Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the perverse results of such a potentially powerful ban is that establishments will market themselves as smoker friendly, thereby undermining much of the health promotion activity in recent years?

Steve Webb: My hon. Friend helpfully illustrates my point. The ban will be easy to circumvent and therefore possibly ineffective.

The issue of unfair competition may appeal to Conservative Members. With a partial ban, which the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire seems to support, a private membership club can have smoking, but that may not be possible for the pub down the road. If they are the only two establishments in a town, the private membership club has an unfair advantage over the pub, which is covered by different and broader legislation. That is unfair competition. It is neither logical nor fair.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): There is another problem with the partial ban. A disabled person—registered or not; it does not matter—who has a debilitating respiratory disease may feel entitled to use measures in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and take a case against a landlord or licensee who enables smokers to use their premises. The disabled person may feel discriminated against by not being able to use those premises because it could further damage their health. Does the hon. Gentleman agree with that assessment?

Steve Webb: That possibility has been raised in the context of employment rights. Provided that there continue to be smoking pubs, a disabled person who might otherwise be able to work in a smoke-free environment will be effectively debarred from applying for a job in those pubs. The implications for people who have those sorts of disabilities need to be considered.

We touched on health inequalities. There is a danger that we think of the problem as a north-south issue, but even in relatively prosperous areas it is clear that the inequalities in health will be exacerbated by the Bill. My director of public health in south Gloucestershire—a relatively prosperous area—tabulated the pubs that do and do not serve food across the authority. The director found that all the pubs in the most prosperous fifth serve food, but 41 per cent. of the so-called wet pubs are in the poorest fifth of the area. So the partial ban will increase inequalities within areas and between areas, not just across the country as a whole.

Stephen Williams: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the initiative undertaken recently by Smoke Free Bristol. The city is next to south Gloucestershire. It found that only 12 per cent. of people in the Henleaze ward in my constituency smoke. However, just a quarter of a mile away in the Southmead ward in the constituency of the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith), smoking is at nearly 50 per cent. Those health inequalities, in a relatively small area, will be perpetuated and expanded if the Bill goes through.

Steve Webb: My hon. Friend is right. For the Government to say that tackling health inequalities is a key priority and then to put in place a measure that will make them worse does not stack up. When they launched the embarrassing statistics in the summer that showed that health inequalities had risen under them, the answer was, "We have these things called spearhead primary care trusts, which deal particularly with deprived areas." When the spearhead PCTs responded to the consultation, they said:

> "Many spearhead PCTs suggest that the proposed legislation will make it harder for them to meet their targets on health inequalities".

In reflecting on the comment on conflicting targets, we have one bit of the Government setting targets for relatively deprived areas to reduce inequality while another bit of the same Department is making it harder for them to reduce inequality.

We have heard, and the Health Select Committee was advised in its oral evidence, that enforcement is more difficult with a partial ban. Presumably, I will have to go up to the bar and ask the barmaid whether she sells pre-packaged ambient shelf-stable snacks before I can decide whether to light up. That is the criterion. It is absurd to have separate categories. We heard about Ireland, and if the other customers do the enforcement, they need to be clear about the legislation. If a place serves food at lunchtime but not in the evening, a customer who uses it in the evening is supposed to know that to determine whether he can smoke.

Stephen Williams: I notice that the Minister is trying to be helpful by saying, from a sedentary position, that signs will help people in such circumstances. May I relate my experience as a director of the Watershed Media Centre in Bristol? We tried to ban smoking from a large part of the café bar by, at one time, placing signs on every table. As there is a mix of where people can and cannot smoke, people use the element of doubt to ignore the signs and carry on smoking. Signs are not always the right answer.

Steve Webb: My hon. Friend is right. Essentially, we are partly talking about a cultural shift towards smoke-free workplaces. That message will be hampered by the phased introduction of the Bill and by different rules for different establishments. The picture will be confusing and will not make a clear statement about the rights of the people who work in such environments.

On phasing, there will be confusion if certain establishments have a ban first, if others follow on later and if some are not covered by the legislation. The Secretary of State said that she expects a total ban and that we will get there eventually. We heard that the chief medical officer used the phrase to the Select Committee about states around Europe and beyond falling like dominoes towards a total ban. The Secretary of State said that the people who introduced total bans often did so in stages, but in many cases they realised that it was unworkable to do it partially and got on with it. Why do we have to repeat their mistakes?

The Chairman of the Select Committee, the right hon. Member for Rother Valley, put his finger on it when he said that the Government have not introduced a total ban because they are afraid. They are afraid to lead public opinion and want to follow it. We need a courageous visionary Government, who are willing to take the lead and set an example. I imagine that the full ban will come into effect and, two or three years later, no one will conceive of turning the clock back.

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): Does my hon. Friend acknowledge the research by groups such as Action on Smoking and Health which recognises that four in five smokers wish that they did not smoke? We are talking largely about liberty and freedom. Many people think that an addiction is an encumbrance on their freedom and would welcome the opportunity to go to work or to a social setting where smoking is not rammed down their throat and temptation is removed.

Steve Webb: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point about the liberty argument, which our party considered. We are primarily concerned with the liberty of those who work in such environments, but where addiction is involved, we may, in many cases, going with the grain. Individuals who want to give up but who have found it difficult might appreciate such a measure. It is not patronising or nannying. It could assist people to do something that they want to do. Perhaps the most appropriate day to introduce the ban is 1 January, although midnight might create operational problems if everyone had to stub out their cigarettes halfway through the evening. Noon on 1 January might be a better time because it would assist those who want to make a new year's resolution to follow the grain of that decision.

I asked the Secretary of State what she had said to the Cabinet and did not get the straightest of answers. However, we are reliably informed that she pressed for a total ban. If she wants that, then I agree with her. However, it means that her argument that the Labour manifesto said that there would be only a fudgy ban falls down. If she pressed to go beyond that, how did she justify going beyond the terms of the manifesto? She did so because it was right and the best policy to adopt. On smoking, the Westminster Government have got it right, but only for Northern Ireland, where there is a total ban. How, therefore, can they adopt a different approach for England? I can see nothing about the situation in Northern Ireland that would warrant its workers having a different level of protection from those in England.

The Bill deals with other important subjects. On health care-acquired infections, a group of people who had been bereaved by MRSA held a lobby yesterday. That group—MRSA Action UK—presented a petition to Downing street. I think hon. Members on both sides of the House joined them. I laid a wreath with them at Westminster abbey in commemoration of their friends, relatives and loved ones who had died.

One thing that the group is calling for is mandatory national reporting of all health care-acquired infections, which we do not have. The estimate is that only 6 per cent. of all infections have to be reported. That relates to bloodstream MRSA only—not all cases of MRSA have to be reported. I hope that the Minister explains why there is not more mandatory national reporting. The scale of the problem is immense and although we heard reassuring words from the Secretary of State about the progress that is being made, across Europe we have one of the worst rates of Staphylococcus aureus infection. It is about 40 per cent. in the UK—one of the highest in Europe—and the right hon. Lady's reassurances were complacent on that front. Having met relatives of those who have died from MRSA, I urge her to listen carefully to what they say and to take much more serious steps.

I echo the question of the Public Accounts Committee—how can the 80 per cent. or so of infections not covered by the Department's mandatory surveillance programme be measured and managed? If they have not even been reported, how does the Department of Health know what is going on?

We have already heard about things that can be done to tackle infection and about infection control. As for bed occupancy rates, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) pressed the Secretary of State on what trusts will do if they have two conflicting targets. The answer was "Meet both". I accept that that is the ideal solution, but what if one target conflicts with the other? As the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire rightly said, what if there is pressure to close a ward because of infection, but that decision is overruled by the trust managers? There is nothing in the Bill to prevent such conflicts, so the Government must make it clear that infection control is a priority.

The right hon. Member for Rother Valley, the Chair of the Health Select Committee, spoke about the Shipman inquiry, and said that the Bill will improve current practices, which we welcome.

The Bill includes some worrying provisions on ophthalmology. All I can say is that if dentistry is the precedent, heaven help us. If access to ophthalmology services is cash-limited and restricted, as Opposition Members have said, many of our constituents will be concerned. The Bill was originally to be called the Health Improvement and Protection Bill. The Government dropped the words "Health Improvement" and "Protection", because this is a missed opportunity to do far more of both.

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): I should like to make one or two simple points.

Smoking in enclosed spaces kills people. It kills smokers themselves, and it kills non-smokers who inhale second-hand smoke. It is obviously a good idea to try to stop people smoking in enclosed public spaces if possible. There is no longer any "if" about it, however, as we know that it can be done. Smoking in enclosed public spaces has been banned in Ireland, where the sanction has proved both workable and enforceable. It has stopped people inhaling second-hand smoke, and it has helped smokers to give up. Fewer cigarettes are being sold in Ireland, and fewer people are smoking. The ban in the Irish Republic has been so successful that our Government are to introduce a total ban in Northern Ireland. Having checked with the Clerks, I believe that that will require a vote in the House before it can be brought into effect. The Scottish Parliament is introducing a similar ban in Scotland, and the Welsh Assembly intends to use the measure to do the same thing.

Stephen Williams: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Dobson: No, I would like to make progress, as other hon. Members would like to make a contribution.

The Government want only a partial ban in England. Smoking is to be banned where food is sold, but it will not be banned where food is not sold. Pubs, clubs and bars serving booze but not food are mainly located in poor neighbourhoods, and serve working-class people, so the partial ban will be good for the health of middle-class people but bad for the health of working-class people, who are ill more often and die sooner than the middle classes. The partial ban introduced by the Labour Government will widen the health gap between the social groups. No one has mentioned the fact that the partial ban will concentrate smokers and smoke in pubs where smoking is permitted, because smokers will move to them from places where smoking is banned. The partial ban will therefore make the situation worse for people in those pubs. It is hard to believe that a Labour Government are knowingly widening the health gap.

Smoking is one of the major causes of the health gap. Headlines in two Sunday papers said "Glasgow is Britain's smoking capital" and "Glasgow people have the shortest lifespan". There is a clear connection between smoking and early mortality, as has been pointed out by the chief medical officer in his advice to the Government and in his public statements. Professor Sir Liam Donaldson believes that there should be an outright ban, but the Government have decided to ignore his professional advice. It is his job to try to promote good health, but the Government have ignored his advice, just as they have ignored the advice of the distinguished doctor, Professor Dame Carol Black, president of the Royal College of Physicians, who also gave evidence on the matter.

The Government proposals are half-baked and half-hearted, without any merit at all. Most members of the catering trade take the same view, and they would rather have no ban or a full ban, because half a ban is a great deal of trouble for them. The environmental health officers responsible for enforcing the measure believe that a half-ban is unworkable and difficult to enforce. Under the measure, smoking in bar "areas" will be prohibited. What is the bar area? I represent an enormous number of lawyers, and I am sure that they have spotted that wording in the Bill. Some establishments that do not serve food consist only of a bar. Hon. Members may not visit such places, but they exist, so I think that the lawyers will do well. If anyone thinks that they can make a distinction between one part of a room that does not have any smoke and another part that does, they should have tried flying Iberia when the airline banned smoking on one side of the aisle, but permitted it on the other. That ban did not work very well.

May I tell my hon. Friend the Minister, who has the task of defending the Government's policy, that Professor Alex Markham, the chief executive of Cancer Research UK said yesterday that the Government had a huge number of achievements in tackling cancer to their credit. They have quite a few achievements in promoting the reduction of smoking and helping people to stop smoking, thus reducing the incidence of cancer and improving recovery rates. We should not be distracted and throw that credit away by coming up with this half-cocked measure.

We have had many debates in the House in the past few years about weapons of mass destruction. The worldwide weapon of mass destruction is the cigarette, which has killed more people than all the weapons, bombs, mines and bullets since the second world war, far exceeding anything that we have managed to do by trying to blow one another up or to shoot one another. In our country alone, it kills more than 100,000 people every year, but we are giving up an opportunity to make progress.

Finally, last year, I had the singular pleasure of speaking on the same platform in Edinburgh as Sir Richard Doll who, in his 90s, made a fine speech about his initial work to identify the link between smoking and cancer. I made the people present, who were from across Europe, stand in honour of a man who had saved millions of lives. We seldom meet people who save millions of lives, but he has left us an enormous legacy—a better legacy than most politicians are likely to leave, I might add. It would not be a bad addition to his legacy to persuade the Government to introduce an outright ban instead of a partial ban that will not do any good. It will not be enforceable. That partial ban should be avoided by a Labour Government who, as the Secretary of State has said, are dedicated to reducing social and health inequalities, because it will serve to do nothing but increase them.

6.29 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I agreed with two things that the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) said. The first is that we all owe a great debt to Sir Richard Doll, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman spoke for the whole House in what he said on that subject. Secondly, the Government's policy on the subject of statutory smoking bans is, in the right hon. Gentleman's opinion and in mine, half-baked and unenforceable. The difference between us is that, unlike the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), who both draw from that the conclusion that we should proceed to an outright ban, I shall speak against the principle of statutory smoking bans.

I do so, as the House is aware, as a former Secretary of State for Health. It would have been an unpopular argument for a Secretary of State for Health in office to advance. I also do it from a personal point of view, as a lifelong non-smoker and somebody who has a deep dislike of smoky atmospheres—so much so that when I go into a pub that has a smoky atmosphere, I go out again, because I do not like it. That is my freedom as an individual, and it is that freedom which lies at the base of my remarks.

As Secretary of State, I of course received advice from the chief medical officer, and successive chief medical officers have argued in favour of statutory action against smoking. I also met many, many clinical staff who were emotionally committed to the principle that it was part of the Government's job to tilt the system more heavily against smokers. However, we should not proceed on the basis of the Government's half-baked proposal, and still less in the direction that the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras and the hon. Member for Northavon advocate. I shall set out briefly why.

At root, my reason is that, like my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), I have always described myself as a liberal Conservative. By that I mean, among other things, that I think it is part of our job in this place to defend private space against the well-meaning aspirations of a well-meaning state. I have no doubt that the clinicians who argue for statutory smoking bans do so for the very best of motives. I accord to the Secretary of State and to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who argued from the Opposition Front Bench for a different form of compromise, the best of intentions, but sometimes we in this place should defend private space, particularly the private space of unfashionable minorities, among whom we should now number smokers.

Against that background, I shall go through the arguments that are used to justify the proposals for smoking bans. First—this is the weakest argument of all, which, with respect to him, was advanced by an hon. Member from the Liberal Benches—there are those who say, "It will help me give up smoking". It is not a safe guide for public policy to legislate to encourage somebody to do something that they want to do for their own private benefit. Of course, as a private citizen, one to another, I would encourage people to give up smoking. As a result of the work of Sir Richard Doll and his successors, we all acknowledge that smoking causes cancer and therefore premature death. We should not be mealy-mouthed about that, but we should not use the power vested in us as legislators to impose on people a private benefit that they may wish for themselves, but which they apparently cannot deliver for themselves without legislative backing. That is no basis for public policy.

Tim Farron: Is not the right hon. Gentleman guilty of not giving due balance to the right of the non-smoker and of classifying a space as private when, in fact, it is public? We are speaking about balancing liberties. As a liberal Conservative, surely he recognises that some liberties encroach upon the liberties of others and should therefore be curtailed.

Mr. Dorrell: I shall come on, if I may, to that argument. I was trying to respond specifically to the argument that "a ban on smoking will help me give it up", which I do not think is a guide to policy.

Mr. Barron: When the right hon. Gentleman was Secretary of State for Health, he did not spend anywhere near the amount of money that the present Government have spent on smoking cessation. Ireland had a smoking prevalence of one in three before the ban. After 18 months of the ban, the smoking prevalence is one in four. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there is a lot to be gained from taking such action—not banning smoking, but banning it in places such as pubs and clubs?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall make two points in reply to that. First, during our years in government, tobacco consumption fell, and I think I am right in saying that it is starting to rise now, particularly among teenage girls. Secondly, the argument that if we deliver a reduced level of smoking, we deliver a public health gain is transparently true; that is not in dispute. The question is whether that is a basis for legislative action. That is the second argument that I shall come to.

Frank Dobson rose—

Mr. Dorrell: I shall give way once more, then I shall make progress.

Frank Dobson: In his liberal Conservatism, the right hon. Gentleman—who usually talks more sense than he is talking now—predicates his entire argument on the idea that smokers can come to a voluntary decision. They are smokers because they are addicts, and we owe it to addicts to help them break their addiction.

Mr. Dorrell: I do not agree with that argument. There are very few people, if any, who are clinically unable to give up smoking. I entirely accept that it is difficult, but the right hon. Gentleman needs to be careful of that argument. He is in danger of saying that the people of whom he spoke, in low-income and disadvantaged groups, are unable to make on their own behalf decisions which, from the level of tobacco consumption, one can see that better off people have made. That is not true and it is a patronising argument for us even tacitly to endorse.

The next argument is closely allied to the argument that a ban will help people give up smoking. It is the argument behind public health targets related to tobacco consumption. As Secretary of State for Health, I was always uneasy about public health targets that could be delivered not as a result of Government action, not as a result of collective action, but only as a result of private decisions by private citizens. It is not a proper basis for public policy to introduce a measure that I find objectionable for the reasons that I am describing, in order to deliver some public health objective about reducing tobacco consumption, which can be delivered only by private citizens making a private choice about their own private behaviour. The job of the public health Minister is to use resources in a way that is targeted at health need, but always to understand that private citizens should be free to make their own decisions about the way they lead their lives.

The third argument that is advanced is that we should introduce a smoking ban in order to create a more pleasant environment for people like me who do not like going into smoky pubs—again, not a good guide for public policy, and not a reason for compulsion, though a very strong reason for individual publicans and restaurateurs to introduce no-smoking policies in their establishments, which attract people like me and presumably do not attract those who want to go in and be able to smoke.

On the final argument, it was interesting that the hon. Member for Northavon rested his argument in favour of a smoking ban almost exclusively on the grounds of a safer working environment. All around the country, employers and employees have for a generation been agreeing no-smoking policies in their establishments, without the assistance of the Government. I applaud that. In my own business we operate a no-smoking policy because that is the decision that the individuals on the sites have collectively reached. I do not believe that a ban should be imposed from here, because individual employers and employees should be free to decide the matter for themselves.

In addition to the public health driver that explicitly informs smoking bans, there is a strong whiff of political correctness—we know the scientific facts and what is good for the people who send us here. Our righteousness is reinforced when we present that argument, because we can quote scientific evidence to support our assertions of what is good for people. We then make the fatal leap—this is where I part company from the prevailing majority—that because we know how people could better lead their lives from a health point of view, we should use our available powers to lead them to do things that they would not choose to do for themselves.

The Prime Minister is fond of talking about respect, and he is dead right when he says that we should learn better to respect each other. We should understand, for example, that two adult citizens in a free society—this is almost the definition of a free society—can look at the same set of facts, come to two diametrically opposite conclusions and both be right. We will have learned the real meaning of respect when we respect the conclusions that other people reach when they are presented with the same facts as us, but reach opposite conclusions.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I have the greatest respect for medical officers, and when the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) was responsible for the health service, a substantial body of medical opinion called for bans such as those in the Bill. I congratulate the Government on going so far with what will hopefully be a landmark Bill on smoking. After 18 years of Tory Government, we should now make as much progress as possible.

The Bill could have gone much further than a partial ban on smoking. As I said in an intervention, my greatest concern is what the Bill will do for health inequalities. That concern is shared by not only Sir Liam Donaldson in his evidence to the Health Committee, but many other distinguished people. The Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who has responsibility for public health, must satisfy herself that the Government are dealing with health inequalities.

My primary care trust, which is a spearhead trust, is getting extra money to deal with health inequalities—the increase is some 9.4 per cent. this year and 8.4 per cent. next year. We do not want legislation that makes the matter worse, and the more that I look at the evidence and the situation on the ground—I speak as an ex-smoker—the more I believe that the Government should use the time between now and Royal Assent to make sure that they are doing everything that they can to reduce health inequalities. The issue concerns changing behaviour, because nothing can be done by legislation alone. It involves hearts and minds as well as legislation, and properly trained enforcement officers will be important, too.

I was interested in the contribution by my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who is Chairman of the Health Committee. On 24 November, the Committee took evidence from the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health, of which I am vice-president. In its comments, the CIEH makes it clear that it strongly opposes the proposed exemptions for pubs and clubs that do not serve food. The CIEH position is that all workers should be afforded an equal level of protection.

I have this to say to hon. Members who have already spoken: we are not discussing private places; we are discussing public places. There is no justification for exempting premises where workers are exposed to the greatest risk. The CIEH believes that its members will face the serious ethical issue whether it is professionally acceptable to participate in the enforcement of a law that unjustifiably fails to protect whole categories of vulnerable people and may be open to subsequent challenges under human rights legislation. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to speak to those who will enforce the legislation.

I know that time is limited and that many other hon. Members want to speak. In the short time remaining, I shall refer to the issues that concern my local spearhead PCT. Smoking is the single most important cause of illness and death in Stoke-on-Trent, where it kills more than 450 people each year. Are we sure that it is right to leave the most vulnerable workers at risk from the dangers posed by breathing other people's tobacco smoke?

Exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke has been linked to lung cancer and heart disease since the 1980s, when many people started to campaign to bring about a ban on smoking. In my constituency, 64 per cent. of licensed premises do not serve food and will therefore be exempt from the smoke-free legislation. In the most deprived wards, however, 84 per cent. of pubs will be exempt, leaving both workers and the community at risk and contributing to the social acceptability and normalisation of smoking within those communities. Moreover, the PCT in Stoke-on-Trent and I believe that two out of every three smokers who want to quit are hindered by the environments in which they socialise.

Hon. Members have already covered many aspects of the debate. I shall briefly refer to the views of Charles Pantin, a consultant physician at the University hospital of north Staffordshire. He has written to me setting out the medical evidence on the risks to health from second-hand smoke, including the links to heart disease, asthma, reduced lung function, chest discomfort and all other associated illnesses.

This is a momentous opportunity for the Government to make a positive impact on smoke-free workplaces. We must make sure that we are doing everything that we can to help those who want to quit to do so and to prevent people from starting to smoke. This two-tier legislation does not send a simple, concise message. The Bill should contain a comprehensive, simple law to end smoking in the workplace. I urge the Minister to examine carefully the concerns raised by those hon. Members who want to see more being done to reduce health inequalities.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): My two least favourite words in the political lexicon are "modernisation" and "prohibition". When I looked through the Bill, I found that although the first of those is, happily, not present, the second one, sadly, is—right up front. I also found that "regulations" occurs 18 times, "offence" occurs 20 times, and "enforcement" occurs 10 times. In schedule 1, "penalty" occurs 19 times, "offence" six times and "enforcement" three times. What have we come to, that we are being asked to take this approach in order to do what many people see as the right way forward?

I very much agree with the approach taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who succinctly set out the case that is in danger of going by default in this debate: in a mature, informed society, we should surely leave individuals as much opportunity as possible to exercise their choice and discretion. That should be informed, of course. There is a duty on the Government of the day, and on us, to do what we can to inform people about the risks that they may be taking in terms of their health and safety.

Stephen Hesford: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the logic of his position is that he would legalise class A drugs?

Mr. Forth: The policy on drugs has been such an overwhelming failure until now that it is time that we had the courage to look at the issue properly, instead of being afraid of it and cringing from it. That is for another day, however. I shall happily engage in a debate on that subject with the hon. Gentleman, but not here.

I would certainly want to push as far as I could the freedom of adult, informed individuals to decide what they do with their bodies, and indeed with and between each other. That is my preference. I always recoil when I have presented to me proposed legislation that seeks to impose on a large number of people the wishes of experts or politicians, because that is not why I came into politics or why I am here.

Another irony is that all of us, in all political parties, pay lip service to local community decision making. I agree with that. However, when we are faced with it as a reality, we tend to recoil from it and resort to centralised decision making and imposition. My solution is that we should encourage workplace decision making of the kind that my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood mentioned. I see no reason why proprietors and work forces in offices, factories, restaurants and pubs should not be able to get together to make their own decisions about whether their premises should allow smoking, ban smoking or allow different things in different parts of the premises.

Last night, I went to St. Stephen's tavern, right next door to us here in Westminster, to assess the effectiveness of the removal of smoke from the atmosphere. I even lit up a cigarette and puffed at it energetically to see what would happen. Everyone present in the room agreed that although people were smoking, there was no trace of cigarette smoke at all. I can see one or two hon. Friends who were also there. Instead of instinctively saying, as so many politicians do, "We're going to try to use the force of the law to make you good people out there do what we think is right for you", why cannot we challenge people to take a sensible approach to the vexed subject of smoking? Why cannot we challenge proprietors to ensure that their premises are smoke-free by using the technology that is now freely available and was demonstrated to some of us last night? Why not allow that element of choice to prevail?

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood said, we can use our power as consumers to try to persuade people to do what we think is right. In other words, if we find smoke offensive, we can decide not to use bars, pubs, restaurants or other premises where it is present. If sufficient of us were prepared to do that, their proprietors would have to make a decision on whether to deem them smoke-free or partly smoke-free. I see no reason why we, as consumers, as well as proprietors and members of the work force, cannot make rational choices in the workplace and in the community. That is preferable to having us here reaching for the law—as we so often instinctively, and wrongly, do—and seeking to impose our view on our citizenry and voters.

I shall reluctantly support the Bill on Second Reading in the hope that we can water it down in Committee or on Report to move it towards a more truly liberal approach than the rather heavy-handed approach that it takes at the moment. I am not terribly optimistic, but I shall do my best to move it in that direction.

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North) (Lab): Unlike the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who could by no stretch of the imagination be described as a zealot about anything, I admit to being a bit of a zealot when it comes to smoking. Indeed, I have been a virulent anti-smoker for many years. If someone put my name into Google or looked me up in "Who's Who", they would see that I once described smoking as a dirty, filthy, stinking, antisocial, expensive, bourgeois habit. [Interruption.] That is my weird sense of humour. We all know that these days smoking is generally a working-class habit.

I approach the subject with an almost missionary fervour. About 10 years ago, when the issue of not smoking was not particularly fashionable, I was leader of Derby city council, where we brought in an anti-smoking policy. We stopped all smoking in the work force and required people who indulged in this dirty, filthy, stinking, antisocial and expensive habit to go to little nicotine-ridden rooms where they could have a quick drag in clouds of smoke. We did that because there was a huge conflict between smokers and non-smokers in open office areas.

We introduced that policy in June 1995. In November 1995, we went further and wrote it into people's contract of employment and stated it in all job adverts. Applicants were advised that we had a clear non-smoking policy and that, if they wanted to smoke in the workplace, they need not bother to apply for a job at Derby city council. I came in for some heavy criticism. I was told, "You're denying the city council the chance of employing the very best employees around." I replied, "I think that people who smoke are stupid, and why would Derby city council want to employ stupid people?"

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): If someone wanted to work in a pub that allowed smoking, would my hon. Friend use exactly the same argument and therefore argue for allowing smoking in pubs?

Mr. Laxton: Yes, there is an argument for that.

By now, anyone would have concluded that, as a virulent anti-smoker, I would be very much in favour of a total ban across the piece. I took that view until about six months ago, but I have finessed it a little because of some of the impositions that have been put on the statute book. I do not want to drag up banning hunting with dogs, but we have seen that people are circumventing that legislation and operating illegally, or with dubious legality.

I have changed my position and, if there is a Division tonight, I shall support the Government. The Bill gets us 90 or 95 per cent.—some would say 99 per cent.—of the way to achieving our aim. In talking to heavy smokers, I have found that some accept that smoking is bad for their health, colleagues and families, including their children, but have no intention of kicking the dirty, filthy, stinking, antisocial and expensive habit. Those people will smoke, come what may.

Martin Horwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Laxton: No, I shall not take interventions.

The Bill gives people such as me an element of choice, which I do not currently have. Most pubs allow smoking in part of their establishment. Perhaps they do not allow it in the restaurant or perhaps they have a no-smoking area, but most restrictions are ineffective in practice.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Laxton: No.

Mr. Knight: To me?

Mr. Laxton: No, not even to the previous Conservative Member for Derby, North, whom I was pleased to defeat at the time.

The non-smoking facilities in many public houses are inadequate. Under the new arrangements, I shall have a choice. I will be able to go to a wide variety of establishments if—as I do—I wish to socialise in a non-smoking environment. Those who want to smoke, insist on smoking and demand the right to smoke will be able to go to establishments that are full of cigarette smoke where they can indulge their dirty, filthy, stinking, antisocial and expensive activity. The Bill provides an element of choice that hitherto did not exist.

Some Conservative Members suggested that public houses would decide to junk food and become drinking-only establishments so that they could get the punters in, chuffing away fast and furiously. I do not believe that that will happen. If we consider how social activity and public houses have changed in modern Britain, we realise that most establishments need to sell food to stay in business. In my locality—I guess that it is not very different elsewhere—all country pubs, pubs on the fringes of cities and those near city centres sell food. If they did not, they would not survive. If they decided to get rid of food to attract people who wanted to indulge in the dirty, filthy, stinking, antisocial and expensive habit, they would go out of business. Market forces mean that there will be public houses full of smoke and—thank God—public houses that have a clean environment, where people such as me can go and breathe reasonably fresh air and, perhaps for the first time, enjoy the wonderful aroma from the head of a good pint of Marston's Pedigree.

The Government have got it just about right. That is why I shall support the Bill.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton), who runs a serious risk of serving on the Committee because, until he spoke, the score was: Secretary of State 0, Labour rebels 3. I hope that the Committee of Selection reflects the variety of opinion on the Back Benches when it chooses a Committee to consider the detail of the Bill.

Before I deal with part 1, I should like briefly to mention clause 34 on ophthalmic services. The Macular Disease Society is based in Andover in my constituency and it and the Royal National Institute of the Blind have raised some issues that are best considered in Committee about the services that are optional and those that the primary care trust must provide. However, as smoking at least doubles a person's chance of losing sight in later life, that brings me to part 1 and the wisdom of my party's allowing us a free vote. I take a substantially different view from that of my right hon. Friends the Members for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) and for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood prefaced his remarks with a definition of what an individual was entitled to do in a private space. I agree with him. However, the Bill does not deal with what an individual does in a private space. Clause 2 makes clear the spaces that we are discussing.

We have made great progress in reducing the number of avoidable premature deaths that are caused by smoking. The Bill offers an opportunity to build on those achievements. However, there is a risk of a missed opportunity because of the political compromise on which it is built. That is an unsound foundation for a credible public health policy. If, as the Secretary of State implied at the weekend, it is right to introduce a total ban in three years, it is right to do it now. It would be absurd to have two bites at the cherry and two different regimes. It is worth reminding hon. Members, especially Labour Members, of the Prime Minister's words at the Labour party conference:

> "Every time I've ever introduced a reform in government, I wish in retrospect I had gone further."

That applies to this measure.

When I was first elected, the House of Commons sold its own cigarettes, with the green portcullis on the pack. My first modest engagement against the tobacco industry was with the then Catering Committee. I asked it to withdraw the product on the ground that it gave parliamentary validation to an activity that killed thousands of our constituents. I failed, but it agreed to reduce the cigarettes on sale from high to low tar. The product was subsequently rightly removed from the shelves.

Parliament has not hesitated to use legislation to combat smoking. The ban on television advertisements dates back to the 1960s. More recently, we have introduced legislation to ban advertising except at the point of sale. I welcome that. We have also used voluntary agreements but they have been less satisfactory because the industry has been reluctant voluntarily to concede anything that would do it serious harm.

The Bill is a legacy from the previous Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid). He was not quite as bad as the chain-smoking health Minister in "Yes, Minister", but he did the Department's reputation no good in proposing the compromise a year ago. I recall telling him in the House at the time that it would not work. However, due to secondary lobbying, his influence is pervasive and visible in the Bill. From next March, his constituents will enjoy enclosed public spaces that are free from tobacco smoke, and the risk of lung cancer will fall by 24 per cent. for those helped by that measure in Scotland. However, he has used his influence in Cabinet to ensure that my constituents in Hampshire will not share that advantage. It is not so much the West Lothian question as the West Virginian question.

It is hard to find a subject on which the Cabinet agrees nowadays. The disagreement on smoking was the best advertised since that on prescription charges 50 years ago. At business questions a few weeks ago, I asked the Leader of the House for a free vote on the matter for Labour Members, but the request was dismissed.

Conservative Members have a free vote. I understand the libertarian argument that my right hon. Friends the Members for Charnwood and for Bromley and Chislehurst presented but a person's freedom to smoke ends where my nose begins. I remind my right hon. and hon. Friends that it became compulsory for motor cyclists to wear crash helmets and car passengers to wear seatbelts under a Conservative Government. When I was a health Minister some 25 years ago, I remember advocating the application of fluoride to water supplies in the interests of dental health. Despite the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood, his Government did exactly the things in the interests of public health that he claims that they should not have done. Our party has, in some circumstances and in the broader public interest, curtailed the liberty of the individual to harm himself and others. It is an extraordinary Bill. Indeed, one wonders whether it is a Bill or a Green Paper. Clause 3(2) refers to

"Examples of descriptions of premises which may be specified".

I have never come across a Bill with language of that type, being wholly unspecific as to what it is that will be exempt.

Members have asked whether there are already smoke-free pubs. There are some—12 in Hampshire are already smoke-free. Presumably, that is because it makes financial sense. I say that to reassure those in the trade who are worried that the consequences of going smoke-free will be injurious to their profits.

It is worth reminding the House that, in 2001, the Prime Minister promised in the Labour party manifesto that we would have a more democratic second Chamber. He then voted for a wholly appointed second Chamber. I hope that the Government Whips extend to all Labour Members the latitude enjoyed by the Prime Minister on the occasion when they get to vote for a total ban.

I recall negotiating with what was then the Tobacco Advisory Committee in the 1970s, trying to get the health warning not only on the pack of cigarettes but on individual cigarettes. I was told that that was not possible as the ink has carcinogenic properties. My negotiations with the committee taught me one thing, which was that the industry can live with tax increases, health warnings and a larger budget for those with responsibility for health education. It really feared that smoking would be branded as an antisocial unhygienic and unacceptable activity. A ban on smoking in public places would do just that. The industry would do all that it could to qualify that statement, hence its reliance on the ventilation argument and its enthusiasm to have as many exemptions as possible. It will do anything to give legitimacy to the activity by permitting it.

The industry wants confusion among the public as to where it is and is not legal to smoke. It wants different regimes in different parts of the United Kingdom. That is because the argument would be blunted and the waters would be muddied. The industry most fears a clear statement from Parliament that smoking is an unacceptable activity in an enclosed public space. It is that statement—not an impracticable, illogical compromise—that I hope the Bill will embody when it leaves the House.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I praise the Government for the positive and strong efforts that they have made in addressing the problems of smoking. I shall make a simple plea, and that is to say to the Government that they should grasp the nettle, go further than the proposals set out in the Bill and follow the lead from Smoke-Free Liverpool, which proposes a comprehensive ban on smoking in enclosed workplaces, including all licensed premises.

Smoke-Free Liverpool brings together the city council on a cross-party basis, the primary care trusts, John Moores university, the Roy Castle foundation, the chambers of commerce and the trades council. It has brought those organisations together to introduce a private Bill, currently in the other place, that proposes a comprehensive ban on smoking in enclosed workplaces in Liverpool. The Bill has had its Second Reading in the other place and awaits detailed scrutiny. It is important. It is an initiative that comes from Liverpool. It shows realistically what can be done.

The impact of Smoke-Free Liverpool has been profound, even in the short time in which it has been in existence. It has been working closely in the community and there has been a 25 per cent. increase in the number of people who want to stop smoking approaching smoking cessation services. There has been work across the communities and work with young people. There has been significant correspondence and discussion with the chief medical officer. Indeed, Sir Liam Donaldson wrote to Smoke-Free Liverpool on 7 November and stated:

"Finally, I have made it clear that I am totally opposed to the various hybrid proposals that were discussed and my view was made known to members of the relevant Cabinet Sub-Committee."

He supports the major thrust of the proposals coming from Smoke-Free Liverpool. In his letter, Sir Liam drew attention to the significant change in public opinion on this issue over the past two or three years. It is clear that public opinion is changing. Following the Government's own consultation, it was found that 90 per cent. and more of the 57,000 respondents opposed the exemption for pubs not serving food. Did that include the 11,700 postcards and 8,500 e-mails which were sent as a consequence of that consultation from Smoke-Free Liverpool? There appears to be no reference to those replies in the official report on the consultation. It is significant that that should have happened.

There have been references to the situation in other parts of the world, including the United States. Scotland has decided to impose a complete ban from next March. Wales has decided to do so when it receives the necessary powers, and they will not be long in coming. The Republic of Ireland has already taken its decision. Northern Ireland Ministers have already proposed similar action there. The Under-Secretary of State wrote to Smoke-Free Liverpool on 26 October and stated that the main reason for his making the proposal was that "a key factor in my decision was the evidence that partial controls would create a two-tier workforce whereby some employees would be protected from second-hand smoke while others would not."

An obvious question has to be asked. If it is right for employees in Northern Ireland—which is not at present under a devolved assembly—to be protected from second-hand smoke, why should that same protection be denied to employees in England? That does not make sense. The statement made by the Minister was clear and unequivocal.

The issue is about smoking in general. It is also about health and equality, given that that is a major thrust of Government policy. It is particularly about the impact of second-hand smoke and the effect of that on those who are not smokers. Employees must be a prime category in that consideration.

One reason why Smoke-Free Liverpool emerged was that Liverpool has had, regrettably, the title of the lung cancer centre of the United Kingdom. Indeed, the Roy Castle foundation had its headquarters in Liverpool for that very reason. That is a sad fact, given the prevalence of smoking in Liverpool. We see that 34 per cent. of the population are smokers. If we look more closely at the work done by Smoke-Free Liverpool, we see that that figure increases to 50 per cent. in some of the most deprived areas in the city.

There is the Government's evidence and the reasons for their current recommendations. They state that throughout the country, presumably, between 10 and 30 per cent. of pubs will be exempt from the ban. That is because they do not serve food. In Liverpool, that figure is 59 per cent. In Liverpool, an area suffering great ill health, six out of 10 pubs do not serve food and a third of pubs currently serving food say that they would stop doing so if the proposals in the Bill came into force. The impact of that would be to increase health inequality.

The report to the Department of Health from the Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health underlines the significance of second-hand smoke. The increased risk of heart disease goes up by 25 per cent. The increased risk of lung cancer goes up by 24 per cent. Even low levels of second-hand smoking increases the risk of adults developing asthma by up to five-fold. That is clear, and it should not be accepted. All those risks will be exacerbated for bar workers, who will be subject to second-hand smoking in a concentrated form. That concern should be foremost in our deliberations.

Mr. Joyce: My hon. Friend mentioned in passing the question of displacement, but she did not give it sufficient attention. If we are to measure the effect on health of a complete ban on smoking, we must also take into account the effect that such a ban would have on displacing smoking into the home. Some people will be discouraged from going to pubs and clubs and will therefore smoke and drink more at home. Should not that be taken into account when we consider the effects of this legislation?

Mrs. Ellman: My hon. Friend is correct to say that that matter should be taken into account. However, the evidence shows that stopping smoking in public places does not increase smoking in the home. Indeed, it encourages people to stop smoking, wherever they are. On those grounds alone, we should encourage the Government to drop these exemptions. I hope that, during our deliberations on the Bill in Committee, the Government will reconsider the whole question of exemptions. They should consider their workability and inequity, and I hope that they will decide not to introduce exemptions that will increase health inequalities. I hope that that will apply across the whole country. If the Government cannot do that—I hope that that will not be the case—perhaps they will look carefully at the example that is being set in Liverpool.

This is not the first time that Liverpool will have set an example in relation to public health. Indeed, the first public health legislation to be introduced related to Liverpool. The very first medical officer of health was appointed there in 1848, and that initiative was then copied throughout the rest of the country to very good effect. So Liverpool has a record of setting a good example, specifically in the field of public health, and Smoke-Free Liverpool is a current example of Liverpool leading the way.

The Government have spoken a great deal about the importance of devolution when asked why a complete ban will not be introduced in England when smoking is to be banned in enclosed public places and workplaces in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. We might not have devolution for the north-west of England—I wish we did—but would the Government consider running a pilot scheme in the city of Liverpool, which has, after all, introduced its own private Bill for a smoke-free city?

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): All my life, I have been chary of having good done unto me, and I am afraid that I put the part of the Bill that relates to smoking into that category. That part of the Bill is all that we appear to be talking about tonight. I have always been uneasy about a nanny state. I loathe smoking—I have never smoked—yet I am having to come to terms with an attempt to stop people doing something that they have every right to do. The hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) made a much better speech in favour of the partial ban than the Secretary of State, who did not do at all well in persuading anyone of its merits. Indeed, apart from the hon. Gentleman's rather good speech in support of her argument, most of the contributions from Labour Members will, ironically, probably give her a headache. Unfortunately, she is no longer here to listen to the sad tales that are being told.

I do not want to talk about smoking; I want to move on to a subject that has not been explored in great enough detail. An optician in my constituency has explained to me the problems that that profession fears will result from the Bill. The Bill, rather than a public health Bill, seems to be a rag-bag of ideas that the Department has been trying to get off its chest for many years. This is probably the first legislative slot that it has had in which to achieve that.

On the August bank holiday, the Government announced a review of the general ophthalmic service. Usually, when a Government sneak out such an announcement, it comes under the category of burying bad news. I understand from members of the profession that subsequently there has been absolutely no information on how the review is to be conducted, who is to conduct and chair it, who is to be invited to give evidence, what the time scale will be, whether it is to be an independent review, and when the outcome can be expected.

[Mrs. Jacqui Lait]

At the same time, the Bill is trying to change the terms of practice for a profession that is probably unique in the health service in that it has no waiting lists at all. Anyone who wants an eye appointment with a fully qualified eye specialist can get one at their convenience. If anyone can think of any other part of the national health service where that holds true, I would be interested to know what it is, because I cannot think of one.

Dr. Stoate: To answer the hon. Lady's question, another part of the health service in which a person can get an appointment there and then is with a community pharmacist. Such pharmacists are front-line providers of extremely high-quality services, and the new pharmacy contract has enabled them to extend their range of services far wider than ever before. I know of no one who had to wait to see their community pharmacist—and they are often open for extended hours and at weekends.

Mrs. Lait: I also seem to remember that it can often take two days to get a prescription filled.

We can make an appointment with an optometrist to get a full eye test using the most modern technology, and such tests are provided free for certain categories of people. The review of the general ophthalmic service is talking about ensuring that the service remains non-cash-limited, and that any properly qualified practitioner can continue to practise. Meanwhile, the Bill is proposing that the primary care trusts should take over the management of the general ophthalmic service. My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) made the point very clearly that, because the PCTs are cash-strapped, it is likely that budgets that are now non-cash-limited will become cash-limited and that the PCTs will restrict the number of practitioners and transfer the money to other parts of the service that they provide.

It would be useful if the Minister could put on record the details, timing and process of the review, so that those who are interested can give evidence. Will she guarantee that the GOS will continue not to be cash-limited, and that the PCTs will not in any circumstances restrict access to the wide variety of optical services that are currently available? If she can do that, this part of the Bill will be acceptable. If she cannot, I fear that many people in the profession will find it exceedingly difficult to live with the proposals in the Bill.

7.29 pm

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): I welcome the Bill. My constituency suffers from grave multi-deprivation, and in the most deprived wards life expectancy is five to six years lower than the national average—so anything that we can do to bring about health improvements is extremely welcome.

I particularly welcome part 2 of the Bill, because Lewisham hospital in my constituency has had a serious problem with MRSA. The Conservative party, in its election campaign, asked sarcastically:

"I mean, how difficult is it to keep a hospital clean?"

In my experience, it is extremely difficult. A hospital can have floors so clean that one can eat off them and still have MRSA. There is a huge need to introduce a new raft of measures, many of which are being pioneered at Lewisham hospital as part of a campaign waged by the Deptford Action Group for the Elderly led by Harry Heyward, me and others to get MRSA rates down. I am delighted to say that rates are now going down. We need to take account of the fact that one in 10 people are found to be already infected in hospital pre-entry testing, and of those who are infected, 40 per cent. come from nursing homes.

The wide range of measures that the hospital has introduced require a constant battle—a battle to keep infection control regimes in place, maintain the vigilance of health care staff and get the co-operation of visitors. I therefore very much support the proposal for a statutory code of practice and its associated protocols. I am also pleased to note that while the Bill does not cover care homes, the Government have expressed their intention to apply similar measures to cover such bodies.

My welcome for part 1 of the Bill, however, is not as enthusiastic. When I was growing up in south Wales, I did not know anyone who did not smoke. I started smoking at the age of 14. Fortunately, I did not get addicted, and when I learned the health messages I gave up, as did the rest of my family, with the exception of my father. He was a man who worked in a factory but came home every day to his garden. He got plenty of exercise, was never overweight and had the most healthy diet, having grown his own fruit and vegetables. He died when he was just a few years older than I am today, of an entirely preventable smoking-related disease.

Today, thousands of my constituents face the same chronic illnesses and eventual premature death as a result of their smoking habit. Twenty-seven per cent. of the people of Lewisham smoke—thankfully, it is no longer the majority that it was in the borough as a whole. As we have heard from others, the incidence is higher in the most deprived communities. Alarmingly, the highest incidence of smoking in my population is among those between the ages of 16 and 34. Interestingly, twice as many white people as black people smoke, and substantially more women smoke. As is the case everywhere, more manual workers smoke. My primary care trust has made huge efforts on smoking cessation and will continue to do so. It can deal with but a few thousand people each year, however, and the problem is so much greater than that. That is why it supports a complete ban on smoking in workplaces.

The toll of deaths from entirely preventable smoking-related disease is a scandal. In London as a whole, there are more than 10,000 such deaths each year—that is one death every hour in this city, and 120 hospital admissions every day, at a cost of £105 million to the NHS per annum. As others have said, we have known of the hazards of smoking for a very long time. It is gratifying that the majority of smokers now want to give up because of those messages.

Our willingness to protect others from the effects of second-hand smoking has been much slower to gain public approval. When I entered the House in 1987, at the first meeting with the Whips—who were less kind, of course, than the Whips today—I asked whether it would be possible to have a non-smoking office. They looked at me askance and said that I would be jolly lucky—they did not use those words exactly—to get an office at all. A decade later, one of my colleagues, Anne Campbell, who was suffering from asthma, was heard to protest one day that we should not have smoking in our dining rooms. She attracted a huge amount of hostility. Many of us have had to fight hard to introduce the sensible and basic no smoking measures that we have in this place today. How much more difficult will it be in those areas where establishments are supposed to be non-food bars, bars that serve a bit of food, bars without smoke around the bar, or bars with a bit of smoke at the back of the room? It will be extremely difficult, and the Bill as drafted is unworkable.

One of the most telling statistics that many of us have received came in a briefing from the Trades Union Congress, which compared the 235 deaths at work from accidents with the estimated 700 deaths of non-smokers from second-hand smoking. In the case of accidents, the first thing that we ask is, "Could this accident have been prevented?" Well, smoking can be prevented. The second question that we usually ask is, "Was the employer negligent?" It is my view that, in future, any employer who exposes his or her workers to second-hand smoking will indeed be negligent.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State stressed the limited nature of the exemptions in the Bill. She also stated her passion for legislating for public health. Therein lies a contradiction. We cannot legislate to protect the majority of people and choose not to protect a minority, however small. We will also ill serve those customers who might wish to be protected in continuing to go to the non-food pub that is their local and that they would like to use in the same way as everyone else. As local consultations and other hon. Members have indicated, it is also clear that a proportion of those pubs that currently serve minimal food will cease to do so in future and become smoking pubs. We want them to keep offering food, not to give it up, because giving it up will exacerbate the difficulties that we have with our drinking culture.

For all those reasons, I and many Members will seek every opportunity to remove exemptions for licensed premises and private clubs from the Bill, and to establish a total ban that will protect all employees and the public at large and further encourage the many people of this country who are seeking to give up smoking.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I want to speak to parts 1 and 2 of the Bill, starting with the section on infection control issues in part 2.

I have some doubts that the code of practice will make any more difference than all the guidance and circulars that have preceded it. What constitutes best infection control practice, as we have just heard from the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock), is already clear. There is plenty of guidance around to be followed. For example, in 2000 the Department of Health issued a circular setting out a programme of action for the NHS on the management and control of hospital infections. To this day, there has been no national audit of compliance with that circular, and Health Ministers have consistently made it clear that the Government have no plans to undertake such an audit. Ensuring compliance with the existing guidance should have been a priority, and the fact that a statutory code is now felt to be necessary is, in truth, an admission of eight years of failure by this Government in controlling infections both in the community and in our hospitals.

The problem has been where infection control sits in relation to the Government's other health priorities. From reading the summary of responses to the Department's consultation on the code, it is clear that many are worried that the guidance in the code will "conflict with other policies that are already in place, such as those relating to bed occupancy."

It is therefore no surprise that the report goes on to say:

"Many felt that the Code of Practice should specify which guidance is meant to take priority."

That is absolutely right—it must do that. It is disturbing that more than a year after the National Audit Office published its progress report, that remains a concern among many in the NHS. The NAO found, at the time of its report last year, that half of NHS managers were struggling to reconcile the competing demands of Government waiting time targets and the management of hospital infections. The question is, will the code make clear what takes precedence—political targets or infection control? The response to my earlier intervention suggested a "have the cake and eat it" approach to that question, and to the issue generally. I hope that the Minister will clarify the matter later.

Against a background of increasing financial instability and rising deficits there is cause for concern that NHS organisations will struggle to tick all the Government boxes and meet their obligations under the new code, but if a statutory code of practice gives infection control the priority that it needs, I for one will support it and consider it a worthwhile measure.

Part 1 deals with the partial ban. Like others who have spoken today, I hope that a majority in the House will amend the Bill to provide for a comprehensive ban on smoking in enclosed public places. For many, it is a question of social justice. How can it be right to legislate to protect workers from the harmful effects of second-hand smoke in the majority of workplaces, and then fail to extend that protection to bar workers, who are often most at risk? During an average eight-hour shift, a bar worker can inhale environmental tobacco smoke that is equivalent to smoking a pack of 10 cigarettes a day. It is the overwhelming evidence that smoking harms non-smokers that leads me to support the introduction of a comprehensive ban on smoking in enclosed public places. If it were simply a case of smokers putting their own lives at risk I, as a Liberal, would respect their right to make that choice, but the right to smoke must be balanced against the rights of non-smokers in general and workers in particular.

Second-hand smoke does harm. It can and does kill. There is no safe level of exposure to it. Last November, the Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health reported that exposure to second-hand smoke significantly increased the risk of heart disease and lung cancer in non-smokers. In April this year, a study published by the British Medical Journal estimated that it was responsible for 617 deaths a year. Those are preventable deaths, but the health effects are much wider. According to Asthma UK, four fifths of the country's 5 million asthma sufferers say that second-hand smoke makes their condition worse.

[Mr. Paul Burstow]

I believe that a ban on smoking in enclosed public places must be seen first and foremost as a health and safety measure. Protecting workers from second-hand smoke should be the goal. The Government's policy, however, does not achieve that end. It is not sufficient to argue that because the vast majority of workplaces will be covered by a ban, it is somehow acceptable to set aside the evidence and allow bar workers to be exposed to second-hand smoke. Proposals for a smoke-free buffer zone around the bar are pointless, unless the Government plan to legislate to change the laws of physics and stop smoke from drifting around the bar.

Ventilation is not an answer. The best that it can offer is comfort for the customer. It does not provide safety for staff because it does not extract carcinogens from the atmosphere. Research suggests that more than 10,000 air changes an hour would be necessary to achieve ambient levels of particulates. That is equivalent to a mini-tornado blowing through the pub.

A partial ban will fail, and not only on grounds of principle.

Dr. Murrison: Will the hon. Gentleman draw a distinction between an ambient atmosphere and an occupational setting? When considering occupational settings of the sort that he describes, should we not consider occupational exposure standards that could be attained through the engineering measures to which he has referred?

Mr. Burstow: On the basis of the research that the Select Committee has seen so far on the efficacy of ventilation systems, in terms of both cost-effectiveness and practicalities, I am not convinced that that can be achieved—not least because the level of air change required for the achievement of the necessary safety standards would be high enough to make patrons uncomfortable. It is likely to be really effective only when the bar is empty, which rather defeats the purpose.

A disproportionate amount of time and money will be invested in defining, and then enforcing, the exemptions. The more complex the regulatory system, the greater will be the burden on business and the cost to consumer and taxpayer. As we have heard, the Health Committee has received evidence from the hospitality trade, the Health and Safety Executive and local authority enforcement officers. They all agree that a partial ban will be more expensive to enforce.

During the Committee's visit to Dublin earlier this month, it was clear that the ban in the Republic was working well. One reason is that it is easily understood and, as a result, largely self-enforcing. Compliance is currently 94 per cent. Enforcement action has been necessary, but in only a small number of cases. The Secretary of State cited experience in Norway as evidence that comprehensive bans do not come along in one go, but must come along in stages. In Norway, however, the partial ban was abandoned in favour of a comprehensive ban because it was proving unfair, unpopular and unenforceable. As my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) said, why should we make the same mistakes in this country and then implement a full ban later?

The fact of devolution should not mean that Ministers in Westminster ignore the lessons from Edinburgh and Cardiff—and, indeed, from non-devolved Belfast. Why should Health Ministers in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland be wrong and Health Ministers in England be right? It has been suggested that Ministers here feel that England is not yet ready for a comprehensive ban. Even if we accept that argument, however, surely it is the Government's duty to act on the basis of scientific evidence.

Let me respond briefly to points made by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford and the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). Surely the choice is between comprehensive and comprehensible legislation after we in the House of Commons have debated and framed the law, and allowing the courts to drive bans through by means of individual decisions under health and safety legislation or precautionary steps taken by employers. I do not consider the latter a satisfactory basis on which to proceed. We should be legislating in a comprehensive fashion.

During the Select Committee's visit to Dublin, I was struck by how quickly public opinion had moved on in the Republic. There is now a tangible sense of pride at what has been done in Ireland. The Irish Government saw the need and gave a lead, and that is what should happen here. Public opinion in England is moving and it is time for the Government to move as well, not least on the issue of exemption for bars that do not serve food. Of the 41,833 people who responded to the Department's questionnaire, more than 90 per cent. said that there was no basis on which they would accept such an exemption.

The Secretary of State has achieved an unusual feat. At the same time as dividing the Cabinet, she has managed to unite ASH and the British Beer and Pub Association in opposition to a partial ban. Public opinion in England is already more supportive of a comprehensive ban than it was in the Republic of Ireland before its introduction there.

There can be no doubt that a partial ban will widen health inequalities, as a number of Members have pointed out. According to a survey by ASH, following a partial ban two out of five pubs would close their kitchens permanently and adopt non-food status so that they could allow smoking. Last Thursday, when the Health Committee took evidence from the chief medical officer, Sir Liam Donaldson, I asked for his professional opinion on a partial as opposed to a comprehensive ban in terms of health inequalities and outcomes. He said

> "It . . . signals to the public that a drink and a smoke go hand-in-hand when all the efforts on smoking and tobacco control have been aimed at de-normalising smoking".

He said that it put Britain among the laggards of public health policy internationally rather than among the global leaders. Laggards not leaders: that must surely be the consequence of ignoring the chief medical officer's compelling advice.

When I intervened on the Secretary of State earlier, I mentioned the regulatory impact assessment. The detailed tables show that the difference between a partial and a comprehensive ban is 200 preventable deaths a year. The idea of exempting pubs that do not serve food is ill-conceived. It is a classic case of doing what is expedient rather than what is right. Health policy should be evidence-based, not evidence-blind. I agree with the chief medical officer that when it comes to the question of freedom, the smoker's right to smoke stops at my nose.

Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North) (Lab): This has been an interesting debate. There appear to be two diametrically opposed views. There are those who want smoking to be banned altogether in all enclosed public spaces such as public houses or working men's clubs, and there are those who say "Just let it go".

I should like to think that the Secretary of State has got it right, although I am not sure whether that has come about for good reasons. I see the Bill as an interim measure. I think that we will see more progress after this, and I wonder which way that progress will go.

I entirely accept, as most people do, that no employee or customer who does not want to breathe another person's smoke should have to suffer that. There is no argument about that, but we could look at the issue in another way, and I would like to see a bit more lateral thinking in this debate. I use the term "segregation". I have heard a lot of nonsense spoken here tonight about it being impossible to eliminate smoke by ventilation. With a proper segregated room and a proper extractor fan, a vacuum is created, and the only air that moves has to come into the room and go out through the fan. Decent doors are needed to make a smokeproof room, but we have one of those in this building: we have a Smoking Room in the House of Commons. The only problem with it is there is no protection for the person who serves there; that is wrong.

However, there is no reason why people in a segregated room should not be required to go and get their own drinks and bring them back to that room. Most pubs have more than one room, and very few public houses, working men's clubs or private clubs could not provide a room for smokers, properly ventilated and properly looked after. That would eliminate the problem.

I accept the fact that 75 per cent. of the public do not smoke and do not want smoke around them, but I am also concerned about the one in four—the 25 per cent.—and I do not want to see those people marginalised. That is not necessary.

If there is the political will to do something, and make provision for smokers as well as non-smokers, the problem could be overcome—but whether the Government have the gumption to do that, I do not know. I hear what the zealots say, and it seems to me that those who shout loudest generally get their own way. A tremendous head of steam is being generated on this issue, and those who want a total ban will probably succeed eventually, unless we start thinking in a different direction—not being defensive, but using a bit of lateral thought to get round the problem.

I do not believe that only one in four of the people who go into public houses smoke. In my area, nearly 50 per cent. of the people who frequent pubs, private clubs, working men's clubs and the miners welfare are smokers. If they are prohibited from smoking in those places, no doubt they will find other ways out. As a result, the people who want to go into a bar but do not want to see any smoke might find that they are not only devoid of smoke but devoid of a bar to go to. It may no longer be feasible or economic to keep premises open if people cannot go there and smoke.

That is just a suggestion. I am not arguing about people's right to avoid smoke, and I think that the Government are heading in the right direction. However, we need less simplification and more profound thought on this issue. It is quite a complex subject; it is not just about banning or not banning, but about thinking about how to satisfy people and make progress.

We need more education, and we should try to imbue young people's minds with the disadvantages of smoking. I am a smoker myself, although I am a bit of an oddity, because I did not smoke until I was about 45. [Interruption.] That was before I came here; it had nothing to do with this place, although being here probably could drive somebody to smoke.

If we alienate what I think is the more likely estimate of 50 per cent. of people in clubs and pubs who smoke, we will cause tremendous trouble. People whom we might have been able to persuade by education and good practice will be alienated if they believe that they are being coerced.

I have no great truck with the tobacco lobby, which only wants to sell its product. We have all been glad enough to take the tax that comes from smoking; that applies to both parties. If we think that smoking is so bad, why the hell do we not ban it altogether and have done with it? We do not do that. We do not live in that world. That is not the way things work. Instead, we try to do things gradually—and that is what we are doing now.

I hope that we can cut the number of people who smoke. Let us hope that eventually we will be able to get rid of the habit, and the problem, altogether, but we will not do that by alienating minorities. We have to carry them along with us. I beseech the Government to consider the fact that by proper scientific segregation, we could achieve all that the people who favour a total ban want. They might not agree with that, but I believe that it is true.

For anyone to say, as one of my hon. Friends did earlier, that it is impossible to get rid of smoke by ventilation, is nonsense. I am not talking about the nonsense described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), who mentioned some obscure airline with smoking on one side of the plane and non-smoking on the other, or about someone saying, "If you sit at one end of the room and smoke, non-smokers can sit at the other end." That is unsatisfactory and does not solve the problem. We need a proper scientific approach, with segregation so that those who do not want to breathe smoke do not have to, but also so that we do not alienate the people who do smoke, and who want to continue to go out and meet their friends in an ambient atmosphere in a pleasant pub.

Mrs. Betty Williams: Does my hon. Friend not remember the train operating companies' system, with a no-smoking section and a smoking section in each train? The doors were not secure enough to keep the smoke away from non-smokers, and the only way to get round that was to ban smoking altogether on all trains.

Bill Etherington: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution, and I am pleased to be able to give her a detailed answer. I have travelled a lot on GNER services, and that company spent hundreds of thousands of pounds creating segregated smoking areas. The doors did work, and the smoking area was ventilated. Indeed, it was so well ventilated that people complained that it was too cold. All the air was sucked out of the non-smoking area; no air went back there. Why, after all that expense, the company then decided to stop smoking altogether, I do not know; it was not because the system was ineffective or inefficient. The system worked, and I shall never know the answer to that question.

The real answer to my hon. Friend's point is that I suspect that train operating companies, like some companies that operate bars, just do not want to spend the money. They will give all sorts of reasons why something cannot be done, but it all comes down to the simple answer that they do not want to make that investment. For example, Eurostar trains had a separate coach for smoking, and no smoke went out of that into other coaches—but Eurostar stopped it, because it could get more passengers and more flexibility if that coach was turned into a non-smoking one.

A lot of myths circulate about such matters, and all that business about needing 10,000 changes of air an hour to clear a place out is utter palpable nonsense.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend has been talking about alienating minorities, but what does he think the difference is between what is happening in Ireland and what he thinks might happen here? I assure him that during the Health Committee's visit to Ireland it was clear that a total ban, introduced very quickly, has been accepted by almost everyone—including smokers in pubs, who go outside to have a smoke. What is the difference between Ireland and here, that makes him anticipate trouble?

Bill Etherington: We all get to hear different views. Yes, the thing might have been accepted in Ireland, but many things are accepted, and that does not always mean that the situation is totally satisfactory. I do not think that it is very satisfactory if someone has to go outside to have a smoke. I do not like to see people huddling in shop and office doorways having a smoke. I would have thought that a decent employer, who did not want smoking in the workplace, would make proper provision for employees to have a smoke in a room such as I have suggested. It always come down to investment and a lack of will.

All that I am asking the Minister to consider is the possibility of integrating smokers into our pub scene without making things impossible for them. I believe that it can be done. All we need to talk about is scientific segregation. As I say, it can be done; all it needs is the will.

8 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I make no apology for the fact that I intend to speak principally about the smoking ban. It would be remiss of me, however, to let pass without comment the views of the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington), who spoke about those who shout the loudest winning and about the importance of carrying minorities with the majority. I wish that the same could be said when we speak from the Northern Ireland Benches. I wish that our voices were heard—and we are certainly not a minority within the Northern Ireland context.

I have found the debate on the partial ban on smoking in public places, which the Government are in favour of, most interesting. I am grateful that, after extensive lobbying in Northern Ireland, plans have been announced for a total ban on smoking in public places there. Again, it would be remiss of me not to point out how ironic it is that the Government are willing to protect the health of Northern Ireland citizens by introducing a comprehensive ban on smoking in public places while they are also willing to give an amnesty to on-the-runs who have murdered men, women and children, allowing them the freedom to return home to the Province and move freely among their victims.

There is no logical reason why staff in one pub or club should be protected from the dangers of passive smoking, while those in another should be exposed to them. As already highlighted by hon. Members, a partial ban allowing smoking in pubs where food is not served fails to protect workers in the hospitality industry, who are often at risk of the greatest exposure. On account of the inequalities contained in the Bill, I suggested to the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) that pubs serving food will simply get rid of the food business in order to attract the smokers and maximise the takings on alcohol sales. That will inevitably lead to redundancies in the catering trade. The right hon. Gentleman claimed that it did not seem to be an issue in the Republic of Ireland, but, with respect, I would point out that the population of the Republic is approximately 5 million, compared with a population in England of approximately 55 million, so there is no real comparison to be made in terms of job losses.

Many hospitality workers are low paid, and failing to protect them from the effects of smoke at work will only increase health inequalities in that group. Such a policy would be impractical, unfair and lacking in rationale. As I said in an earlier intervention, Macmillan Cancer Relief pointed out that more than 37,000 new cases of lung cancer are diagnosed each year in the UK. Perhaps the Minister will tell us why the Government have chosen to ignore the advice of the chief medical officer, Sir Liam Donaldson, who proposed a total smoking ban, and why the views of 90 per cent. of respondents to the Department of Health's own consultation who supported a full ban without exemptions have also been ignored.

The BMA has stated that second-hand smoke increases the risk of lung cancer by 20 to 30 per cent., increases the risk of heart disease by 25 to 35 per cent., doubles the risk of stroke and causes asthma, respiratory illness and ear infections in children. Those particularly vulnerable to second-hand smoke include 8 million people with lung disease, 2.1 million people with angina, 1.3 million people who have had a heart attack and 300,000 who have had a stroke. There are also an estimated 10.8 million women of child-bearing age, some 750,000 pregnant women and 1.5 million children with asthma who would all be at risk. Short-term exposure to tobacco smoke also has a measurable effect on the heart in non-smokers. Just 30 minutes' exposure is enough to reduce coronary blood flow.

Nicotine addiction is the main motivating factor behind smoking. Smoking is the greatest cause of preventable illness and death and giving up smoking at any age confers substantial health benefits. Individuals who wish to stop smoking must be offered appropriate support and smoking cessation services must be widely available. Extra training should be provided to doctors and other health care professionals to enable them to assess and refer individuals to specialist services. Similarly, those services should be offered to workers at places where smoking is now to be outlawed.

If the Government fail to implement a total ban, England and Wales will trail behind many other parts of the world. The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) pointed out earlier that seven US states have now banned smoking.

Julie Morgan: Is the hon. Lady aware that the Welsh Assembly has already voted in favour of a complete ban?

Mrs. Robinson: I am aware of that and I withdraw the point about Wales.

I was about to say that New Zealand became a smoke-free zone on 10 December 2004. Dr. Tricia Briscoe, chair of the New Zealand Medical Association, commented that that country's "experience shows that introducing smoke-free legislation makes people more aware about the health impacts of second-hand smoke. And the legislation is popular. Polls now show that 9 out of 10 New Zealanders support the right to work in a smoke-free environment."

Dr. William Glasson, federal president of the Australian Medical Association said:

"The Australian experience shows that when workplaces are smoke-free, families are more likely to have smoke-free homes. The proportion of family homes with smoking restrictions more than doubled in 8 years. That means that fewer children are at risk from chest and ear infections, asthma and cot death."

I hope that that supports the argument advanced earlier by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman).

Environmental tobacco smoke is also detrimental in terms of the economic effect that it has on businesses due to loss of productivity from sick days and increased insurance due to fire risk. Effects on businesses have often been cited as a reason not to pursue a smoking ban, but evidence from countries that have become smoke-free show positive, not negative, effects on businesses. In New York, receipts in bars and restaurants increased by nearly 9 per cent. in the first year of going smoke-free and reports in the Republic of Ireland suggest that there were no negative effects on sales in bars and restaurants. In fact, many more non-smokers are now going out to restaurants and bars.

Research found that air quality in pubs in the Irish Republic improved significantly in the first year after the introduction of the smoking ban. According to the findings, the level of carbon monoxide among non-smoking bar workers fell by up to 45 per cent. Among ex-smokers, the levels dropped by 36 per cent. These are compelling figures, as I am sure all right hon. and hon. Members would agree.

Studies also show that smoke-free workplaces encourage smokers to quit or reduce consumption—hence addressing a major cause of ill health. The fall in tobacco sales in the Republic of Ireland provides further evidence of that. Dr. James Reilly, president of the Irish Medical Organisation, has stated:

"Over 7,000 smokers gave up in the 6 months before the law came into force. The new law has encouraged many more smokers to quit—as is evident in the continuing drop in tobacco sales—and they say that they are less likely to start again because their workplaces and social venues are smoke-free."

The Republic of Ireland introduced legislation in March 2004 to ban smoking in all public places and workplaces. That has proved to be very successful and highly popular, and no major compliance problems have been encountered. Useful lessons could be learned from that approach. The key to success in the Irish Republic was a clear policy, an effective public information campaign outlining the rationale and clear enforcement laws.

The health and economic evidence is clear and there is widespread support for such a policy. I urge the Government to ensure that any ban is total. That will protect the health of all workers and tackle a major cause of ill health by providing environments that encourage smokers to quit or reduce their consumption. Partial bans rarely work. They please no one in the end. As my dear mother taught me long ago, "If you stand in the middle of the road, you'll get knocked down." The partial ban is morally wrong: it should be a comprehensive ban. Just as extending opening hours for drinking alcohol is morally wrong, all we will succeed in doing is to fill more hospital beds.

8.10 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Three weeks ago, we commemorated the 400th anniversary of the gunpowder plot. Received wisdom has it that the plotters against the monarchy were alienated Catholics. More perceptive historians blame a group of 17th century cigarette manufacturers, because a few months before 5 November 1605 His Majesty King James I of England and VI of Scotland issued a decree banning tobacco from his kingdom in the following terms:

"Loathsome to the eye, hateful to the nose, harmful to the brain, dangerous to the lungs and in the stinking fume thereof nearest resembling the horrific Stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless".

Clearly, he was not a native of Airdrie and Shotts. And he was not wrong.

Four hundred years later, after mounds of medical evidence, tax rises, warnings on packets, laws about sale of cigarettes to children, and bans on advertising, more than 100,000 people a year in the UK still die from smoking-related disease. That appalling total included my own father when I and my sisters were adolescents.

Smoking is still the biggest cause of preventable death in our country. It is an addiction that brings misery, illness and bereavement to countless families. It is therefore a political issue of great importance.

Dr. Stoate: May I assist my hon. Friend by pointing out that if smokers use the product as intended by the manufacturer, 50 per cent. of lifelong smokers will be killed by their habit? Can he think of any other legal product in the world of which that is true?

David Taylor: In just a sentence, my hon. Friend has demonstrated the lunacy of the case of the tobacco manufacturers.

Speaking as a Labour MP, I would argue that smoking is all the more important because of its impact on social and health inequality. The chances of a man in social class 1—the richest—living until the age of 70 are, on average, two in three. For a man in social class 5—the poorest—the chance of living that long is less than one in two. Half that difference is down to smoking. More poor people smoke than rich, and more poor people die as a result from lung cancer, emphysema, vascular disease and all the other terrible conditions that smoking causes.

We must lighten that burden of preventable suffering, not widen the gap. I shall look favourably on Government interventions with that objective. Part 1 of the Health Bill is just such a major intervention. A giant step is being taken to protect the great majority of workers and members of the public from carcinogenic second-hand smoke. However, the proposed exemptions will fail to protect a large group of employees and customers in the hospitality industry. They will introduce further market distortions, lead to unfair competition between licensed premises and generate public order problems. That latter point has not been made so far today.

No wonder affected groups have been so vociferous about the Bill, including those with pre-existing medical conditions such as asthma. Asthma UK has calculated that one in five people with asthma may still be prevented from using parts of their workplace where people smoke because of cigarette and other tobacco fumes. The best estimate of the number of premature deaths caused by workplace exposure to other people's smoke is 600 a year, although other estimates have been quoted today. Compare that to the 200 or so people who die in this country every year from all other industrial injuries and accidents. Let us stop pretending that smoking is not a workplace health and safety issue.

Bryan Ferry and other popular singers of recent times were only partly right. Smoke gets in your eyes, but it also gets into your hair and clothes, into your blood stream and on to your death certificate. Many workplaces still permit smoking and they are generally in sectors with the highest levels of exposure and, therefore, the greatest health and safety risk. Most of them are operated by small firms that employ relatively low-paid staff. Workplace smoking is particularly common in the hospitality trades, including restaurants, pubs and casinos, but it is not confined to such places. The latest Government survey shows that more than 2 million people in Great Britain work in workplaces that allow smoking throughout. A further 10 million people work in places where smoking is allowed somewhere on the premises. In total, that is almost half of the work force.

In Ireland, as we have heard, smoke-free legislation was introduced to tackle a similar starting position. Since its inception in March 2004, it has received wide public support and is well on the way to proving a great success. I was able to visit Dublin in September last year in a delegation drawn from the all-party group on smoking and health, which I chair. There were representatives from both Houses, including that excellent campaigner in the other place, Lord Faulkner. We talked to Irish parliamentarians at the Dail, including Health Minister Micheal Martin, licensed victuallers, cancer consultants, trade unionists, and drinkers and smokers in the Temple Bar area—the Dublin equivalent of Leicester square. The reaction to the then six-month old ban was hugely positive. I hear that the Health Committee visit this autumn had very similar findings. Objective Irish evidence does not bear out the claims of the tobacco lobby here and parts of our hospitality trade that smoking restrictions have been bad for business, which is in fact improving.

Welcome as the Health Bill is, the exemptions for pubs that do not serve food and for membership clubs make no sense at all. They will increase health inequalities. They will make the law harder and more expensive to enforce, and they will, as I have said, produce unfair competition right across the hospitality industry. On health inequalities, a major survey of more than 1,200 pubs, conducted by survey firm IFF Research Ltd., has shown that those not serving prepared food are concentrated in poorer communities—no great surprise—where smoking rates are already highest. On average, about 14 per cent. of pubs in the richest areas do not serve food, compared with 45 per cent. in the poorest areas.

Worse still, if the current exemption survives the parliamentary passage of the Bill, publicans say that many will stop serving food. The IFF survey suggests that in future the percentage of pubs not serving food in the richest areas will rise to 20 per cent. and in the poorest areas the majority will not serve food. That shift would also be disastrous for the Government's alcohol strategy, a key part of which is to cut binge drinking by encouraging consumption of meals when alcohol is drunk.

After the devastating evidence from, and indeed near resignation of, the chief medical officer last week, I have no doubt that the Health Committee will report in favour of the comprehensive legislation that was indeed the overwhelming choice of the 60,000 respondents to the Government's recent consultation. I suppose that it is possible that the Government might be able to keep the exemptions in the Bill if they are prepared to rely on Tory support to do so, although more and more Tory MPs are recognising the case for comprehensive legislation, too. I know that the Prime Minister will not be unaware of the political fall-out that such a situation could cause.

Thus an end to all smoking in workplaces and enclosed public places would protect non-smokers from the damaging effects of second-hand smoke, and would encourage many smokers to quit.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I have been listening—

Andrew Mackinlay: You've only just come in.

Michael Fabricant: I have not. I have been listening to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), and I wish to reassure him that the Opposition have a one-line Whip on the issue. I shall vote with him for an all-out ban, so he should not characterise Members on party lines.

David Taylor: I stand second to none in the Chamber in my admiration for the upright stance and integrity of my near-neighbour in Lichfield. I look forward to having a chat with him in the Lobby.

On health and safety grounds, there should be no exemption for any pub or membership club. It is wholly unacceptable to exempt any category of worker—I say that with great respect for my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington)—from an identified, controllable and significant risk. Good gracious me, the bulk of Labour Members were trade unionists in another life.

Exempted pubs and clubs will be in less well-off areas, where smoking prevalence rates are higher, and general health and life expectancy are worse than elsewhere. We have heard that that is shown at its starkest in Liverpool, with its sad and unique position as the lung cancer capital of England, and with average smoking prevalence in the most deprived areas at around 50 per cent. No wonder the call for change is even stronger on Merseyside than elsewhere. I commend the Smoke-Free Liverpool campaign; I wear its wristband proudly as a token of my support—the first such wristband I have ever worn.

While the partial ban proposed in the Bill will protect many workers and members of the public, it will leave some of those at most risk still exposed to the health risks of second-hand smoke. In summary, it will also reduce the number of smokers quitting as a result of the legislation, worsen health inequalities and produce perverse and unfair competition between licensed premises.

Smoke-free legislation is essentially a yes/no question, ideally suited to a Chamber with just two Lobbies. Once the health and safety case and the public health benefits are conceded, it is not possible to find a compromise, whether exemptions for some premises, ventilation systems or separate smoking areas are incorporated. All of that is lunacy. It is impossible to find a compromise that is practical, logical and enforceable.

There is still time for the Government to ensure that workplaces and enclosed public places in England will have the same protection from second-hand smoke as will soon be available in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and which already exists in the very enlightened Irish Republic. The benefits and popularity of such a measure would be enormous.

My parliamentary neighbour, the Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Ms Hewitt), has said that a comprehensive workplace smoking ban will be in place by 2007. I hope that she is right, and that second thoughts and sound advice will prevent my Government from snatching a wholly unnecessary defeat from the jaws of a much-needed historic victory. For then, 400 years after the first tobacco ban was promulgated by an absolute monarch, an absolute ban in enclosed public and workplaces will at long last be a reality. If that is not a reason for public rejoicing, celebrations and, yes, bonfires, then I do not know what is.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I am beginning to feel sorry for the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who has to reply to the debate. It has been fascinating, and I certainly enjoyed the speech by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington), but I must say to the House that we have another Health Bill—another piece of legislation, more regulation—and we must ask ourselves: are these measures sensible and practical and will they be enforceable?

I shall start by commenting on smoking, because everyone else has. I do not smoke—I do not think it is very clever to do so—but I defend to the end people's right to smoke. The question for the House is whether other people's smoking affects our health adversely. During the course of the debate, well over half of the Health Committee has been present. As the House knows, we are currently carrying out an inquiry into passive smoking, and it would be wrong for me to pre-judge that report, in spite of what the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) has said. We shall see in due course whether there will have to be a minority report. I hope that the House will have another chance to read the interesting evidence that we considered during the inquiry.

The question on passive smoking that the House must consider is very difficult indeed. I just wonder whether we are being sensible about this. I have been influenced by a variety of points that have been made in today's debate, but I shall also bear in mind the evidence that the Health Committee heard. The Minister gave evidence to the Committee, and I hope she enjoyed it, but she followed the chief medical officer, and during his evidence, as everyone now knows, he said that he came within a hair's breadth of resigning. I would simply say to the Minister that, given that this is a Government Bill, it does not look terribly good if the chief medical officer has made those remarks and is clearly in total disagreement with the Government.

I am disappointed that we have not spent much more time today talking about MRSA. These things seem to go in and out of fashion, and months ago, before the general election, MRSA was a big issue, so it would have been nice if one or two hon. Members had shared with the House their explanations as to why we have so many infections in our hospitals today. Is it because we no longer have Hattie Jacques as matron? My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries), who I believe was a nurse, will no doubt hope to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, to tell us all about it. Is it because we no longer wash our hands? It is worrying that there has been only a small drop in the number of cases since 2001, when there were 7,684. The present situation is just not good enough. I represent an area with a huge number of elderly people, and as one hon. Member said earlier, they now worry that when they go into hospital, they will come out with a life-threatening illness.

The Bill provides for the publication and enforcement of a code of practice, but as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said, the code is not included in the Bill, and until its content is revealed I am anxious about the effectiveness of the measures. It is a great shame that my party did not manage to convince the British people with our proposals in the general election, because I think they would have been a little bit more effective than those proposed by the Government.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) about ophthalmic services—I certainly share her doubts on the issue. All Members have received correspondence from their local organisations, and I am no exception. The joint Essex local optical committee has worked with our 13 primary care trusts to devise shared care schemes, providing enhanced services to diabetic patients, post-cataract cases and the visually impaired. It has worked with both ophthalmologists and primary care trusts to streamline the entry of acute cases into the hospital eye service, so that the widest choice of treatment can be offered to cataract patients. It does not oppose the proposed reforms in theory; indeed, it has proposed a clinical governance accreditation scheme for optometrists, paving the way for the new contracts. However, I believe that it is essential that the Government continue to consult optical professionals on the details of the Bill, as the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), told the conference that she addressed in October.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): On ophthalmic services, I urge the Minister to consider the rural aspects of ophthalmic services, currently provided by relatively small practices, and the fact that the current contract, by reducing the fees available to those small practices, puts them at risk, which is a danger to public health in rural areas.

Mr. Amess: Many hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall simply say that I agree with my hon. Friend.

Clauses 24 to 30 propose changes to the level of personal control held by pharmacists. Again, there has been very little mention of that in the debate, which has been entirely about smoking. The relaxation of legal procedures would free up those health care professionals so that their skills and experience could be used more widely in the community, in health centres and clinics.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I apologise to hon. Members for not being present for the whole debate. As the only pharmacist in the House, I know that there is a great deal of concern about the possible relaxation of the supervision arrangements. Some people regard that as an opportunity to provide more services, but what could be lost is the presence of a qualified health professional in the high street at a known time. Has the hon. Gentleman an opinion on that?

Mr. Amess: The hon. Lady was a member of the Health Committee and has great knowledge of the subject. Again, so as not to annoy the House, I shall simply say that I agree with her.

I also agree with the Royal Pharmaceutical Society in highlighting the fact that, once again, the Bill allows for much of the detail of the changes to be written into the regulations that must be carefully drafted to deliver the benefits of flexibility for supervising pharmacists, while maintaining patient safety and ensuring that the Bill is not a short cut to spreading pharmacists over two or three pharmacy businesses.

Part 4 addresses the deregulation of pharmaceutical services. I welcome that with caution. Several aspects of these proposals come on the back of the recommendations of the "Over the Counter" report of 2003. However, although the control of entry regulations 2003 report by the Health Committee, of which I was also a member, concludes that the current system of control of entry regulations is "overly inflexible and in need of reform", it goes on to say that the

"recommendations of the OTC report have the potential to make certain pharmacies unviable, potentially leaving some of the most vulnerable communities, who have the greatest health needs and are least able to travel long distances, without any local pharmacy provision, a situation that would be unacceptable."

Therefore, I certainly stand by the Health Committee's 2003 report.

Although it is sensible that some of the restrictions on applications for contracts to dispense NHS prescriptions should be relaxed to deliver the best possible service to NHS patients, PCTs must retain the ability to plan the provision of local pharmacy services, and any reform to the regulatory framework should be unfolded in tandem with negotiations for a new payment system for pharmacies. Competition in the pharmacy sector should be supported only if it is proven to be compatible with a planned provision of pharmacy services that ensures provision in deprived areas.

This is another Health Bill—more legislation, more regulation. It is true that the Bill frees up health care professionals from the restrictive regulations and requirements of previous legislation. However, my concern in all the points that I have made is that, by reforming the frameworks in which infection control, ophthalmic services or pharmacy and pharmaceutical industries operate, the Government must be careful and consistent throughout the drafting of the regulations so that this opportunity to provide more freedom and flexibility in local health care provision is not squandered by the creation of more targets and bureaucracy, because that burden will hit the health service even more heavily, given its already over-burdensome regulation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Several hon. Members hope to catch my eye. If they could be brief in their remarks, more of them may well be successful.

8.32 pm

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Thank you very much, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in the debate on the Second Reading of this very important Bill, which will improve the well-being and health of women, men and children in the UK. I want briefly to concentrate on two aspects of the Bill: smoking in public places and the proposals for the ophthalmology service.

I was fortunate enough to be drawn fourth in the ballot for private Members' Bills in the last Session of the previous Parliament. In fact, I think that mine was the last Bill to be debated on Second Reading before the general election was called. The title of my Bill was Smoking in Public Places (Wales), and I was aided in proposing it by my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who is Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, and my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams), who is not in the Chamber. The purpose of my Bill was to call on the Westminster Government to enable the National Assembly for Wales to make its own decision about any smoking restriction that would apply in Wales. I am very pleased indeed that that is proposed in the Bill. Under part 1, decisions about smoking in Wales will be delegated to the Assembly, which will be able to determine its own restrictions, so I warmly welcome that delegation of power to the Assembly.

The Welsh Assembly has a long-standing commitment to ban smoking in workplaces and public places. It first debated and voted on the subject almost four years ago, when the Culture Minister in Wales, Alan Pugh, AM, proposed that "the National Assembly for Wales ... calls upon the UK Government to bring forward a public Bill relating to Wales which would provide that the Assembly could ... prohibit all smoking with tobacco in ... public buildings ... The purpose and effect of any such Bill ... would be to reduce the exposure of employees and members of the public to the well-documented and proven life-threatening dangers caused by environmental tobacco smoke".

The motion was passed by 39 votes to 10 and received the support of all parties. Four years later, we are enacting such a Bill.

Subsequent to that vote, and after the introduction of private Members' Bills in the other place by Baroness Finlay, a well-known palliative care consultant in Cardiff, and Lord Faulkner, who has already been mentioned, the Assembly set up the Committee on Smoking in Public Places, which was chaired by the Swansea, East Assembly Member, Val Lloyd. The purpose of the Committee was to examine developments in Ireland and other countries in which a ban had been enacted and to look at the debate in the UK. The Committee reported in May and the Assembly debated its report on 25 May. A motion in support of the report was carried by 40 votes to nine. I thus have absolute confidence that smoking will be banned in all public places and workplaces in Wales after consultation and an introductory period. I am pleased that that will be able to happen as a result of the Bill.

The Committee asked for powers to introduce a Bill to ban smoking in all enclosed workplaces and public places within two to three years. It recommended several exceptions, some of which have been mentioned today, such as "private dwellings, which may also be a place of work; ... designated areas in long-stay hospital units ... residential and nursing homes ... prisons"

and

"designated bedrooms or suites in hotels and guest houses, which are occupied solely by a smoker."

That is what happens in Ireland. I am glad that Wales will be able to go its own way on smoking.

I hope that the Government will rethink their proposals for a partial ban in England. There is overwhelming evidence in support of a total ban and the weight of opinion is in favour of that. The Government have a unique opportunity to use the Bill to help to prevent some of the misery that is inflicted by smoking. Why wait? I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said that most countries have progressed to a complete ban by stages, starting with a partial ban. However, we have the experience of those countries behind us. Why do we have to wait until more people die because of smoking-related illnesses that could have been avoided? We also know about the example of Ireland, which I visited a year ago with the all-party group on smoking and health. In Ireland, we have a near neighbour that had the vision to move ahead with a complete ban. The Government want to be bold and radical, so this is their opportunity to move ahead with a complete ban.

As other hon. Members have said, the hospitality industry wants a level playing field with no exemptions. The protection for people who work in pubs in which a ban will not be in place will obviously not be the same as that for people who work in places in which there is a ban. There is a suggestion that smoking will be banned in the bar areas of pubs in which food is not served, but it is impossible to draw a line around a bar across which smoke may not pass. The proposal is unworkable.

The Bill, as it stands, will not protect the health of all bar staff. Such a disparity cannot be fair. A partial ban would cause smokers to move from pubs to clubs and some pubs will stop serving food. The hospitality industry says that the proposal is unworkable. I think of city centre pubs in which no food is served and to which lots of young people go. Those young people are the ones who will continue to be exposed to cigarette smoke under the present proposals. I am sure that that is not what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wants.

Hon. Members have mentioned health inequalities. The health arguments for a complete ban are overwhelming. The fact that Liam Donaldson told the Health Committee that he considered resigning when his advice was not accepted is overwhelming evidence that the Government should not go ahead with their present plans.

My first job was in Sully hospital, a heart and chest hospital in the Vale of Glamorgan, south Wales. Many people coughed their lives away in those wards and I clearly remember their painful deaths. We cannot stop people smoking—indeed, one could say that they have the right to do so—but we can stop them inflicting their smoke on other people so that in public places, at least, people will not have to breathe other people's smoke.

The debate and public opinion has moved ahead rapidly. What would have been inconceivable five years ago is now, I think, totally acceptable. The Government have to move too, so I urge them to reconsider and, at the very least, allow Labour Members a free vote on the issue.

On optometry, I visited a community optometrist and a representative of the community optometric committee, at his request, in Pontprennau in my constituency last week. He wanted me to mention the concern felt by opticians and ophthalmologists in Wales about the proposals. They will not affect Welsh practitioners as things stand, but he was concerned about devolving the budget to primary care trusts. The opticians think that that will inevitably be capped and allow the PCT to select the people with whom they wish to contract. They fear that that could lead to a restricted service to patients.

Huge progress has been made in ophthalmology in Wales. Optometric practitioners can refer eye patients directly to consultants and surgeons in the hospital without going via the GP. They fear that the progress will be affected by the proposals if they go ahead in England. I ask the Minister to consider the implications of those on ophthalmology and to reconsider the proposals on smoking.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I have to admit that I am one of those described by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington) as a zealot in favour of the total ban. I am in good company because I join the right hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) and for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), and other right hon. and hon. Members.

We must face up to the fact that the reason for a ban on smoking in public places is to protect the health of all workers. All workers have equal rights to a healthy environment. That is the answer to Ministers who claim that, because we are protecting 99 per cent. of workers, we are doing all right. The problem is that the 1 per cent. we are not protecting work in the most smoke-filled environments. People do not go to work in a factory or a shop to smoke, but many of them go to the pub to smoke. It is the 1 per cent. who are not protected who are the most worthy of protection.

The Health Committee had to face the libertarian argument. A reader in biomedical ethics at Imperial college was asked, "How do we defend the fact that we are attacking people's liberty?" He said:

"It is a simple idea, first set out most clearly by John Stuart Mill in the mid-19th century, the idea that the main way in which you can justify restricting someone's liberty is where they are causing harm to others."

Much as I object to restricting people's liberty, if it causes demonstrable harm to others, it is justified.

In relation to the trip to Dublin, I want to add some figures to facts that were mentioned by other hon. Members. Support for the total smoking ban in Dublin before it was introduced was 67 per cent., which included 40 per cent. of smokers. Within a year after its introduction, 93 per cent. said it was a good idea, 80 per cent. of whom were smokers. A total ban can be popular. Compliance is high. It is easily understood and enforceable, and it is now a pleasure to go into pubs in Dublin.

The arguments against the partial ban have been mentioned at length. They include the worsening health inequalities and the fact that it is illogical and unenforceable. The people who impressed me in the Health Committee were representatives of the Bingo Association. We all have a lot of little old ladies in our constituencies whose only outing in the week is to go to the bingo hall. They probably smoke and drink while playing bingo. However, the Bingo Association wants a level playing field. Without a level playing field, bingo would move to other places such as pubs that do not serve food and where smoking is allowed, which would be quite wrong.

On our visit to Dublin, members of the Health Committee met a chest physician, Professor Luke Clancy, who reminded us of the effect of the Clean Air Act 1956 on London. I was a senior house officer at St. Stephen's hospital when that Act was enforced piecemeal by different local authorities. Professor Clancy reminded us that it took a decade effectively to lower levels of smog and produce health benefits. Ireland has adopted a big bang approach to a ban, which has worked, and it is the only way forward for us.

I shall take a leaf out of the book of the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and look at other equally important parts of the Bill. I am glad that the Government are going to issue a code of practice with related sanctions on the prevention and control of health care-associated infections. I welcome the Secretary of State's comments that the code will be based on existing good practice and that waiting list targets will not compete with infection control. However, there are some points that must be included in that code. Yesterday, with the right hon. Member for Rother Valley, who chairs the Health Committee, we met members of MRSA Action UK and MRSA Support, who expressed vitriolic anger about the lack of communication. One of my criticisms of the health service, particularly hospitals, is that communication between staff—nurses and doctors—and patients, is sadly lacking, possibly as a result of overwork. Members of those groups had relatives who had died of MRSA, but they had not been told that that was the cause of death. One of them alleged that they had received an unacceptable death certificate that just said, "Multi-organ failure due to sepsis." In my day, no registrar would accept such a certificate, because one had to say what had caused the sepsis.

Openness with the patient and the family is therefore needed, and to help with that, it may be necessary to formalise notification of those illnesses and make it mandatory. The list of notifiable diseases is under review, but diseases such as smallpox which, hopefully, has been eradicated, are still included. Hepatitis C and Legionnaire's disease are not on the list, and hospital-acquired infections and bugs, including MRSA and Clostridium difficile, which are serious pests, have never been included. There is an MRSA surveillance scheme, but it is not tough enough, so will the Minister consider introducing formal notification of those illnesses? If that is too cumbersome and slow, can another method be used?

As for the code of practice, most hospitals, if not all, have infection control teams, many of which follow protocols. During a previous Health Committee inquiry, our attention was drawn to the formulary used by University College hospital in London. Page 280 of the 2002 edition includes protocols for the eradication of staphylococcal infection and refers to protocols for the management of patients and staff with MRSA. I hope that such publications will inform the code of practice. The Healthcare Commission prepared a submission for our debate, which says:

"It will be vital that the code of practice is fully workable in practice and the Healthcare Commission urges that due time, consideration and consultation be taken over its content."

Part 3 deals with drugs, medicines and pharmacies. There is no place for lax management of controlled drugs. When I was a house physician a quarter of a mile from here at old Westminster hospital, the control of scheduled drugs was lax. Much has happened since then, and controls must be tightened up. However, pharmacists have considerable worries about the Bill, as the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) will know. I hope that in Committee those worries will be taken on in detail. Pharmacists do not know in detail the supervision requirements. How many pharmacies will one pharmacist be able to supervise? They are worried that the Bill may exacerbate the shortage of pharmacists.

To conclude, there are good parts and bad parts in the Bill. Returning to the subject of smoking, at the large cancer conference last week, an oncologist from Glasgow, who is very lucky to have the complete ban, said loud and clear that the one most important thing to improve the prevention of cancer was the total ban. Everything else, he said, was lip service.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) spoke about MRSA and the massive cover-up that has gone on for years about the scale of MRSA. He makes a true and valid charge. I, along with others, had made it over many years and particularly drew the attention of the House to death certificates recording that a person had died of pneumonia or septicaemia, when in fact the underlying cause of death was a hospital-related infection.

In fairness, the previous Member of Parliament for Welwyn Hatfield—a Minister who lost her seat at the general election—instructed hospitals that death certificates were to be filled in with clarity and precision. Unfortunately, that was not enforced. I called on the House and I call again for it to legislate to discipline or sack civil servants at any level who do not spell out in detail the cause of death on death certificates. I include hospital managers, members of trusts and officials right up to the Department of Health who cover up and conspire to keep the facts from Parliament and the public. I feel strongly about that.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, and the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) spoke about MRSA. Plaudits are due to the present Government, who have belatedly begun to address the matter. I wish that they had done so earlier. In the closing stages of the previous Government, I drew attention to the scale of the cover-up of MSRA. Lord Fitt, in another place, drew it to the attention of Baroness Cumberlege, a Minister of Health. It is on the record. In a special debate in the House, I drew the matter to the attention of the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), a decent man. I do not blame him, but he warned me from the Dispatch Box not to make party politics of it. It rubs me up the wrong way when I hear people accuse the Government of something that was neglected by the previous Administration. Two wrongs do not make a right. To some extent, both Governments are to blame.

Mark Pritchard rose—

Andrew Mackinlay: No, I cannot give way; I do not have time.

We want more effort from the Government. They have begun to deal with the problem, but the message is that Ministers, Labour and Tory, should listen to Back Benchers more, instead of listening to civil servants, and give us at least some credit for possibly knowing what we are talking about. Legislation and administration would be much better, and we could have started to combat MRSA a lot earlier, had people listened.

On smoking, we are told that the chief medical officer nearly resigned. He should have resigned, in my view. It is not very brave of him to say that he nearly resigned. It is an extremely important issue. In a small way, I quit one course of my career partly because of smoking. When I was first elected to this place, I was persuaded to be a Whip. Let me share with the House the fact that I did not like that at all and found it very uncomfortable. I aspired to more than reading out the folder every night and being a choreographer. In opposition, the Whips were all men, so I qualified on that count, but they were all smokers—it was like pea soup in the Whips room—which was one of the things that made me quit. The situation was offensive and I could not alter it. I remember sitting there thinking, "I don't need to put up with this", which is when I went to see Mr. Foster and said, "I don't want to be a Whip." The rest is history.

The right hon. Member for Loughborough—

Mr. Dorrell: Charnwood.

Andrew Mackinlay: A large part of England, anyway.

Earlier, the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said that employers and employees are working gradually to provide smoke-free workplaces. The truth is that employers are now moving to insist on smoke-free workplaces because they fear litigation. Whether or not we pass the Bill, employers are receiving a growing weight of advice that they could face some serious class actions in the future, because they failed to provide their workers with a smoke-free environment.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who is not in his place, has mentioned prison officers. We have a duty of care to prison officers and prisoners, regardless of whether we pass this legislation, and future Governments may face serious litigation by them.

I support the Bill, although it does not go far enough. I am deeply disappointed that it contains exemptions that will muddy the waters, that will not provide clarity and precision, but will provide the chemistry for division, argument and lack of enforcement. The burden of enforcement will be placed on bar owners and bartenders, whereas the ban in the Irish Republic has been enforced by peer pressure.

The Minister's notes state, "Keep repeating the mantra, 'It's in the manifesto.'" It will not wash. This is a good Bill, and I shall join the overwhelming majority of hon. Members in supporting it tonight because we want a ban. However, the manifesto did not say, "Thus far and no further." Does the Minister want me to conduct an audit of the policies that have not been implemented, although they were included in the manifestos on which we have stood, and the policies which have been implemented even though they were not in a manifesto? The Bill is in line with the manifesto, but so are my hon. Friends who are calling for a comprehensive and immediate ban along the lines of the policy introduced in the laboratory conditions provided for us by the Irish Republic, where the ban has worked.

I represent quite a poor, working-class area, which has the highest indices of heart disease, respiratory complaints, diabetes and asthma. I resent it when hon. Members who represent constituencies where a ban will be implemented because of devolution tell me that a different duty of care will apply to my working-class constituents. I should have thought that a Labour Government would not want the West Lothian question to be raised, and I did not raise it—other hon. Members raised it by interfering in the health care of my constituents and of others in England.

I believe that there is a majority in this House for a comprehensive ban. A week and a half ago, the Government were comprehensively defeated—they persuaded me to join them in the Lobby, which I rather regret now. They are not reading the political tea leaves because there is a majority in this House for a complete ban, but if they want to go down to a further defeat, that is their decision.

When the Secretary of State discussed the Bill, she said that she was proud to introduce it. She should be proud because, as she said, when the Bill goes through—flawed as it is—hundreds, nay thousands, of people will live longer as a consequence. Why would she allow it to be spoiled or diminished by not introducing a total ban on smoking in public places?

Libertarians say that people have the right to choose. I believe in full knowledge and full consent. However, in this case, we cannot provide full consent. We will have a ban in pubs, but not in working-class clubs. Young children are entitled to go into those clubs, and they do. We need to recognise that fact. The Secretary of State says that the ban will apply not only in the bar area but in other areas. That is nonsense, because it cannot be defined. There is bound to be argument and avoidance based on that fudge.

I hope that the Government will have the humility and common sense to reconsider the one area that has aggravated many Members on both sides of the House, but particularly among their Labour colleagues, who welcome the Bill and are proud to support it but see it flawed by sheer cussedness. The problem is that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

9.1 pm

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in this important debate.

My father died at 46 from throat cancer. I am an ex-smoker who smoked a lot. We both made our choices. I might therefore be expected to speak in favour of a total ban, but far from it. I have read the briefs from the learned gentlemen and organisations proposing a ban—the chief medical officer, the British Medical Association and the British Heart Foundation. They are all experts and they all want the Government to implement a comprehensive ban on smoking. I congratulate the Government on having the courage to say, "Yes, you are experts, but the role of Parliament is to balance the interests of various groups, non-smokers and smokers." If Dr. Liam Donaldson wanted to have a hissy fit because he is an expert and the Government would not implement his advice, they would have been well advised to accept his resignation.

What confuses me about this debate is why we get so pious about second-hand smoke even though the science is still a little shaky. We all experience the implications of second-hand alcohol—drunks who turn our town centres into war zones, drink-drivers who maim and kill thousands of people on our streets, and alcoholic parents and children who destroy families. When, Madam Deputy Speaker, was the last time you smoked 20 B&H and went home and beat up your husband or partner? It simply does not happen. If we are interested in protecting innocent parties, why on earth did this House vote to have 24-hour drinking? The implications of alcohol are far more pronounced and far better known than those of smoke.

Is smoking the ultimate evil afflicting our modern society? I talked to a headmaster at one of my local comprehensive schools who said, "Yes, smoking is a bad thing, but what really worries me is young people coming to school hungover or drunk and unable to participate in the day from beginning to end. A few of my students may be smoking behind the bike sheds two or three times a day. I disapprove of that, but at least they can take part in the school day." We compare cigarettes to drugs and alcohol. Cigarettes are addictive, but they do not rob people of their free will as drugs and alcohol do.

We have several extremely bold and courageous charities in Hertfordshire that help people to break severe addictions that lead them to violence against others and themselves. Several of them smoke and I am pleased that the Bill provides for people in residential situations to be allowed to continue to smoke. However, the charities also provide day-care services. It would be appalling if the Bill did not allow those who receive treatment for drug and alcohol addictions to smoke and, because they could not smoke to relieve their tension and angst, they went back on to the streets and pursued a life of violence again to feed their habits.

I have probably spoken for too long—I am full of passion and I would love to go on for longer. I shall make one final point. In Scotland, it appears that £66 million will be provided over the next three years for enforcement. If that were extrapolated to the UK, the figure would be £660 million for smoking-cessation officers. If the British public were presented with a choice between £660 million for smoking-cessation officers and the same sum for 4,500 new police officers, I believe that they would opt for the latter.

9.5 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) on his passionate speech.

I begin with the killer health care-associated infection in the hospital setting. I am proud of my local acute hospital in Stafford. It was a delight to write to the hospital recently to congratulate the management and staff on hitting the December target for waiting times two months early. No one now waits more than six months for an in-patient operation or more than 13 weeks for an out-patient appointment.

However, Stafford hospital featured in the general election campaign in a different light because of some misinformation from the Conservative party, which suggested that the rate of MRSA infections at the hospital was the equivalent of that for every infection in the past year in the west midlands region. When challenged, it said that that was a mistake. However, a similar incident occurred in Harrogate at the same time. Again, the Conservatives said that they had accidentally cited a regional rather than a hospital-specific figure. One such mistake may be misfortune, but two reek of gross carelessness if not worse in trying to frighten voters into making a particular choice at the election.

The infections are serious and Stafford hospital makes a conscientious attempt to test every vulnerable patient who enters the hospital. When I tour the laboratories at Stafford, I never cease to be impressed by the dedicated work of the scientific staff who carry out the tests. I know that my local hospital takes the matter seriously and we welcome the provisions for a new statutory code of practice coupled with a duty on the hospital to fulfil the standards, which the Healthcare Commission will enforce and inspect.

I should like to focus on the provisions that presage a much greater change in primary care services. We await the White Paper in the next few months, but the Bill contains some evidence of the Government's intention to make primary care services much more responsive to patients' needs. First, let me consider the provisions for pharmacists. I have been impressed by the willingness of pharmacists in my constituency to extend their role in primary care services, whether through help with smoking cessation, prescribing medicines—they are very much up for that—giving confidential contraception advice or helping people with long-term medical conditions to manage their medicines. They are a tremendous benefit to my local health economy. I visit local pharmacists regularly and have seen the changes that they have made in the skill mix of their staff and in their physical premises, which now include private places for confidential consultations. I therefore know that the changes on supervision and charges for which the Bill provides will rightly help to contribute to a greater role for pharmacists in primary care.

The same goes for my recent visit to the optometrists Webb and Lucas in Bridge street, Stafford. Like other hon. Members, I was lobbied about the changes in the Bill to the general ophthalmic service contracts. The optometrists are angry because their negotiations on a new GOS contract were proceeding unremarkably when the Bill, which refers to a new contract about which they had clearly not finished consulting, was published. I know that meetings have been held and reassurances given since the Bill was published, and I think that it is now accepted that this primary legislation opportunity was taken to put the framework in place, and that the consultation will continue on what the services will involve.

I would like to say how impressed I was by the members of the local committee whom I met that evening, and by how much they are up for improving their contribution to primary care services. They showed me what they are doing about diabetic eye screening, with the latest camera and computer technology to aid them. They told me about their joint management, with the paediatric services at the hospital, of children with visual problems. They also told me about the "red eye" service, and explained how they were developing a multi-disciplinary community approach to supporting elderly patients with failing eyesight. These are some of the remarkable provisions that they can add to our primary care services.

I know that the great debate tonight has been about smoking, but I will say only that the Bill's proposals on that issue fit with the small contribution that I have made to the debate about primary care services. So many people in primary care services are involved in smoking cessation and in helping people to overcome their addiction to smoking, thereby preventing second-hand smoking among those of us who do not smoke. Health visitors, pharmacists, GPs and practice nurses are all involved in that same aim.

A ban that gets us nearly to where we want to be is better than no ban at all, so I shall certainly support the proposals tonight. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) described how, when he joined the Administration Committee, he wanted to take the big bang approach to a total ban on selling tobacco in this place. He went on to describe how the ban was actually achieved over a number of years, a stage at a time. We will perhaps not achieve the big bang approach to a ban on this occasion, but I am sure that we will get there pretty soon.

I see that a fixed-penalty notice scheme is being proposed for those who break the law on smoking. As I have the ear of the Minister with responsibility for public health, I should like to ask her whether she would be willing to extend that approach to a subject close to my own heart at the moment. Will she consider introducing legislation to prevent people from interfering with women who are breast-feeding in a public place? Last week, once again, we saw the scandalous situation of a man complaining to the police about a woman breast-feeding discreetly in a public place. The police sent a squad car and a uniformed officer to stop her. We will never achieve the rate of breast-feeding in this country that we see in the Scandinavian countries, with the consequent public health benefits—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will confine his remarks to the Bill before us.

Mr. Kidney: I will indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope that the Bill will receive our support on Second Reading, because it brings significant measures to reduce smoke-related ill health, health care-associated infections, and the risk of the misuse of controlled drugs. It contains useful measures that will precede further reforms at primary care level. We are moving in the right direction by improving public health awareness, supporting public health services and cutting premature deaths, so I hope that the Bill will receive a Second Reading.

9.13 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I am a smoker, but I consider myself to be a very considerate smoker. I would not smoke in someone else's house, car or office, or near anyone who was having a meal. It is because I have that consideration for others that I find the parts of the Bill that relate to smoking totally objectionable. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) when he suggested that it would impinge on his liberty if someone else's cigarette smoke reached his nose. I entirely agree with that, and there is no reason why the rights of smokers and non-smokers cannot be accommodated. The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington) mentioned extractor units, which can be installed in pubs and can do a very good job. We live in a society in which people can make choices.

Many hon. Members have quoted figures relating to the number of people who want smoking to be banned in pubs. I think that those figures are probably exaggerated, but if we accept that they are right, and if there is such a large demand for non-smoking pubs and restaurants, the market will deliver those places, as it will in any other line of business. We will then end up with pubs in which people can smoke and have a meal, and pubs in which people do not smoke. We will also have pubs in which smoking is possible in some areas, and banned in others. In those circumstances, it seems to me that everybody would be happy.

The Government, however, make a play of protecting staff. In today's debate, nobody has asked how many people behind the bar of pubs smoke themselves. I have asked the Minister a parliamentary question about that, and the Government have not carried out such a survey. We are therefore trying to protect people from smoke who, in many cases, already smoke.

I also draw an analogy with people going down coal mines. I understand that there are 400,000 outstanding claims by miners or their families relating to people injured in coal mines, many of whom have died already. I do not know of a proposal to stop people going down coal mines, however. When I raised the issue with the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), he said that it is not necessary for people to smoke in pubs, but it is necessary for people to work down coal mines—I paraphrase him, but I think that that it is what he said. That is not true. People do not have to work down coal mines—we do not have to generate electricity through burning coal, as there are many other ways of doing so.

Mr. Barron: I worked down coal mines for many years, and the National Coal Board had to take action to protect me from ill health. I have not made a claim, and neither have many other people like me. It is up to the employer, however, to be responsible in terms of how their employees are treated.

Mr. Robertson: For goodness' sake, I do not think that it is possible to go down a coal mine and discover it to be a very healthy working environment.

The Government say that the ban is about protecting the health of people who work behind bars, and I accept that their health should be protected, but there are many licensed premises and a great shortage of catering staff, which is why so many illegal immigrants are employed in catering. Surely if there are different kinds of pubs and restaurants, bar and restaurant staff can find employment in those that suit them.

As many Members have mentioned, if we take the assertion that staff are the primary concern a step further, how can it be right to expose some people in some pubs to smoke, and yet say that in other pubs where food is served people will be protected from a smoky atmosphere? That defies logic. It is nothing to do with liberty. We know why the Government have adopted this position—because the Cabinet could not agree. Everybody would have more respect for the Government were they just to admit that. It is absolute nonsense to suggest that they are protecting some people's liberty.

If we are talking about protecting staff in pubs, as we should, I will mention my pub—I do not own it, but I go in it, as it is in my village. It is the Village Inn in Twyning, if anyone wants to look it up, and it is a fine establishment. The landlord and his wife run it, they both smoke and they do not employ any staff. How does the Government's logic stack up in that case? The pub serves food—it has a very small menu, as it is a country pub. If the ban goes through, let us say that the pub stops serving food, as I think that it would, because many people in that pub smoke. If the landlord chooses not to serve food so that we can continue to go in his premises and smoke, will I be banned from personally requesting a meal? Will I be stopped from going to the landlady and saying, "I am aware that you smoke, that your husband smokes and that it is a smoky atmosphere, but I want to exercise my choice to have a meal"? If I have a meal prepared at home, it is prepared in a smoky atmosphere. Why cannot I exercise that choice? Why should that choice be denied to me? It is ridiculous.

Martin Horwood: I thank the hon. Gentleman—my neighbour—for giving way. I am sure that he is right about what a wonderful establishment the pub at Twyning is, but he will surely accept that Twyning is not typical of either of our constituencies. We share a primary care trust. The difference in life expectancy between the most and the least affluent areas is eight years, which is considerable. A large part of that health inequality is due to smoking. The Bill in its present form aims to deal with it partially; we would deal with it completely.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman has made his point. If he will forgive me, I shall not respond to it in detail because there is not enough time.

If the Government are serious about stopping people smoking, which I do not doubt, and if smoking is so bad for us, which I do not doubt either, why do they not ban smoking altogether? There is a one-word answer: tax. We have heard from a number of Members how much smokers cost the national health service. By means of a parliamentary question, I established that not much research is done on whether those admitted to hospital are smokers. Let us, however, accept what the Minister told me in a separate answer—that the estimated cost of smoking-related diseases to the NHS is £1.8 billion a year. That is a lot of money, but we should also bear in mind that smokers put £8.1 billion a year into the Exchequer—more than four times as much. That is why I cannot see the Bill as anything other than a load of confusion, and rather hypocritical.

9.21 pm

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): I want to speak mainly about part 1, but I shall not repeat what has already been said. Essentially, there are two points of view. I shall only say that I believe that the Government will have to accept a full ban on smoking in public places, whether they do it now or later.

Michael Fabricant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Jeff Ennis: Certainly not. Some Labour Members may not be able to speak because of all the interventions that have already been taken, and I am not going to take any more interventions.

An important issue relating to part 1 has not yet been raised. I refer to the possibility of raising the age of sale of tobacco from 16 to 18 to bring it in line with alcohol and other age-restricted products. That is a glaring omission from the Bill. I have tabled two early-day motions on the issue, and on 18 October I presented the Age of Sale of Tobacco Bill under the ten-minute rule. Its aim is to raise the age of sale of tobacco and tobacco products to 18. I am delighted to say that the Government have made good progress in adopting a more consistent approach to age-restricted products in recent years. Under the Gambling Act 2005 the use of many gaming machines will be restricted to those over 18, and through the Violent Crime Reduction Bill the Government intend to raise the age of sale of airguns and dangerous knives from 17 to 18.

The Government must now extend that important policy to tobacco sales, a move that enjoys popular support. In a recent survey carried out by the BBC, 80 per cent. of the public—particularly those aged between 18 and 24—expressed support for it. We should bear in mind that 80 per cent. of smokers start smoking as teenagers. Moreover, the proposal is supported by the Trading Standards Institute, the body responsible for enforcing the laws relating to age-restricted sales. In a recent press release, the TSI said

"We believe that raising the age limit to 18, combined with stronger penalties against shopkeepers who repeatedly make underage sales, would make it more difficult for young people to regularly get their hands on cigarettes."

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. Gentleman would relate his remarks to the content of the Bill that we are discussing.

Jeff Ennis: But, Madam Deputy Speaker, I feel strongly that the issue should be considered when we debate the Bill's later stages. I intend to table an amendment, although I believe that the issue is relevant on Second Reading. I have raised it in the House before. I will take advice from you, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I think that the issue ought to be considered in greater detail.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has made passing reference to that. Will he now confine his remarks to the content of the Bill before the House?

Jeff Ennis: Obviously, I have to accept your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I have already made the basic point that I wanted to make. Will the Minister, in her closing remarks, give me a steer on whether the Government would be willing to consider an amendment along those lines? If they are reluctant to accept one, I would like further guidance from her on the ways and means by which I could bring the question to the Floor of the House in future debates.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): I wanted to speak on three parts of the Bill, but as so many Labour Members seem so agitated about the Bill, and want to speak about it, I shall confine my remarks to one part of it, and to a few moments.

I want to talk about hospital-acquired infections and the code of practice. Would the Minister consider putting a statutory obligation on the code of practice? I ask that because a number of practices in hospitals are bringing about hospital-acquired infections, and that requires more than guidelines. Many guidelines and publications have been issued over the years, but as some hon. Members have said, our general election policy, the cleaner hospitals campaign, was probably the right way to go about things.

Staphylococcus aureus, the bug at the root of hospital-acquired infections, has now become vancomycin resistant, too. It is a nasty little bug. Most people here will not yet have eaten this evening, so I shall not go into great detail about it, but it is very vicious in hospitals. What will the hospitals move on to from vancomycin? Heaven only knows. Vancomycin was held back because of complications caused by renal infections and other renal problems when it was given. The fact that MRSA is now becoming VRSA is extremely worrying to people who work in health care.

Hot-bedding seems to be one of the main problems. I never thought that I would say, "In my day", but when I was a nurse I was a good nurse, because I was terrified to be anything else. My matron was a good matron, and when she walked down the ward I shook in my boots, because if our ward was not spotless, and the bedside lockers and tables were not clean, we were in trouble—and we did not have MRSA in the hospital.

Let me give the House an example. When a patient went home or, unfortunately, died, the bed and the bedside cabinet would be cleaned down with chlorhexidine solution, as would the bedside table, the window sills, the floors and the metal on the bed. Everything would be stripped out. Now, when a patient passes away in hospital or is discharged home, the bed gets a quick wipe down and the next patient is in.

A hospital administrator told me recently that the reason for that practice was targets: the hospital had to meet targets and get patients through quickly. I was told that there was a patient with MRSA at the end of the ward that I was standing in. Unfortunately, the administrator had not been allowed to close down the ward, or have it barrier-nursed or sterilised. Why not? Because the hospital management had told him that they had a target to meet.

Mr. Devine: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dorries: No, because other Members want to speak. [Interruption.] Labour Members want to speak, too.

[Mrs. Dorries]

The reason why the ward had not been closed was that the hospital had a target throughput of so many operations to do that day from that ward. The patient was moved to the end of the ward, and new admissions were taken into a ward containing a patient with MRSA. That is targets.

Another factor that contributes to hospital-acquired infections is also illustrated by what happened in my day. We were not allowed to go home or travel back to work in our uniforms. Now, one sees nothing else but nursing and medical staff going home in their uniforms. They may not even wash them, and then they travel back in them. Even if the ward is clean, 25 per cent. of infections are brought into the hospital from outside.

We could have a statutory code of practice saying that medical staff must not wear their uniforms to go home, that there is to be no hot-bedding in the wards, that the wards must be clean, and that auxiliary staff are to be brought back into the wards. We used to supplement the cleaning staff.

I shall not continue, Madam Deputy Speaker, because I want to finish my speech in less than my five minutes, but I hope that the Minister will take what I have said on board, and will consider making the code of practice statutory.

9.29 pm

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): I will be brief. In the time available, I would like to make one or two points. Some hon. Members—including the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and my hon. Friends the Members for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) and for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington)—have spoken against the ban, but I would have to characterise their speeches as disingenuous. They all failed to address the issue of the work force—precisely the point of principle at stake in the Bill.

When my right hon. Friend opened the debate, she was right to say that a point of principle was at stake. That, indeed, is the issue that is exercising many Labour Members. I carried out a survey in my constituency and the results were similar to those that emerged from the consultation that my right hon. Friend very properly instituted after the election. In my survey, too, 90 per cent. of people wanted a ban.

Hon. Members will recognise that we receive more letters on certain subjects than on others. I have to tell my right hon. Friend that I have received many letters on many issues during the past eight years and that a smoking ban is about the fourth most commonly raised with me. Many people have written to ask for a complete ban and I have to say that my sympathies lie with them.

What is the point of principle? It is this: in a public health context, the Bill could be seen as a missed opportunity. It could help to transform people's lifestyle, particularly that of younger people, in a way that we want. We want to help them to lose the habit of smoking. The Government have an opportunity to use the Bill to send out a message to protect the work force and bring about, as I say, an important cultural change. It has even happened in New York of all places. Mayor Bloomberg, a Republican—not on the socialist wing of American politics—introduced a smoking ban. Similar measures have also been introduced in California, Sweden, Ireland and Norway.

I ask my right hon. Friend and her ministerial colleagues to imagine that the House had legislated on clause 3 exemptions and stated that drinking and driving was illegal, but said, "Well, after 2 am, it will not be, because there are not many cars on the road". Imagine if we made seatbelts compulsory, except in cars whose drivers had more than 30 years' experience and a clean licence. Another parallel—[Interruption.]—I ask the House to think of the principle behind it: imagine saying that children were not allowed to work in factories, save where the factory owner had children. Some kind of sensitivity may be built into that, but I would have to point out to my right hon. Friend that the illogicality behind such thinking is stark. Similarly, if we leave the current anomaly in the Bill, we will leave those not covered by the legislation to the harmful, smoke-filled environment.

I understand that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will have a difficult task in making her winding-up speech. I would like to assist her. I have with me a speech that was prepared earlier, but it is not my speech that I would like to offer her, it is the speech given by the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward) when he announced the decision on the total ban in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The Secretary of State for Health said that this is a landmark Bill, and so it has proved for the Government. I have counted the speeches by Back Benchers today. We have had a total of 25—a remarkable effort—of which those from Labour Members for the Government counted three, but eight were against, and I am honestly not clear about two others. That is something of an embarrassment for the Secretary of State.

The right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) spoke eloquently about health inequalities, a theme that ran through the debate. He specifically mentioned that 85 per cent. of pubs in Corby were likely to be exempt under the Bill and he was very concerned about the inequalities that that might engender. The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) was pressed on cannabis and he needs to construct a more cogent response. The Liberal Democrats support the Government's ban on smoking, but wish to liberalise the smoking of cannabis. I am not sure whether we heard a change of policy today, but the hon. Gentleman may wish to revisit the issue at some point.

The right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) also talked about health inequalities and made the valid point that there is a real risk that smoking will be concentrated in those pubs that do not sell food, which risks turning such pubs into smoking dens. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), I am a liberal Conservative, but I am persuaded that the do-nothing option is untenable, given the evidence that we now have about the effects of second-hand smoke. We have to act, given the evidence that second-hand smoke causes problems. If we do not do so, we are failing our constituents. The question is how we reach the situation in which the majority of our constituents do not smoke and we reduce the incidence of lung cancer, cardiovascular disease, sudden infant death syndrome and so on.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) also talked eloquently about health inequalities. Last night, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) was with me in a pub. We were not drinking; he was smoking, but I was not. He gave a classic "cry freedom" speech, which was very stimulating. The hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) was the first supporter of the Government. He gave a tour de force in which he attacked the bourgeoisie and I was thrown back 50 years to a time of class warfare. If his thesis were correct, perhaps the best way to reduce health inequalities would be to increase smoking, because then the bourgeoisie would get sicker and those whom he defined as working class would get healthier. I may be confused: the hon. Gentleman certainly sounded confused in his contribution.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) made a fantastic speech that drew an important distinction between private and public spaces. He and I agreed on the Tobacco Advertising and Promotion Act 2002, when I was very new to this place, and we share a passion for reducing smoking. I certainly have that passion, both professionally and politically. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) rightly talked about Ireland and its experience and the lessons that we can learn. She also pointed out that 59 per cent. of pubs in Liverpool do not serve food and therefore could fall into the smoking den trap, about which many of us are concerned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) talked about optical services and the other aspects of the Bill that risk being sidelined by our passion to address the smoking elements. The hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) said that the Bill is unworkable, and that point was echoed by several of her colleagues.

In bringing forward the measure, the Secretary of State has asked the House to give her more or less a blank cheque, which will allow her and her successors to fill in the important detail at leisure through regulation. I believe that the chief medical officer is relying on that blank cheque in withholding his threatened resignation. I presume that he hopes for a comprehensive ban through regulation at some point in the future.

Although the Bill is primarily about smoking, we should not ignore its important additional features. We can agree on many of them, although we shall seek clarification and improvement in Committee. For example, why does part 3 contain no clarity over pharmacy supervision or standard operating procedures? We need the detail on how many pharmacies one person will be able to supervise. Why does part 4 apparently give PCTs carte blanche to charge pharmacists to set up new contracts? Will part 4 indeed favour larger chains at the expense of the high street, and therefore reduce choice?

Why have ophthalmic services been bolted on to the Bill in advance of the Government's consultation on general ophthalmic services? Will the Government accept that PCTs that are strapped for cash will be tempted to degrade eye tests that they buy? To what extent will small high street opticians struggle under the new regime? Will the Minister outline the intended contents of the hospital-acquired infection code of practice? Will its benefits outweigh the cost of the yet more paperwork, tick boxes and administrative hassle that our hard-pressed professionals have to cope with? Why have the Government ignored Sir Nigel Crisp's view that target-driven high bed occupancy lies at the heart of our high MRSA rates?

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) did not talk about smoking cannabis, but he laid into ventilation without offering any evidence when pressed. That brings me to the very good speech by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington). He is something of an expert in this sphere because he has industrial experience and is a smoker, and in his useful contribution he defenestrated the argument that ventilation has nothing to offer. It is a pity that Ministers have not at least considered the possibility that ventilation might have something to offer in all this.

The hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) supported a total ban on smoking and cited international experience, particularly in the Republic of Ireland, quite rightly. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) is a complete ban man, and brought to mind the hon. Member for Derby, North in his reference to King James's counterblast to tobacco.

I am sorry that I missed some of the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess). I understand that he spoke extremely knowledgeably about pharmacy and ophthalmology, and wondered whether either would be improved by the Bill.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) asked for a free vote. The Conservative party will be offering its Members a free vote on this issue, and I call on the Minister to do her own Members the courtesy of offering the same.

The Bill is chiefly about a smoking ban, which, in part 1 weighs most heavily on issues to do with personal choice and freedom, and has the greatest capacity to improve public health. Evidence-based public health is the only basis on which we should consider a ban. We must separate it entirely from amenity and nuisance, which are more properly dealt with elsewhere. Nowhere is the Government's conflation of nuisance with ill health more obvious than in the great play made of banning smoking within some arbitrary distance of the bar. The Government have admitted that there is no evidence that banning smoking at the bar would yield health benefits. Their consultation document referred to it as a "courtesy measure". We cannot legislate for courtesy, but we can legislate for public health. I submit that the public health argument for the red line on our carpet here in the Chamber is stronger than that for the arbitrary line that the Health Secretary wants to scratch on pub floors. At least the two swords' separation carries some logic in public health terms, and 80 per cent. of consultation respondents seemed to agree with that.

[Dr. Andrew Murrison]

The Government's muddle-headedness extends to the artificial distinction between pubs that serve food and pubs that do not. To be fair, the illogical association of food and smoking was made by the Health Secretary's predecessor. She may regret it—the chief medical officer certainly does—but this is her Bill and she is responsible for it. Sir Liam Donaldson is supported by the results of the Government's consultation exercise, which showed that 90 per cent. of respondents were against exempting pubs that serve food.

Clause 4 introduces the possibility of a ban on smoking in a range of outdoor places. If it is not expedient to remove a toxin by banning it, we must control exposure to it by other means. If airborne contaminants in industry settings can be removed satisfactorily using ventilation, we should not dismiss out of hand such an engineering solution in the hospitality sector, yet that is precisely what Ministers have done. Exceptions to the ban are likely to be made by the Minister. Surely an insistence on such ventilation and acceptable levels of atmospheric contamination would be both a reasonable compromise and a possible benefit to exempt establishments that may have future employee claims to defend.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) is a self-confessed anti-smoking zealot. He talked about the Clean Air Act 1956. I am pleased about that because that Act was introduced by a Conservative Government. He continued to give us a tour de force of the rest of the Bill—quite a task, given its complexity.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) is one of the two supporters of the Government whom I counted—[Interruption.]—in respect of the Bill, I hasten to add, and unusually so. He talked with passion about MRSA. He also told us how smoking ended the sparkling ministerial career that was otherwise surely his for the taking.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) made a thoughtful, passionate speech that balanced libertarianism, good sense and pragmatism. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) rightly praised the extended role of pharmacists and reflected the annoyance of opticians about the appearance of clauses 34 to 40 in the midst of the consultation on general ophthalmic services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) rightly drew our attention to the illogicalities of the Bill and the division that it has caused in the Cabinet. The hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis) referred to raising the age of sale of tobacco to 18—an interesting concept that perhaps contrasts with the ten-minute Bill and the comments made by the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams) earlier today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries)—a nurse, of course—talked about MRSA and VRSA. Interestingly, the Nursing Standard pointed out on 8 March that 40 per cent. of nurses said that they did not have time to clean bed space between patients. Finally, the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) talked about drink driving.

Tobacco is surely captain of the men of death. I spent 20 years trying to persuade people to stop smoking. As a politician, I had rather hoped to have a Bill that would be more likely to address smoking than this one. It is a missed opportunity. My hon. Friends will use their judgment and will vote freely. I hope the Minister will allow Labour Members to have a free vote, too.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): We have had a very interesting debate, which very much reflects discussions not only in Cabinet, but among the public, about an issue that commands a range of arguments about personal choice and health. We have heard 25 Back-Bench speeches this evening. That is welcome. I absolutely respect the views of my colleagues who would like to see a total ban. I understand their passion, but I hope that, as I proceed, they will understand what we are trying to achieve with a focused package not just on smoking, but on tackling health inequalities across the piece.

Given the comments by the hon. Members for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) and for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who had some difficulty earlier in describing Conservative party policy, I am still not clear about their policy. [HON. MEMBERS: "What policy?"] Exactly—they raised health inequality issues, but as far as I could see, they would leave such things to self-regulation and they had no immediate plan for any legislation whatsoever. We are going a lot further than that. Given the responses of many Conservative Back Benchers—not just the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), but many others—it was clear that they were unsure about exactly what the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire was suggesting.

We are debating the Bill in the context of a national health service that is providing faster treatment, with more nurses and more doctors. Survival rates for more major cancers are improving and more people are surviving heart attacks. If people need a heart operation, they will be treated within three months and usually much sooner. There is more choice about health.

Services such as NHS Direct and walk-in centres are all helping to turn the NHS from being just a service for sickness into a health service that is about prevention. That is why NHS stop smoking services have helped more than 500,000 people to quit and stay quit after four weeks. It is one of the reasons why we are considering how we can support families with a better diet. It is why 2 million children get a free apple, pear or satsuma every day through the school fruit and vegetable scheme. Such measures are part of a health service in its widest possible sense and, having succeeded in making progress in all those areas, the Bill will tackle issues surrounding patient safety, primary care and public health.

Let me deal first with issues that hon. Members have raised about measures in the Bill outside those on smoking. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) and others talked about MRSA. I am pleased to hear that the rates are going down at Lewisham hospital. She made a good point about testing because many people who arrive at hospital are already infected. She also mentioned care homes and the co-operation of visitors, which will be important if we are to deal with MRSA rates. There is still a lot of work in progress. We are in discussion with the Healthcare Commission about how to make the code stronger, even though consultation indicated that the content was thorough. Another draft will be available before the Bill is passed—it should be available early in 2006.

Hon. Members talked about the choice between controlling infections and closing wards. Decisions on ward closures are made locally. There must be a balance between the risk of patient infection and risks associated with clinical delivery. However, not closing wards could prevent the control of outbreaks, and thus be more of a risk to meeting other targets. The situation is not clear-cut.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford and the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire asked about the private sector. We propose to consult on proposals next spring on, among other things, introducing provisions of the new code to regulations under the Care Standards Act 2000. There will also be a consideration of issues surrounding care homes and the voluntary sector.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) asked about death certificates. They will be completed by doctors. It is doctors' responsibility to identify the underlying cause of death. However, patients with MRSA who die are often already seriously ill with other conditions, so it is sometimes difficult to identify that cause. However, the situation regarding death certificates is being examined.

Several questions were asked about ophthalmic services. The review is examining what scope there is to make greater use of the primary care sector when delivering such services and how to make the best use of available skills in primary care. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) set out exactly the sort of services that are being provided in some areas. Such services could be provided further. There is no immediate change to the payment to practitioners and no change for patients. There will still be a central budget for reimbursement for local sight tests. I do not think that there will be any impact on rural areas. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), the provisions will not impact on Wales.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) made a point about clause 18 and controlled drugs. We have held discussions with the Royal Pharmaceutical Society. There is already the power of entry into community pharmacies, but we can consider setting out in regulations other specific persons who could enter and inspect relevant organisations. The pharmacy provisions are all about bringing services closer to people. Our "Your health, your care, your say" consultation showed how much people valued their pharmacists and the health care that they provide.

On smoking, I say this from the outset. Several hon. Members talked about young people, especially teenage girls. I am pleased to inform the House that the prevalence of smoking among teenage girls has gone down. In 1996, 13 per cent. of 11 to 15-year-olds smoked, but the figure had gone down to 9 per cent. by 2004. The figure for all women between the ages of 16 and 19 in Great Britain went down from 31 per cent. in 2001 to 25 per cent. in 2003. That is to be welcomed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis) and I have had several discussions about raising the age at which people may smoke, and I am considering the matter. We need to examine some of the evidence that he presented to the House when he introduced his Bill.

In relation to the provisions on smoking, let me quote two opinion formers. Deborah Arnott, the director of ASH, said:

> "This Bill will be a big step forwards for public health. If passed into law, it will save thousands of lives every year, as vulnerable people are no longer exposed to dangerous second-hand smoke at work, and as thousands of smokers are encouraged to cut down or quit altogether."

Giles Thorley, chief executive of Punch Taverns, one of the largest operators of public houses, said:

> "If self-regulation is no longer possible for the licensed trade industry, then legislation that offers both licensees and pub customers some degree of choice is certainly the next best thing. Although we acknowledge that the proposed non-food/food split will present some landlords with difficult decisions, nonetheless we feel that the distinction is relatively straightforward and workable as well as preserving some degree of choice."

The measures are a huge step forward. They will make enclosed workplaces covering more than 99 per cent. of the work force completely smoke-free. They will give choice to many millions of people in England. The number of smokers in England has fallen by 1.2 million since 1998. That is because of the considerable work done by the Government to tackle not only NHS services, but tobacco control, advertising and so forth.

Many hon. Members commented on the consultation. It is important to remember where the policy started. We consulted widely on "Choosing Health: making healthier choices easier", the most significant public health White Paper for generations. We learned that both smokers and non-smokers overwhelmingly wanted us to restrict smoking in public places, but the support was not as high for a total ban. Although support for that has increased, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) said, figures for the latest survey show that 31 per cent. of the public support it. There was, however, considerable support for banning smoking in places where there is food and in restaurants. We have had to grapple with the problem of reconciling health issues with what the public want in order to decide how to move forward.

Public opinion is important. It is not about popularity, but about taking the public with us. Several hon. Members talked about enforcement. That is important, but one reason why we know that voluntary bans, which we have seen for many years on transport, in restaurants and in other public places, have succeeded is because the public—smokers and non-smokers alike—supported them. That is why enforcement of the proposals—they are radical and far-reaching, but they have the support of the public—will be light touch.

Many countries decided to have exemptions in the first instance, especially in the hospitality sector. It is not a case of simply jumping ahead. They did that for the very reason that they could command public support and take the public with them. That is why we have chosen to do the same thing. That goes for California, New York, Norway and practically every country in the European Union.

Let us not forget that Ireland also has exemptions. In response to hon. Members who mentioned Northern Ireland, I acknowledge that there was a consultation, but I have yet to see a public survey based on those conducted by the Government and ASH, through MORI and other companies, in which the public were directly asked for their views. [Interruption.] That was its choice.

We are working to tackle the things that affect health, in particular health inequalities. The biggest determinant of health outcomes is poverty. If I believed that a total smoking ban would affect the problems that I have seen in my constituency, in my life and as Minister with responsibility for public health, I would sign up to it tomorrow, but it is not as easy as that. We know that smoking takes place in the home. We know that people are affected by many other things that have an impact on their health inequalities. We have a package that will take us far further forward in reducing health inequalities and that shows that we are willing to act in an important area.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

HEALTH BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Health Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday 10th January 2006.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

HEALTH BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a), (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Health Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State by virtue of the Act,

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other enactment.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Immigration

That the draft Asylum (Designated States) (No. 2) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 24th October, be approved.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

International Immunities and Privileges

That the draft European Forest Institute (Legal Capacities) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 26th October, be approved.

That the draft European Court of Human Rights (Immunities and Privileges) (Amendment) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 3rd November, be approved.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

Reducing the Climate Change Impact of Aviation

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 12790/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Communication: Reducing the Climate Change Impact of Aviation; welcomes the work of the European Commission in taking forward the work programme on reducing the climate change impact of aviation; and supports the Government's approach to continuing to press for the inclusion of aviation in the EU Emissions Trading Scheme from 2006 or as soon as possible thereafter.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

TAX LAW REWRITE BILLS (JOINT COMMITTEE)

Ordered,

That Mr Kenneth Clarke, Mr Nick Clegg, John Healey, Kali Mountford, Mr Andy Reed, Mark Tami and Peter Viggers be members of the Select Committee appointed to join with a Committee of the Lords as the Joint Committee on Tax Law Rewrite Bills.—[Gillian Merron, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITIONS

BUPA Care Services

10 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I would like to present a petition on behalf of my constituent, Mrs. Dee Sedgwick, about the care given to her mother, Mrs. Joan Gaddes, a resident in a care home for the elderly owned by BUPA Care Services. The petition states:

Wherefore your Petitioner prays that your Honourable House will urge this Government to take effective steps to bring BUPA to account and that the avoidable suffering and death of a dearly loved mother is not so easily excused in future.

To lie upon the Table.

Scottish Regiments Campaign

10.1 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I take enormous pleasure in presenting a petition on behalf of Andrew Nigel Hamilton of 16, Lynedoch place, Edinburgh and formerly of the Black Watch. He makes material observations to the effect that the abolition of the Scottish regiments is disgraceful and counter-productive. He make the point that the collapse in recruitment to the Scottish division amply demonstrates that the Government's policy is leading not just to a betrayal of tradition but an operational disaster for the Scottish division. Some 165,000 people in Scotland and far beyond have endorsed the petition, which will be taken to Downing street tomorrow. It states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition to Save the Scottish Regiments Campaign

Declares that Her Majesty's loyal army is at "overstretch" and is also facing the hitherto unforeseen threat to her country's homeland security posed by the London suicide bombers.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge Her Majesty's Government:

To re-examine with immediate effect, by means of a Defence Review, its decision to reduce the number of infantry battalions from 40 to 36.

To cancel, subject to the outcome of the Defence Review, the decision to amalgamate The Royal Scots regiment with the King's Own Scottish Borderers regiment.

To cancel the decision to replace the six historic Scottish infantry regiment with a single large regiment.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mines Rescue Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda]

10.3 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The main town in the constituency of North-West Leicestershire is Coalville—a place created by an industry that provided it with work, shaped its community, fashioned its landscape and gave it its name. My constituency office is close to the town centre and just a few hundred yards from the old No. 5 pit of Whitwick colliery. In the early hours of 19 April 1898, 42 men were in that pit when a fire broke out, 34 of whom were cut off and perished. Of the eight men who escaped by the main roadway or by the return airway, one bravely returned to the smoke and fumes in an attempt to help his workmates, but tragically he, too, died. That man, Charles Clamp, a 27-year-old onsetter, was heroically doing a job that has developed in the past century into a key role in the modern-day Mines Rescue Service, the courage, skill, knowledge and professionalism of which are renowned wherever coal has been mined in our nation.

I was privileged to unveil a statue on the centenary of that worst disaster in the history of the Leicestershire coalfield, and ever since then I have kept in touch with the MRS through visits to its original local headquarters in Ashby and its modern base at nearby Moira. Generations of mining communities have looked to the MRS and its predecessors for assistance. Now the MRS needs our help as it carves out a new future in a country with just a handful of remaining deep mines. Tonight's debate will summarise its present position and the options available to us.

Following the privatisation of the mining industry by the previous Conservative Administration, the Mines Rescue Service was formed on 17 January 1996 for the purpose of taking over the operations of the Mines Rescue Service and associated activities previously undertaken by the British Coal Corporation. Its turnover in the year to 31 March 2005, including £2.5 million from the Coal Authority, was around £6 million and its operating costs were £7.1 million. The MRS has, over the past nine years, followed a strategy designed to counteract the decline in membership fees paid by the coal mines by increasing other income earned by its employees.

Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab) rose—

David Taylor: I will happily give way to my hon. Friend, who advised me in advance that he wished to participate in the debate.

Colin Burgon: I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. Today I spoke with Steve Kemp, the general secretary of the National Union of Mineworkers, who believes that the Mines Rescue Service should be treated in much the same way as the ambulance and fire service. He also believes, as I do, that it should be taken back into public ownership, along with what is left of our deep mine coal industry. Will my hon. Friend deal with these matters?

David Taylor: I hope the Minister will do so too. My hon. Friend knows from previous conversations that I fully agree with such an outcome. We shall see whether the Minister announces it in his response.

The other income that the MRS has tried to develop has been earned by the provision of health and safety services to industry in general, and it has so far successfully enabled funding gaps to be covered. The strategy has enabled the MRS to retain its highly trained personnel during a time when confidence in the future of the coal industry has been very low. The past 12 months, however, has seen a sudden and marked decline in output from the deep mines—13.1 million tonnes falling to 9.5 million tonnes—at a time when the industry itself has been in some financial difficulty. An anticipated fee income of £2.3 million has declined to £1.5 million, leaving a shortfall of £800,000.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): My hon. Friend probably knows that I still have a deep coal mine in my constituency. I am one of the few people who believe that there is a future for deep mining in this country because we have access to millions of tonnes of reserves, but without the MRS on standby I do not know how the ordinary services could do the special job that it does if they were ever needed—God forbid—to go underground to rescue people at Maltby colliery.

David Taylor: That is a topic for a separate debate. There are 800 million tonnes of coal left in north-east Leicestershire, and I agree that we need to work those reserves in the future. The need for the MRS will be acute at that time.

Every effort is being made by the MRS to increase other income and reorganise services to the remaining underground mines without reducing standards. It is anticipated that the shortfall of £800,000 can be reduced by some £500,000, leaving an actual shortfall of £300,000, which can be carried this financial year, but losses cannot be sustained for next year. Action must be taken now to stop the decline.

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): I have a mines rescue station at Houghton-le-Spring in my constituency, which has a proud and brave history. As we have lost the last deep coal mine in the northern region, the service has diversified into other areas, particularly specialist training in the fire service. Does my hon. Friend believe it would be a good idea for the Government to consider some seed-corn resources, as such diversification can be very expensive to develop? That would give the MRS the support that it needs to develop such training.

David Taylor: I am pleased that my hon. Friend mentioned that and I thank him for it. I shall deal with the point at the end of my speech.

The MRS is in discussion with the Health and Safety Executive, mine owners, trade unions and its own employees about a more efficient use of the mines rescue resource. Operational personnel cover 24/7 and they will, within the constraints of the legislation, provide an overall framework of emergency cover to the mines as efficiently and effectively as they can. These changes will not reduce numbers overall, but will release operational personnel for income-generating work elsewhere.

The expertise of the MRS is unique and its advice and training is much sought after by industry, fire brigades and the civil resilience directorate. I know that it will continue to work with these as long as it is financially able. The UK coal industry has an enviable record for safety worldwide and the MRS will hopefully continue to play a major role in ensuring that that continues as long as underground mines exist in the UK.

May I instance just one example of how the MRS has diversified in recent times? On 11 May 2004, a huge explosion at the ICL Stockline plastics factory in Maryhill, Glasgow caused a four-storey building to collapse, killing nine people and injuring 40. In the three days of intense rescue and stabilisation activity that followed the collapse of the factory building, more than 200 firefighters were involved in freeing trapped workers from the wreckage. Time is, of course, the crucial factor in such search and rescue operations, and the work of the Strathclyde fire and rescue service was greatly assisted by the presence at the scene of staff from the MRS office in Fife.

The chief officer of the Strathclyde fire and rescue service, Brian Sweeney, has praised the role that the 14 members of the MRS staff played at Stockline over that tense three-day period, which has subsequently led to training and development links of the sort that my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington, East (Mr. Kemp) mentioned being forged between Strathclyde fire and rescue service and the MRS. When my office contacted Mr. Sweeney, he said:

"The expertise and commitment of the Mines Rescue team from Crossgates, Fife was invaluable during the search and rescue phase of the tragic incident at Stockline Plastics, Glasgow . . . The knowledge, skills and experience of the Mines Rescue staff provide a much valued resource to enhance the skills and safety of firefighters in the area of Urban Search and Rescue."

That endorsement of the specialist skills and professionalism of MRS staff clearly illustrates the enduring importance of such skills in reacting to disasters of a potentially bewildering diversity, particularly in urban areas.

In discussing with the MRS its experiences at Stockline, I have been struck by the impact on search times that its expertise brought to the situation. Minor details suddenly become extremely significant when the clock is ticking on a search and rescue operation in such a hazardous environment as a collapsed building. The fact that the breathing apparatus that the MRS carries as standard has a minimum of four hours air supply increases in importance when one realises that the standard air supply carried by a firefighter is 20 minutes. That is not a criticism of firefighters or the fire and rescue service—far from it—it merely provides further demonstration of the flexibility, adaptability and specialised nature of the skills and equipment possessed by MRS staff.

In my county, Leicestershire, the MRS has supported and assisted the fire and rescue service in a number of ways, most significantly in the development of Leicestershire fire and rescue technical rescue team. As a result of that partnership, Leicestershire is one of the leading fire and rescue services in the new dimension urban search and rescue roll-out programme. Ian Holden, the manager of Leicestershire's technical rescue team, has commented:

"Our joint collaboration with the MRS . . . has increased our capacity to assist members of the public who are in need of rescue. There is no other organisation that has this technical expertise within the United Kingdom."

I appreciate that the fire service comes under the remit of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, but I am sure that the Minister agrees that that is powerful testimony.

The continued decline of the domestic coal industry is an obvious challenge for the MRS, and UK Coal's sudden and unexpected closure of the last working coal mine in the north-east of England, Ellington, was an unwelcome shock for all concerned. However, the MRS has been able to mitigate the impact of the loss of working mines in the UK by planning for it. The sale of land assets, not least the former headquarters at the Selby complex, and a 29 per cent. increase in income from non-traditional streams in the past year, have enabled the MRS to address its pension fund deficit, invest in its national network of rescue stations and training centres and upgrade vital search, escape and rescue equipment.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way and congratulate him on securing the debate. He has mentioned other income streams: the MRS headquarters in Mansfield has recently been used as an estate agents to sell holidays and holiday cottages and flats abroad. A recent case involved land and property in northern Cyprus owned by refugee Greek Cypriots, one of whom resided in my constituency. Such practices do not suit the operation of the MRS, and I urge my hon. Friend to urge his friends to desist from such activities.

David Taylor: That is not the sort of diversification that I had mind, and I will certainly raise the matter with the MRS.

The growing range of emergency escape and rescue services provided by the MRS offers an alternative source of income that benefits not only the company, but society as a whole. The Government have provided financial assistance to the MRS to the tune of £2.5 million in each of the past two years, but that is not the whole picture. The Minister for Energy, who is unable to respond today, has said:

"This funding enabled Mines Rescue Services Ltd. to reimburse to UK deep-mine operators the production-related levy sums which the latter had paid to the company throughout that period."—[Official Report, 6 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 464W.]

The payments from the Coal Authority to the MRS have gone back to the mining companies, which are thereby assisted by the Coal Authority in that regard. It is a source of regret to the MRS, its staff and its many supporters that the £2.5 million payments from the Coal Authority to itself via the MRS have been the extent of a Labour Government's financial help to a service that is increasingly needed beyond the shrinking confines of its industrial origins. The MRS only ever budgets to break even and still performs its statutory duties at the remaining deep coal mines in the UK to a high standard. Although the Government have helped to prolong the existence of some of the remaining pits by making those payments from the Coal Authority to the MRS over the past two years, I feel that they should make a continued further contribution to secure the continued existence of the MRS. The long-term strategic aims of the company are working, and it is anticipated that its continued diversification will reduce net costs and enable it to become less reliant on the UK deep coal mine industry. Yet member companies running underground coal mines in the UK continue to have access to a fully functioning and cost-effective emergency escape and rescue capability.

Consolidation of the role of the MRS in the provision of escape and rescue emergency services in the mining sector has been achieved in the form of a three-year contract with the Coal Authority. The deal is to provide 24/7 emergency response call-out for surface hazards associated with legacy coal mining activities. A year into the contract, the MRS is meeting stringent service delivery targets and creating an excellent working relationship with Coal Authority representatives. During the past year, the MRS has successfully bid for several large training contracts in mining and non-mining sectors. The outsourcing of health and safety training requirements has benefited it, and the acquisition and use of mobile training facilities has increased its competitiveness.

Many Members have been consistent advocates for the MRS since 1996 and are well aware, often through the bitter industrial experiences of their communities, of the origin of the skills that it has honed so well for a broader search and rescue application. I pay particular tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) and for Elmet (Colin Burgon), who are both present, and to others who have intervened.

Mr. Meale: As my hon. Friend well knows, I am the Member of Parliament for Mansfield. In the 18 or 19 years for which I have been a Member, the MRS has been in contact with my office on no occasion other than the recent case that I mentioned. When I inquired of other Members, they said that they have had no personal one-to-one communications with it. I wanted to put that right.

David Taylor: I am happy for my hon. Friend to do that. I know that he has recently asked questions about the future of the MRS.

Those Members are rightly proud of, and reassured by, their constituencies being bases for the MRS, and have consistently lobbied the Government on its behalf.

So what of the future? Industrial accidents on the awful scale seen yesterday at the Dongfeng mine in north-east China may be regarded as a thing of the past in this country, but the skills, knowledge and expertise developed first by the British Coal Corporation and continued by the MRS have the potential to be of crucial benefit in a wide range of disastrous circumstances in many parts of the world.

Our industrial history has bequeathed us an exceptional search and rescue service that we risk losing at a time when we face a distinct threat from our past—international terrorism. That is most likely to strike in urban areas, as the appalling events in parts of London on 7 July this year tragically confirmed, and the MRS is the only organisation adapted purely to the needs of emergency search, rescue and escape situations. We cannot afford to lose those skills at this time.

[David Taylor]

We have come a long way since the heroic efforts of Charles Clamp and the many other miners who perished trying to save lives that some pit owners disdained as mere numbers. I hope that we will hear some recognition from the Minister of the Government's duty to recognise the past legacy, current value and future potential represented by the MRS. Some companies appoint themselves to a tier of the emergency services in their advertising. The MRS can legitimately claim that through its training and development of a growing number of fire and rescue service staff across the UK. As my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet said, that suggests a continued public sector involvement. No fanfare is required, just Government funding to meet the present shortfall if we are to continue to benefit in the medium term from the skills, courage and professionalism of the MRS, to which all Members here would pay tribute.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) on securing an important debate. I thank him, my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) and my hon. Friends the Members for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) for Elmet (Colin Burgon) and for Houghton and Washington, East (Mr. Kemp) for their contributions. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire for understanding why my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy is not replying to the debate.

It goes without saying that underground coal and other mining operations take place in highly hazardous conditions. A fire or explosion underground can produce large quantities of carbon monoxide and other noxious gases. Old workings and mine waste can release asphyxiating fumes. Serious machinery or transport accidents can also occur. However, for me, the most harrowing possibility is a roof fall that leaves miners trapped underground, perhaps miles from the safety of the pithead.

Despite those ever-present dangers, I am glad to say that the coal mining industry's recent safety record in this country is excellent. There has been one fatality this millennium and only 53 major injuries occurred in 2004–05. Of course, that detracts neither from the fact that it is vital for mine operators to have access to the specialist underground rescue services to respond to emergencies on the thankfully rare occasions that they occur, nor from the courage and dedication of those whose business is to provide those services.

In the United Kingdom, local authority emergency services generally deal with fires, explosions and gas leaks on the surface in residential, commercial and industrial premises. However, they do not have the specialist skills and experience necessary to cope with underground emergencies, which require specialised breathing apparatus and other equipment, and important specialist training.

Mines rescue services are principally relevant to the deep mine coal industry. However, other underground mines such as salt, gypsum, stone, potash and storage mines may also use them. In addition, their services may on occasion be called on to rescue members of the public from abandoned mine workings, culverts and confined spaces.

Against that background, the Escape and Rescue from Mines Regulations 1995 provide the current legislative framework for mines rescue in the UK. Under the regulations, owners of all types of mine must make what are termed "effective arrangements" for the rescue of persons operating below ground. However, the owners of coal mines in particular must ensure that sufficient trained and fully equipped rescue team members are available as required to provide a continuous 24-hour rescue service. To that end, coal mine operators must participate in a Government-approved mines rescue scheme.

The scheme requires: the maintenance of an adequate pool of full and part-time rescue workers; the operation of a common command structure with suitably qualified and competent rescue offices to supervise the training and operation of rescue teams; the maintenance of regional mines rescue stations at suitable locations, with common communication systems; suitable equipment that is common throughout the country; similar training for all rescue personnel, and the co-ordination of arrangements for mutual assistance between members in an emergency situation at any member's mine.

As we all know, privatisation of the coal mining industry in 1994 led to the creation of several new deep-mine owners. In the 1993 White Paper "The Prospects for Coal", the Government of the day clearly reaffirmed a commitment to ensuring that health and safety standards would be maintained after privatisation. The document states:

> "Safety must, of course, continue to be paramount. The Government is determined to ensure, in consultation with the Health and Safety Commission, who remain responsible for safety regulation in the industry, that the existing high safety standards in such mines are maintained after they pass into the private sector."

The maintenance of effective mines rescue provision clearly was, and continues to be a vital part of that equation.

For a period following its effective withdrawal from mining, British Coal provided to its successor deep-mine operators a fully trained mines rescue service, which, at the time, numbered around 100 full-time and 500 part-time rescue workers. In 1996, the assets, employees and liabilities of British Coal's mines rescue operation were transferred to a stand-alone company, Mines Rescue Service Ltd. has fulfilled the requirements of the statutory scheme ever since.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire said, Mines Rescue Service Ltd. operates from headquarters in Mansfield in Nottinghamshire and from a network of rescue stations in the proximity of the remaining deep mines, whose operators, principally UK Coal and Tower colliery, finance the service by means of a production levy, currently standing at 16p per tonne.

In 2002, the Health and Safety Executive commissioned an examination of alternative structures for the provision of mines rescue arrangements in Great Britain and to assess their relative merits against credible scenarios for the future coal mining industry.

The resultant report concluded that, from a structural perspective, the existing arrangements provided the most flexible and lowest cost means of ensuring rescue cover to both large and small mine operators.

However, it would be remiss of me if I did not acknowledge that, in examining the funding aspects of the service, the 2002 report propounded several alternatives to the status quo, recognising the further contraction in the industry that had taken place since the service's creation. It suggested that there were cogent arguments for partial or total Government funding. In doing so, it noted that, in other countries with active deep mine coal industries, Governments provided funding or at least a subsidy. International comparisons suggested that it was common for operators to contribute to the funding of mines rescue provision up to a specified limit, and for the balance to be met centrally. Such a system obviously provides operators with greater certainty that they will be insulated against cost escalation.

We were sufficiently persuaded by the case for Government assistance when, in 2003, we were considering how best to formulate a package of support for the coal sector. The principal element of what emerged was, of course, the coal investment aid scheme, from which we have awarded more than £58 million to deep-mine projects. At the same time, we pledged to endeavour to provide funding for the MRS over the three-year period from 2003 to 2006. However, finding those funds was always going to be an uphill struggle. None the less, I am glad to say that last year and the year before, our efforts were successful, thanks to the Coal Authority.

The authority, as most hon. Members will know, is the industry's licensing body and the inheritor of much of the environmental legacy of past mining. Some of its functions are self-financing but, for the others, it receives grant-in-aid funding from my Department. As well as inheriting a raft of liabilities, the authority was heir to a good deal of former British Coal land and property, and it has been disposing of this over the years. In both 2003–04 and 2004–05, we allowed the authority to direct windfall gains on property sales towards the MRS. The £2.5 million paid in each of those years enabled the service to reimburse deep-mine operators for the levy payments that they had made over the period. Regrettably, however, it looks highly unlikely that we will be in a position to repeat the process this year or in the future.

David Taylor: I know that my hon. Friend will discuss these matters with the Minister for Energy tomorrow, but may I just tell him that the decline in coal mining production has been sudden and steep, and what we are seeking is bridging support for 12 months or so, to allow the MRS to diversify even further in the successful way that it has in the past?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. I shall come to that matter shortly. I know that he, too, is going to meet my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy.

My hon. Friend mentioned the diversity that the MRS has been proactive in seeking. It has been shaping its destiny in a way that helps to minimise the need for industry funding. The company has valuable and, in certain respects, unique experience and expertise in first aid, fire fighting, the use of breathing apparatus and, most significantly, working in confined spaces. It has skilfully marketed this expertise, principally to the other emergency services, in the form of training programmes. At the same time, it has exploited its ability to provide an emergency response throughout coalfield areas to secure a contract to provide the Coal Authority with a surface incident service which involves experienced mines rescue staff being the first to arrive on the scene when hazards such as ground collapses arising from historic mining are reported. I know that, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire, the MRS is in discussion with the east midlands fire and rescue service with a view to entering into a memorandum of understanding that will provide for collaboration in the provision of life-saving intervention at collapsed structures and other similar incidents.

All of these activities are helping to support the core deep-mine rescue service that the company was originally established to provide, and are instrumental in ensuring, for the meantime at least, that there will be no increase in the industry levy. While I appreciate that the service might have to dip into its limited reserves to make good a modest budget shortfall this year, I have some confidence, given its excellent track record up to now, that its tireless pursuit of new and different business opportunities should see it fair for the future.

That is the spirit in which my hon. Friend has asked us to try to resolve the difficulty in the short term, and I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy will look at ways to protect and develop the service in conjunction with the other emergency services along the lines that my hon. Friend has described.

David Taylor: As the Minister rightly says, I hope to discuss these matters with the Minister for Energy when he becomes available. Tomorrow, will he ask the Minister for Energy, who has a good track record in response to the coal mining industry, to strain every sinew and tap every fund that might be available to give breathing space to this important organisation, as it has tried so hard in its professional life to give breathing space to trapped miners? It is trapped in a position not of its choosing. It seeks an escape route, and the Government can offer that escape route, which is required for a brief period. I hope that he will put that case strongly and vigorously to the Minister for Energy when he next discusses the matter with him.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I will certainly do so, echoing how my right hon. and hon. Friends have put the case this evening. We value what the service does, and we will try to find ways to be of assistance. The Department is in a tight financial position anyway, but discussion about what the service is already trying to do to diversify will help. I am prepared to add my voice to my hon. Friend's to make sure that there is a successful outcome.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Health Service (Capital Investment)

1. Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the First Minister on capital investment in the health service in Wales. [31667]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I have regular discussions with the Assembly Minister for Health and Social Services on a range of issues including the capital investment programme in Wales. The Assembly budget provides for NHS capital investment of some £674 million in the three years to 2008. That investment is aimed at key NHS priorities including the reconfiguration of hospital provision, the diagnostic strategy underpinning those services, provision of mental health services and the improvement of patient access times.

Mrs. Moon: I thank the Minister for that response. Will he encourage the First Minister to tie in the generous capital allocation mentioned in his response with consequent revenue resources, to enable those high-performing trusts such as Bro Morgannwg NHS Trust in my constituency to forge ahead with the exciting "Designed for Life" agenda in Wales?

Nick Ainger: Generous revenue spending is planned by the Assembly, which builds on its record in that the Assembly has spent £4.3 billion on health in Wales, which is almost double the 1997 figure. That funding means an extra 450 consultants and 7,300 qualified nurses. By 2010, the Assembly plans to employ 700 more consultants and GPs, 6,000 more nurses and 2,000 other health professionals. That demonstrates a clear commitment to the NHS, which is sadly lacking from the Conservative party.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): Given that NHS trusts across Wales are severely in the red, and with the axe hanging over services at numerous good hospitals such as the excellent Withybush hospital in Pembrokeshire, will the Minister accept that devolution simply has not worked for the NHS in Wales? As many health service professionals will tell him, health services in Wales are being allowed to decay because of ideological roadblocks at the Assembly.

Nick Ainger: That is not the case, and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has said that, bearing in mind that, as I understand it, he is a supporter of the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who yesterday endorsed the devolution settlement and said that he might even consider taking it further. However, he refers to Withybush hospital, and I am well aware, as I am also a relatively local Member to that hospital and a considerable number of my constituents use it, of the real problems there. I am aware that clinicians are concerned about the hospital's future. Following discussions with the Assembly Minister for Health and Social Services, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there are no plans whatever to downgrade Withybush hospital. The generous additional funding that that and many other trusts throughout Wales have received—the local health board in Pembrokeshire has received a 28 per cent. increase in the past three years—means that they should be able to manage. The Assembly's track record on investment in the NHS is excellent—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the decision to invest £108 million in a new hospital in Caerphilly is eloquent testimony that health policies are working in Wales?

Nick Ainger: Absolutely. This year, capital expenditure will be £186 million, next year it will be £220 million, and in 2007–08, £309 million. Surely that shows the rapid increase in investment in the NHS throughout Wales, and I congratulate my hon. Friend on receiving substantial investment for a brand new hospital, which will be able to reconfigure a number of smaller hospitals to improve services for his constituents.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Investing in "Designed for Life" will require a great deal of capital spending, but that will be subject, as I understand it, to capital charges of between 7 and 10 per cent. That was a great problem with the new Alltwen hospital in Tremadog. The danger is that current services will be cut in order to meet those charges. Can the Minister give us any hope that he might press his colleagues in the Assembly to freeze those charges in order to avoid such cuts?

Nick Ainger: I have discussed that issue with the Assembly Minister, and it is an issue that the Assembly can consider. The fact remains, however, that revenue investment from the Assembly is way above the inflation rate. The choice that a trust has to make is whether to opt for that investment. Because the revenue investment has been so generous, they are certainly able to pay for the capital charges.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): We have heard from the Minister about the spending, and we have heard him say that the trusts should be able to manage. Can he tell us why there has been a 17 per cent. reduction in the number of beds over the past few years, why there has been an 18 per cent. increase in the number of complaints during this year alone, why one person in 10 is still on a waiting list in Wales, and why there do not seem to be any NHS dentists?

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): He is on his way out!

Nick Ainger: I am not sure whether that is true. Certainly the result on Monday may affect the hon. Gentleman's future.

The hon. Gentleman must explain to the House why he fought a general election on a manifesto that proposed the introduction of patient passports, which would have cut—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister is well out of order. He must not talk about the Conservative party's manifesto. Perhaps he will now answer the question.

Nick Ainger: It was a temptation that I could not resist, Mr. Speaker. I apologise.

Wales is addressing its problems. [Interruption.] Yes, there are problems; no one is denying that. All of us, as constituency Members, know that there have been problems—but they are not due to a lack of resources: that is the issue. The hon. Gentleman and his party have no plans whatever to address the issues. That is the point.

Rail Services (South Wales)

2. Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on improvements to rail services in south Wales. [31668]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I welcome improvements made to rail services in south Wales, such as the reopening of the Vale of Glamorgan line. I look forward to further improvements across Wales as a result of the introduction of the new Arriva Trains Wales timetable on 11 December.

Mrs. James: Does my hon. Friend share my concern about the deterioration of punctuality and reliability on First Great Western trains from Swansea? At the beginning of November the managing director was forced to apologise to her customers "for the recent deterioration in performance levels of service".

Today she has had to apologise again.

Between 1997 and the end of the current financial year—[Interruption.] Hold on! Between 1997 and the end of the current financial year the company has received £335 million in public subsidy, yet it has paid only £17 million in penalties. In view of that huge public investment, will my hon. Friend make representations to the company about its poor performance?

Nick Ainger: I am very conscious of the number of recent disruptions on services between south Wales and Paddington. My hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, has already held meetings with First Great Western and Network Rail to discuss the problems.

As my hon. Friend will know, the agreement for the new Greater Western franchise will contain strict targets for year-on-year improvements in punctuality. The Government are determined to respond properly to any failure to meet those targets. We are investing £87 million a week in rail infrastructure. Unfortunately, as with road repairs, that sometimes causes delays, but the fact remains that we are making the investment.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Does the Minister agree that one line that lacks investment is the Shrewsbury to Aberystwyth line? Will he join local campaigners in calling on those responsible to reinstate an hourly service?

Nick Ainger: The hon. Gentleman may wish to take that up with Andrew Davies, the Minister for Economic Development and Transport in the Welsh Assembly, as the Assembly now has powers in relation to assisting and improving rail services. As he will know, the new budget was announced last night—or was it this morning? It is clear from that budget that the Assembly now wishes to improve services for rail passengers throughout Wales, and I am sure that it will be able to consider the line to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): What representations is the Minister making to Arriva Trains about what I call the peapod train—a minuscule green train that runs from Llanelli westwards and never has enough places for its passengers?

Nick Ainger: I will certainly make representations on behalf of my hon. Friend, but the new timetable that Arriva will be working to from 11 December will introduce an additional 950 services a week across the network in Wales. There will be more seats on peak time services, a 28 per cent. increase in Sunday services and a number of new services from stations in Wales. We should all welcome that. It is clear that the Government's investment is now being reflected in improved services, with more and more passengers using them.

Pensioners

3. Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): What discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues on help for pensioners in Wales. [31669]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I have regular discussions with ministerial colleagues on a range of issues, including measures to help pensioners in Wales.

Mark Tami: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer and I also welcome the many measures that the Government have delivered for pensioners in Wales. However, does my right hon. Friend accept that the take-up of council tax benefit by pensioners remains low? What more can we do to highlight the existence of that benefit to those who need it most?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is right that take-up is lower than it should be. I welcome the fact that, in the budget agreed yesterday, the Assembly has decided to invest: an extra £1.5 million to promote council tax benefit take-up. My hon. Friend should also bear in mind the fantastic help that the Government are giving to pensioners in Wales: £200 winter fuel payments and upwards of £400 council tax support, which will help a significant majority of nearly 500,000 households in Wales. The over-75s are benefiting as 186,000 pensioner households in Wales have free television licences—Labour delivering for pensioners in Wales. There are free bus passes for the over-60s provided by a Labour-run Assembly—Labour delivering once again for pensioners in Wales. We will have the first ever champion of pensioners in Europe when the Bill to appoint a commissioner for pensioners in Wales goes through Parliament. Yet again, Labour is delivering for pensioners in Wales.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Settens, an organisation in my constituency that makes box files, runs a very good pension scheme that has promoted employee loyalty. However, it is now afraid that the added financial burden of the pension protection fund will put that scheme's future in doubt. What assessment has the Secretary of State made of the pension protection fund and its effect on small and medium-sized enterprises in Wales?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman raises an important matter, but he must concede that the average pension in Wales is now £1,500 a year higher in real terms under the Labour Government. If there are additional issues to address, as there always will be, we will certainly listen and consider them.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State recall that for five consecutive years, early-day motion 1 called for the restoration of the link between pensions and earnings? In fact, the Government have done far better than that, as they have increased pensions and introduced other benefits that are equivalent to a far greater amount than would have been generated by restoring that link in 1997. Does my right hon. Friend welcome the splendid report published today by Adair Turner and will the Government approach this reform, which could be their major reform, with humility and a sense of urgency?

Mr. Hain: The Government always act with humility and a sense of urgency and we will certainly do so in respect of Lord Turner's important report. I know that my hon. Friend will welcome the fact, as it is implicit in his question, that the poorest third of pensioner households across Wales and, indeed, in the rest of the United Kingdom, are now £2,000 a year better off than they were under the Tories.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): We have heard from the Secretary of State about the money that the Government are handing out to pensioners this winter, but Steve Cranston, the director of National Energy Action in Wales, estimates that 223,000 households will not be able to heat their homes adequately this winter. My concern is about the number of people over 65 who may die. Last year, there were about 1,200 such deaths; this year, it could be as high as 1,800. Does not the Secretary of State realise that his £400 handout amounts to less than the average band D council tax increase in Wales?

Mr. Hain: The truth is that under our Government, more support for council tax payments is being given to pensioners than ever before. I am getting a little worried on behalf of the hon. Gentleman. His putative leader, the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), says that "it does make sense . . . to have MPs who sit for Welsh seats being responsible for Welsh matters".

Where does that leave the hon. Gentleman?

Licensing Hours

4. Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): How many applications have been granted for 24-hour sale of alcohol licences in (a) Newport, East and (b) Wales. [31670]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I understand that one application, for a supermarket, has been granted in Newport, East. Only 61 applications have been granted by local authorities in Wales, 40 of which are for supermarkets and retail sites, and only 21 for pubs, clubs and hotels. That is out of an estimated total of 12,000 licensed premises in Wales.

Jessica Morden: My hon. Friend's reply shows that the idea that the amended Licensing Act 2003 would bring about widespread 24-hour pub opening is a myth. Will he explain, however, what the Government are doing to tackle alcohol-related disorder in cities such as Newport?

Nick Ainger: My hon. Friend is right: there is a substantial gap between the reality on licensing and the scaremongering by Opposition parties and certain sections of the media. Predictions of widespread disorder at the weekend were way off the mark; police reported a level of activity similar to, or lower than, before the introduction of the new licensing hours. Under the 2003 Act, we will expand the police's closure powers where disorder is occurring or is anticipated. We will increase the penalties for breach of licence conditions and for selling alcohol to children or to people who are drunk, and remove personal licences following convictions. Moreover, the Violent Crime Reduction Bill includes measures such as alcohol disorder zones and drink banning orders. That shows that the Government are absolutely committed to tackling alcohol-related crime.

Jenny Willott (Cardiff, Central) (LD): In my own constituency, Cardiff county council has proved very effective at processing licensing applications in time for the 24 November deadline, but many other councils across the UK have not been so successful. Does the Minister have any idea how many premises in Wales are trading illegally because their licences are still pending or because they have yet to apply? How does he propose to deal with premises that, as of last Thursday, were trading outside the law?

Nick Ainger: I cannot give the figure that the hon. Lady asks for, but let us be clear: local authorities in Wales have dealt with the applications made. As I said, only 61 applications were made for 24-hour licences, and a number of others were made for extended licences. I will write to the hon. Lady with the figure that she asks for once I have it to hand.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): As a former licence holder myself, I am fully aware that there are four categories of people whom licence holders cannot serve: vagrants, women of the night, the police and drunks. Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways to make use of the existing licensing powers and the new ones is to take away the licences of those who knowingly sell alcohol to people who are clearly over the limit, before such people wander on to the streets and cause trouble?

Nick Ainger: My hon. Friend is right, and such powers are included in the 2003 Act. It is not just about drunks; licensees who sell alcohol to children can have their licence revoked on a first offence.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): In the past five years, alcohol-related deaths in Wales have soared by 20 per cent. That is not scaremongering. One in 13 people is fighting alcoholism, and 40 per cent. of patients admitted to accident and emergency are suffering from alcohol-related ailments or illnesses. Does the Minister see the contradiction between the proposed total ban on smoking in Wales and the damage resulting from extending licensing hours?

Nick Ainger: Research in Scotland, for example, where licensing hours were extended substantially some years ago, focused on the question of evidence of alcohol-related disorder. Extended opening hours do not necessarily mean that alcohol consumption is increased. The powers that the new Act gives to local councils and the police should stop licensees abusing their position and selling alcohol to people who have had too much. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to come to order.

Police Restructuring

6. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Home Secretary about the restructuring of police forces in Wales. [31672]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I have had several discussions with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on this matter. We see no realistic alternative to a single force for Wales if the objectives set out in the report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary are to be achieved. However, decisions will not be made until we have final recommendations from the police service.

Mr. Hollobone: Given the effectiveness and popularity of the existing police forces in Wales, what evidence does the Secretary of State have that a merged national force would be more effective or more popular?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is right to say it that the existing police forces are popular with local people. However, HMIC identified a point that is very important for all hon. Members, especially those with constituencies in Wales, namely, that we face new challenges of terrorism, drug trafficking and serious organised crime that the present structure in Wales of four separate police forces acting on their own does not have the capacity to meet. That is why we are proposing a different structure, but it is important that neighbourhood policing and local accountability are retained.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know my concerns about an all-Wales force. They are shared by people across north Wales who fear a possible drift of resources to south Wales. Will he give an assurance that budgetary controls under any restructuring will mean that resources remain in the regions for community policing?

Mr. Hain: I am certainly aware of my hon. Friend's quite proper concern about this matter. It is shared by those other hon. Members with north Wales constituencies whom I met in my office this morning. I think that it makes sense to have an all-Wales force to deal with the new challenges of terrorism, serious organised crime and drug trafficking. However, at this morning's meeting, I assured hon. Members that, if we go down that road, the resources presently devoted to north Wales must be at least maintained. Those resources must be locked in. North Wales has led the rest of Wales in respect of neighbourhood policing, and the best practice in neighbourhood policing must be spread southwards. I do not think that an all-Wales force will injure in any way the performance of the police in north Wales—indeed, I believe that it will enhance it.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): First, may I thank the Secretary of State and other colleagues for the support that they showed to me following my brother's death last week? Hon. Members have been very understanding and sympathetic.

I understand that the Government are committed to a consultation about the proposed merger of the police forces in Wales. The proposals are opposed by the Liberal Democrat, Conservative and Plaid Cymru parties, and by a large proportion of Labour MPs. Will the Secretary of State therefore assure the House that the consultation will be genuine and that if there is overwhelming opposition to the merger, the Government will take that feedback on board and think again?

Mr. Hain: The whole House does indeed express its sympathy for the hon. Gentleman, as we did last Wednesday.

The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we should ignore the fact that HMIC has pointed out that the existing policing structure—including in Wales—does not have the capacity to deal with the new, big threats posed by crimes at level two and especially level three, including terrorism. We can protect neighbourhood policing and regional accountability, including in north Wales and Dyfed-Powys, and still make sure that we have a much better and more modern police structure that is able to deal with the new threats.

John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that any proposals to restructure police forces in Wales to deal with serious crime will take into account the fact that organised criminals do not recognise national boundaries? In south Wales, organised crime tends to cluster in the area between Cardiff and Bristol, and along the M4 corridor to London. In north Wales, it is most common along the A55 heading into the north-west of England.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is right. The flow of serious organised crime does tend to go from east to west in both south and north Wales. However, I am sure that he will agree that given cases such as the Soham murder case, which overwhelmed the local police force, the future threats that we face from potential terrorist attacks, including in Wales, and drug trafficking and serious organised crime, we must have a modern police structure able to deal with those threats. Our voters will expect nothing less.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Further to the replies from the Secretary of State, can he tell the House the evidence base for the Government's assertion that police forces with fewer than 4,000 officers are somehow ineffective in dealing with organised crime?

Mr. Hain: The evidence base is contained in the recommendations from Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. I find it puzzling that Plaid Cymru, the Liberal Democrats and, apparently, the Conservatives should want to stick their heads in the sand and not deal with the new emerging threats of terrorism, drug trafficking and serious organised crime. We want a modern police force able to deal with those threats and we think that the people of Wales support us in that.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [32922] Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 30 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

Mr. David: In the Prime Minister's busy schedule, has he had a chance to see Monday's copy of The Western Mail? If so, he will have seen an excellent report of Wales's tremendous victory on the rugby field against Australia on Saturday, but he will also have seen a very good report about a boom time for the Welsh economy—some 120,000 jobs have been created in the Welsh economy since 1999. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that record is in sharp contrast to what the Conservative party did when they were in power?

The Prime Minister: I have now had the opportunity to see the front page of The Western Mail—that is at least one front page that I welcome. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: unemployment in Wales has halved over the past eight years; employment is at record levels; more than 100,000 people have secured jobs through the new deal; and Wales has had the second fastest growth rate in the UK. That should please everyone in Welsh constituencies or of Welsh origin.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I know that retirement will be on both our minds today. When the Prime Minister's former chief economic adviser said last month that "the Government has no long-term strategy on pensions" and that the Chancellor was leaving pensions policy in "a complete ... shambles", does the Prime Minister think that he was referring to the £5 billion a year pension tax, the spread of means testing or the Chancellor's plan to sabotage Lord Turner's report, which at least tries to do something about the problems that the Chancellor has created?

The Prime Minister: First, let me tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman what he can expect in retirement, thanks to this Government. There is the winter fuel payment—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] There is the council tax rebate—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] There is the reduced VAT on fuel—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] There are the restored free eye tests—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] Once he is over 75, there is a free television licence—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] An extra £11 billion spent on pensioners is a record of which we can be proud.

Mr. Howard: It is such an enticing prospect that I expect that the Prime Minister will want to join me very shortly. Is not the problem that the only retirement for which the Chancellor is planning is the Prime Minister's? The truth is that under this Government more than 10,000 occupational pension schemes have collapsed and the amount of money people save has almost halved. Does not the Prime Minister see that there is a growing consensus that, in order to deal with this mess, we must ditch the Chancellor's obsession with means testing? That is our view and that of the pensioners' groups and the industry, and of Lord Turner. We also know that it is the view of the Prime Minister, because he once said:

"we can end means testing for pensioners once and for all."

Will the Prime Minister now, just for once, stand up to his Chancellor and, with our support, do what needs to be done to sort out one of the greatest challenges that the country faces?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will also have seen that Adair Turner made mention of the fact that, thanks to the pension credit and the minimum income guarantee, we have lifted nearly 2 million pensioners out of hardship and poverty. Of course, we need to secure pension provision for the long term and we will do that, but let us be in no doubt at all that it is the result of the Government, and the means that we have used to lift pensioners out of poverty, that has allowed us for the first time to go through winter periods with pensioners no longer forced to choose between the heating they need to stay alive and the standard of living that they want. We will take no lessons in pension provision from the party that was responsible for pension mis-selling, which left millions of pensioners in poverty in 1997.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for his support for Merseytram line 1. However, given that yesterday the Secretary of State for Transport announced that the scheme was to be dropped by his Department, will my right hon. Friend have a sharp word with him about the extreme prejudice his Department has shown towards Merseytravel, the promoters of the scheme?

The Prime Minister: I entirely understand the desire for the Merseytram scheme, and in December 2002 we committed somewhere in the region of £170 million to that scheme, but the trouble is, as my right hon. Friend knows, that the costs of the scheme have risen considerably. So we are perfectly willing and happy to make that contribution to travel on Merseyside, but it has to be done within an overall framework that is affordable.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): Given that there is undoubtedly broad agreement with Lord Turner that the present system of means-tested, muddled and inadequate state pensions cannot be maintained, and if the Chancellor is not to exercise a veto on the direction in which Lord Turner wants to go, will the Prime Minister give the House a commitment today that he will legislate following Lord Turner's proposals and that he, as Prime Minister, will see the reforms through?

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has already said, we will publish our response to the Turner proposals next year. I have no doubt at all that we will end up with a long-term framework for pensions that has as its basis a decent basic state pension and a much simplified way for people to save. However, I have to say to the right hon. Gentleman, as I said to the Leader of Opposition, that the fact is, as Lord Turner himself acknowledges, that without pension credit we could never have lifted pensioners out of poverty. Long term, we need the type of framework that I set out but it has to be affordable. I am aware that the Liberal Democrats do not always put that at the forefront of their concerns, but any party that wants to be in government must take it into account.

Mr. Kennedy: The Chancellor will be the person in the House most interested to hear that the Prime Minister did not give a commitment to see pension reform through while he was Prime Minister, in answer to my direct question. Can the Prime Minister at least give the House a commitment about another concern that we all share? Pension reform, as and when it comes, must once and for all end the scandalous inbuilt discrimination against women in the current operation of the benefit of the state pension system. Will the Prime Minister give us that commitment and make it a top priority?

The Prime Minister: Again, there is an issue about women who are not properly credited in and cannot get the full state pension. Of course, that is an issue; Lord Turner addresses it and we have to address it in response to his report. However, I have to say again to the right hon. Gentleman that whatever proposals any party comes up with have to be properly costed and affordable. For example, I have looked at the Lib Dems' pension policy and it is true that in terms of its commitments everyone would cheer, but when we come to how they would pay for it they say that they want to shift public spending priorities. I do not know what that means, so at least that is one thing we have in common.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): Since 1997 in Preston, the number of people claiming jobseeker's allowance has reduced to 1,400. Long-term unemployment is down by 81 per cent. and youth unemployment is down by 43 per cent. May I say to my right hon. Friend that Labour is working, so why should anyone bother voting for another party, even if it has a new leader?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is of course right that the numbers who are unemployed are down and the numbers who are employed are up. The most important thing—apart from the effect on people's livelihoods, living standards and prospects for success in life—is the fact that as a result of the reduction in unemployment and increases in employment, we are spending about £5 billion a year less on benefits. That is why part of the welfare reform that the Government have managed to put through is getting people off benefit and into work, and it is why the new deal should, of course, remain.

Q2. [32924] Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): May I remind the Prime Minister that in 1997 there were three acute hospitals in Worcestershire? His Government closed one in Kidderminster, and they are threatening the Alexandra hospital in Redditch, which he might remember visiting during the general election. In response, I am sure that the Prime Minister will tell me his usual mantra about the amount of money that the Government are putting into the NHS. However, is it not a simple fact that my constituents and many others are entitled to ask where all that money is going? Given that the maternity unit is being axed and the Alexandra's accident and emergency department is under threat, are we not entitled to ask where all the money is going and what the Prime Minister is going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: First, let me congratulate the hon. Lady on her powers of prediction, because I am indeed going to say that the three primary care trusts in her area have been allocated a total of £509 million, which is a cash increase of almost 10 per cent. Over the past few years, we have of course reduced waiting lists and waiting times, and we have better cancer and cardiac care. However, whatever Government are in power and however much money they give to the national health service, there still must be proper financial accountability. We are working with her local NHS trust to try to ensure that it puts in place the measures necessary to reduce its deficit. The deficits that the NHS is carrying are not in every single trust in the country. They are specifically in some trusts, so we have to ensure that those trusts come back into balance.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend congratulate the Mayor of London on achieving record levels of police in London, with some 4,000 more officers than when the Leader of the Opposition was Home Secretary? Will my right hon. Friend work with the Mayor of London to ensure that the roll-out of safer neighbourhoods teams is completed on time—by April 2007?

The Prime Minister: It is important that we continue this year and next year to roll out the local community policing teams. The combination of warranted police officers and community support officers is enormously popular in London and elsewhere. As a result of that, we have been managing to get crime down, but there is still a great deal more that we have to do, including, as my hon. Friend says, rolling out the neighbourhoods policing teams, and also ensuring that we introduce the new measures on both organised crime and antisocial behaviour.

Q3. [32925] Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): As the Prime Minister says goodbye to his fourth Tory leader, is it not also time to say goodbye to the Punch and Judy style of Prime Minister's questions?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with the hon. Lady. We will wait and see what happens next week.

Q4. [32926] Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): The Prime Minister will be aware that this afternoon the Shields family will be delivering a major petition to No. 10 Downing street. The petition calls for justice for 19-year-old Michael Shields, who is serving a 15-year sentence in a Bulgarian jail for a crime to which another man has confessed. Will the Prime Minister impress upon the Bulgarian authorities the seriousness of the situation and the determination of those supporting Michael Shields to see justice? Will he agree to meet the Shields family at an appropriate time?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has raised the issue with both with the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary of Bulgaria, and has done so in the proper way, as this is subject to an appeal that Mr. Shields has lodged. I understand entirely the concerns of the Shields family and the consular staff are doing all that they can to assist them and the legal team to prepare for the final appeal, and they will continue to do so. At the present juncture in time, that is all that I can reasonably say.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Returning to the issue of retirement, everyone knows that this is my last appearance at the Dispatch Box. What they want to know is how many more appearances the Prime Minister will make at the Dispatch Box. Will he confirm that it is still his intention to serve a full third term?

The Prime Minister: I repeat all the things that I said before the election and, indeed, subsequently. May I say, however, that as the right hon. and learned Gentleman is taking his leave of us today, we wish him well?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the Prime Minister for his good wishes, but they will not deflect anyone's attention from the fact that he refused to confirm whether he is going to serve a full term. Why is he being so coy? Surely, this is something that we are entitled to know. Everyone knows that I am going next week, and they want to know when he is going. Why will he not tell us? Is his coyness due to the fact that he has been listening to his Environment Secretary, who said at the weekend that he should give his successor a decent "chance to settle in and make [his] own mark."

A simple yes or no will do: will he serve a full term?

The Prime Minister: I have answered that before, and I answer it again in the same way now. I entirely understand why the right hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to see my retirement, but he is the fourth Conservative leader I have faced. Next week, I shall face the fifth, but I must say one more thing to Opposition Members. If one looks at all the previous Conservative leaders I have faced, the first one was Conservative leader for six years; the second one for four years; the third one for two years, one month and 16 days; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman has lasted just two years and one month. I do not know whether that is a very good basis on which the next one should start.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister is ending exactly as he started two years and one month ago: by refusing to answer any of the questions that I have put to him. Everyone knows that retirement is a time for reflection. The Prime Minister said of his party:

"I have taken from my party everything they thought they believed in. I have stripped them of their core beliefs . . . What keeps it together is . . . power."

When he said all that, did he realise that he would end up needing their votes?

The Prime Minister: Let me tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman what we have done in eight years of government. We have delivered the strongest economy in the G7. That is what politics is about, not the points that he is making—it is about delivering for the people of this country. We have record levels of employment. Youth unemployment is down, and ordinary unemployment is down. There is record investment in the national health service and education, and record numbers of police officers. How does that compare with his record? When he was Employment Secretary, unemployment rose by 1 million. When he was Home Secretary, the Conservatives cut police numbers by 1,000, and when he was leader of his party he lost the only election that he fought.

Mr. Howard: Two years ago, I held up a dossier called "Blair: His Past". Today I have one called "Blair: His Legacy", which shows that taxes have gone up; crime is up; MRSA up; truancy up; means-testing up; borrowing up; savings have gone down; productivity growth down; competitiveness down; manufacturing employment down; crime clear-up rates down; numbers of servicemen and women, down; and reform blocked. That is the Prime Minister's legacy, but I have just one last question. The Prime Minister once said:

"My project will be complete when the Labour party learns to love Peter Mandelson."

Can he give us a progress report on that?

The Prime Minister: I may have to say, on that one, a lot done, a lot left to do. However, there is one simple test of whether one succeeds or fails in politics, and that is based on putting one's case to the British people. The British people elected the Labour party in 1997, they elected it again in 2001, they elected it again in 2005, and, given the current state of the Conservative party, I have no doubt that they will do so again when the next election comes.

Q5. [32927] Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): I have never called for my right hon. Friend's resignation. I hope he will never have cause to call for mine. I know that he wants to invest in the science base and see it grow, but recent short-term decisions by Government agencies in Newcastle concerning stem cells and health protection, and in Portsmouth concerning our involvement with commercial satellite research on a European level, have put vital parts of our science base at risk. Will my right hon. Friend arrange to meet hon. Friends and others who are concerned about this, to get important parts of our science base back on track?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I am grateful for the opportunity to meet my hon. Friend and his colleagues in order to discuss that. He is right in what he says. The important thing is that we have put extra investment in the science base—indeed, we have more than doubled it over the past few years. But my hon. Friend is right: we must make sure that co-operation takes place across Europe. We also have to make sure that the right relationship between business and science is established. That is where many of the knowledge jobs of the future will come from. I shall be happy to meet him and his hon. Friends in order to discuss the matter.

Q6. [32928] Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): When asked last week about means testing, the current Secretary of State for Work and Pensions told me that socialism is the language of priorities. Is it a priority for the Government to penalise people who have worked hard all their lives and saved, when they get to retirement?

The Prime Minister: It would be right that my right hon. Friend should not entirely take that quotation as his own. I think it was Nye Bevan who said it first. I thank the hon. Lady for the opportunity to demonstrate my Labour credentials. It is just as well I was reminded by my right hon. Friend. The reason why the pension credit has been so important is that it has allowed us not just to lift pensioners out of poverty, but to reward their savings. That is one of the ways in which the pension credit works. Yes, of course there are real issues about the long-term pension framework in both the public sector and the private sector, but they must be dealt with in a framework that allows us to achieve the objectives that the Government want: to make sure that people get a decent standard of living in retirement, that we deal with pensioner poverty, as we have done successfully over the past few years, and that people have an easy and simplified vehicle to save and top up whatever the state can give them.

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the West Yorkshire police force on the remarkable crime reduction figures that were published on Monday, and in particular the Calderdale division in my constituency, on the best crime reduction figures not only in the force, but in the whole of the UK?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to congratulate West Yorkshire police. That is part of the work being done by police forces right across the country, which has seen crime come down so significantly over the past few years. We now have record numbers of police and under this Government, as the latest British crime survey figures show once they are broken down, crime has fallen in every region of Britain.

Q7. [32929] Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Will the Prime Minister contrast his manifesto commitment to build more community hospitals with the fact that around the country about a hundred of them are faced with the axe, two of them in my constituency? Will he understand that my constituents are fed up with his rhetoric about spending more and more of their money, when all they see around them are things closing down?

The Prime Minister: The investment to create the new generation of community hospitals will go ahead, but in every single area people have to decide how they will best configure their own local health services. The hon. Gentleman says that all people can see is closures, but I will tell him what people see. They see, for example, in cancer and cardiac care, massive improvements since 1997. They see in new hospital buildings the importance of the capital investment that we have put in. When we came to office, many people had to wait over 18 months for their operation— sometimes over a year—in their tens of thousands. From the end of this month, there will be a six-month maximum wait; by the end of 2008, an 18-week maximum from the GPs' surgery right through to the operating theatre. These are the changes that are being made. But, of course, how the money is spent is best done at local level. For the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends to say that nothing in the health service has improved over these past few years— [Interruption.] So a lot has improved; well at least we are agreed on that.

Q8. [32930] Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has just returned from the Euromed summit in Barcelona. Does he agree that, despite the difficulties, we need to continue to support and encourage the Maghreb countries of north Africa, in particular, to implement the practical commitments and agreements reached at that summit, for the sake of our social cohesion, security and migration policies, as well as theirs?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right. One of the important things that came out of that conference was the agreement of the code of conduct on terrorism, which contained the sentence that terrorism can never be justified, and included some of the strongest language that we have ever managed to agree at Euromed on this issue. That is extremely important not just for the measures that are contained in that agreement, but in terms of the signal that it sends of the absolute determination of all of us to defeat the scourge of terrorism. Sitting round the table at Euromed, it was interesting that not merely European countries such as Spain and the UK have suffered from terrorism, but countries such as Egypt, Algeria and Jordan. That combined determination to defeat it was very evident.

Q9. [32931] Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Is the Prime Minister aware of the growing anger in Sheffield and throughout south Yorkshire among bus passengers at the way in which what are in effect private sector bus monopolies can chop and change bus routes and raise fares without any meaningful public consultation whatever? Will he undertake to look into the inexplicable difference in the way in which bus services here in London are regulated in the interests of passengers, and yet bus passengers elsewhere are left to the erratic whim of bus companies themselves?

The Prime Minister: I do know that that is an issue that causes anger in many constituencies in Sheffield, because my hon. Friends tell me that it does, and it is something that we keep under review. I am afraid that I cannot say any more at this stage.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the three-star primary care trust in Ellesmere Port and Neston has just had another way-above-inflation increase in its budget. It has succeeded in driving down coronary heart disease and has been amazingly successful. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that, as PCTs are reorganised, communities such as mine that have pockets of significant disadvantage are not left out in the restructuring?

The Prime Minister: The point that my hon. Friend makes is entirely reasonable, and yes, we should ensure that that position is safeguarded during restructuring. What my hon. Friend draws attention to is the fact that the additional sums of money—in his case an increase in real terms of 5.8 per cent.—has meant that we can improve services for people and bring waiting times down, all within the NHS where there is more hospital building and more nurses, doctors and consultants, who, in addition, are better paid than ever before. That is why in nurse training, as in teacher training, more and more people are willing to come forward, despite high levels of employment, for those occupations. But he is absolutely right: we must ensure that in the change in the boundaries, we safeguard the interests of the poorest communities.

Q10. [32932] Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): The Prime Minister will be aware of the waste of millions of pounds of taxpayers' money in the Paddington health campus, which has failed. Will he then explain, as I am sure that he wishes to avoid any future waste of money, why no Health Minister was willing to give evidence to the independent inquiry?

The Prime Minister: I have no doubt that we will get the right mix of services for the hon. Gentleman's constituency and others. He knows why the campus could not go ahead, but that should not detract from the fact that hundreds of millions of pounds of extra money is going into hospital building. The real-terms increase for the health authority in his area—[Interruption.] I know that Opposition Members do not want to hear about the increases in health spending, but they are going to. I do not know why a Minister did not go to the committee—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Prime Minister answer the question—[Interruption.] Order—in his own way.

The Prime Minister: In my own way, I do not know why a Minister did not attend, and I will write to the hon. Gentleman and tell him why. There you go—that is one in two years. [Laughter.] The real-terms increase in health service spending in his area is more than 6 per cent., which means 3,800 more nurses, 500 more consultants and 30 more GPs. That is a very good reason why people in his constituency and elsewhere should vote Labour.

Q11. [32933] Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is widespread concern in north Wales about the suggestion that there should be an all-Wales police force? Will he make it clear that the excellent progress in neighbourhood policing in north Wales will not be threatened by any reorganisation?

The Prime Minister: The issue is obviously important for my hon. Friend's constituents and others, and we will certainly make sure that whatever is done in north Wales best meets the needs of local policing.

Pensions Commission Report

12.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the publication of today's report by the Pensions Commission. In making its recommendations, the Pensions Commission has acknowledged the progress that we have made since 1997. Its proposals are designed to build on that success, and I believe it important to consider them in that context.

As Lord Turner has recognised, the Government's first priority on entering office in 1997 was to tackle pensioner poverty, which was absolutely the right thing to do. We have succeeded in lifting nearly 2 million pensioners out of absolute poverty and are now spending £11 billion extra each year on pensioners, with almost half of that spending going to the poorest third. Thanks to measures such as the minimum income guarantee, pension credit, winter fuel payments and a 7 per cent. real-terms increase in the basic state pension, we have ensured that pensioners will never again suffer the indignity of living on as little as £69 a week, which was the scandalous legacy of pensioner poverty that we inherited when we came into office.

In our second phase of reform, we took action to tackle the loss of confidence in the private pensions market. That included the pensions mis-selling scandal we inherited. In 1997, less than 2 per cent. of pension mis-selling cases had been satisfactorily resolved. By the end of 2002, more than 99 per cent. of consumers with mis-selling claims had been compensated, with total compensation reaching £11 billion. Through the pension protection fund, the pensions regulator and the financial assistance scheme, the Pensions Act 2004 is helping to respond to the problems experienced by defined-benefit occupational pensions and to boost security for scheme members. The introduction of the Sandler suite and the stakeholder pension has been an important step in facilitating low-cost private savings. I believe that that amounts to a record of achievement of which this Government can be rightly proud.

Despite that progress, we recognise that there are still significant and serious issues that we need to address. I believe that there are three. First, there are the demographics. When our grandparents reached 65 they could expect to live another 11 years in retirement. The 20th century's tremendous advances in science, welfare and health mean that today we can expect to live another 19 years beyond 65 and our children can expect to live another 24 years. In 1950, we spent 18 per cent. of our adult life in retirement; now, we spend 30 per cent. in retirement. By 2050, there will be 50 per cent. more pensioners than there are today. Critically, by the same time there will be two people of working age for every pensioner, compared with 10 people 100 years ago.

Secondly, we know that people need to save more. Our 2002 Green Paper first highlighted the need to enable people to save more or to work longer to achieve the income that they want in retirement. It also established the Pensions Commission to review our long-term savings regime. The commission has calculated that nearly 10 million people are not saving enough for their retirement. Some have suggested that that challenge could be averted by the growth in housing assets, but that offers, at best, only a partial solution. People would need to release £100,000-worth of equity to generate £100 per week of pension provision, which is far from easy given that the average house price is now £180,000 and people still need to live somewhere in retirement.

Thirdly, we know that the existing system is complex—yes, possibly the most complex in the world. It produces unfair outcomes for women and carers, and there remains the question of how to ensure an adequate and sustainable state pension for future generations. As Lord Turner said today,

"the problems in our pensions system will grow increasingly worse unless a new pensions settlement for the 21st century is now debated, agreed and put in place."

Put simply, we cannot afford to ignore the problems that the Pensions Commission has identified. We must instead ensure that future generations can sensibly plan for their retirement. The choice is not between the status quo and reform; it is a question of how we act—not whether or when.

The Pensions Commission was very clear in its first report last year that there is not currently a pensions crisis, and it made that clear again this morning. But the pensions of tomorrow clearly depend on decisions that people make to save today. It has argued that a failure to respond to this challenge would lead to a crisis in 20 years' time. If we do nothing, future pensioners will be 30 per cent. worse off relative to workers than they are today.

The commission has put forward a comprehensive package of reforms to address those challenges. In relation to state provision, it recommends

"a reform of State pension provision to make it simpler to understand and less means tested than it would become if current indexation arrangements continued."

It makes it clear that there are a variety of options to secure its objectives. Its preferred way forward is a higher basic state pension indexed to average earnings growth, ideally starting in 2010 or 2011 as the public expenditure benefits of the rise in women's state pension age begin to flow through. The commission has also proposed a universal basic state pension based on residency rather than contributions.

The trade-off would be a higher state pension age. That would be phased in gradually in proportion to the increase in life expectancy. For example, it could rise to 66 by 2030, 67 by 2040, and 68 by 2050. Those changes would not affect anyone aged 50 and over. Furthermore, based on the commission's assumptions, today's 41-year-old could face only one additional year of working age, a 32-year-old two years, and a 23-year-old three years.

Those changes are designed to underpin a major extension of workplace savings. Here, the commission recommends a new, simple, low-cost savings scheme. All employees would automatically be enrolled into either a high-quality employer pension scheme or a newly created national pensions saving scheme, but with the right to opt out. Employers would be required to make a matching contribution. The commission also makes proposals to tackle inequality in the pensions system, especially for women and carers.

The Government welcome the broad framework of the Pensions Commission proposals and options and believe that they are the right basis for the debate to come. There is much to be discussed and decided about the detail of that framework. Our response will be based on the five key tests that I set out last week.

First, do the proposals promote personal responsibility? The role of the state is to provide a floor through which no one can fall but, as we have made clear, the primary responsibility for security in old age must ultimately rest with individuals and their families.

Secondly, are the proposals fair? Our future system must continue to protect the poorest. It must be fair to women and carers, employers and workers in the public and private sectors and those who have saved.

Thirdly, are the proposals affordable? Several points in them raise the prospect of additional Government spending. For example, there is the re-linking of the basic state pension to earnings, scrapped by the previous Conservative Government. There is also the proposal to make the basic state pension universal from the age of 75, which would benefit many women pensioners. We therefore have to test all the costings. We cannot make decisions without first determining the affordability of the proposals and there is no point in us or anyone else making commitments on anything other than a sensible and sustainable financial basis.

As the Chancellor has made clear, there will be no relaxation in our fiscal discipline and we will not put the long-term stability of the public finances at risk. That test will be central. A near 50 per cent. increase in the number of pensioners between now and 2050 presents obvious challenges and choices for the country about the proportion of its wealth that should be used to support retirement.

Fourthly, do the proposals simplify the system? Any credible package of reform must represent a clear deal between citizens and the state so that people know what the Government will do for them and what is expected of them in return.

Fifthly, are the proposals sustainable? People must have the confidence to plan for their retirement. An enduring national consensus must be our goal.

The Pensions Commission's first report last October was a comprehensive analysis of the UK pensions system. I believe that today's report is an important milestone on the way to a lasting pensions settlement. I should like to put on record on behalf of the Government—and, I hope, the House—our thanks to Lord Turner and his fellow commissioners Jeannie Drake and Professor John Hills for their work during the past three years. They have made a tremendous contribution to one of the most important public policy challenges that face the country today.

The publication of the Pensions Commission's second report today marks the beginning of the new national debate, not the end. As far as the specific recommendations are concerned, we are ruling nothing in and nothing out. We will welcome ideas and proposals from the political parties, employers, trade unions and everyone with an interest in the future of our pensions system.

In the next few months, we will examine in detail the commission's policy recommendations. The Pensions Commission has called for a national debate about the right way forward to start as soon as possible. I agree. We will therefore undertake a major consultation exercise, talking to people of all ages, in all parts of the country. I have asked the Pensions Commission to continue its involvement in the debate in the next few months as we move from diagnosis and analysis to proposition and decision. I want the debate to involve every section of our community as we work towards the publication of a White Paper in the spring.

Previous Labour Governments have risen to the challenge of securing long-term reform of our pensions system to meet the challenges of their time. From Clement Attlee to Barbara Castle, crucial decisions have been taken by politicians who could see the benefits of long-term reform. I believe that it is our turn now to see the scale and depth of the challenge in the way that previous generations of politicians viewed such challenges. This should be our benchmark in laying the foundations for reform in the 21st century.

The need to get it right is clear; the responsibility to do so is even clearer—for this generation and the next.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): We thank the Secretary of State for his remarks. Given last week's noises off, he is to be congratulated on even having been invited to make the statement on the Government's behalf. He will also rightly be thanked for, unlike the Chancellor, not having sought to undermine the Turner report even before the public had been made aware of its contents. Does the Secretary of State agree that it was quite unprecedented for the Chancellor—perhaps even without consulting the Secretary of State—to seek to sabotage the report in that way? It must be the first book in the history of publishing to have been rubbished by one of its publishers before it even appeared on the bookshelves.

The Conservatives very much welcome Adair Turner's report. It is a powerful, professional and persuasive document, and, like the Government, we wish to devote considerable time to analysing its recommendations. As the Secretary of State will be aware, the commission was appointed because of a savings crisis in this country. He might like to remind the Minister for Pensions Reform, who claimed again on Monday that there was no crisis, that that will not sound convincing to the 70,000 to 80,000 future pensioners who have already been told that all or most of their pensions simply will not be paid in the years to come. Indeed, to allege that there is no crisis flies in the face of what Lord Turner says in the Pensions Commission report published today. He says that "private pension provision is not growing: rather it is in serious and probably irreversible decline."

If that is not evidence of a crisis, it is difficult to understand what is. It is all very well, after eight years, for the Secretary of State to say, "Now is the time for pension reform". One has to ask where the Government have been over the past eight years.

The Conservatives will judge not only the Turner report but the Government's response against three important criteria. First, will they offer to future generations of pensioners the security and standard of living that they are entitled to look forward to? Secondly, will the report and the Government's response deal with the fundamental problem of women's pensions in a way that will resolve that difficulty in an acceptable fashion? Thirdly, will the Government's response to the Turner report treat fairly both public and private sector employees? Only on the basis of common treatment based on fair principles are the difficult proposals in the report ever likely to be acceptable to the British public.

Against that background, I have four questions for the Secretary of State. The first relates to the recommendation that the retirement age should in future be around 67 years of age. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Government have made it enormously difficult to persuade the public that they should continue working until the age of 67, when that same Government have simultaneously agreed with the trade unions that, for the next 40 years, their own employees should be able to continue to retire at 60? Does the Secretary of State agree with the Chancellor, who said only a couple of days ago that more work needs to be done on this matter? Does he accept that it is simply not feasible to imagine that, for the next 40 years, a retirement age of 60 will be available to the Government's own employees while the rest of the nation is expected to accept quite different criteria?

My second question is on the proposal that future accruals of the state pension should be based on a universal residence principle—a fundamental change in the way in which pensions have been dealt with over the past 60 years, and over time would effectively bring an end to the contributory principle. Whether or not the Secretary of State believes that that is desirable in principle, he should indicate whether the existing information available to Government would enable a residence qualification to be monitored effectively. As the Turner report says, unless that is feasible, the recommendation could not be taken forward in practice.

My third question relates to the proposed national pension savings scheme. We welcome the fact that Lord Turner and his colleagues have drawn back from the original suggestion that it should be made obligatory for employees to pay towards such a scheme. The report contains an extraordinary anomaly, however, because while auto-enrolment will mean that every employee will have the right to decide whether to opt in or out of such payments, employers will be given no such freedom. Does the Secretary of State agree that it is a substantial anomaly, at the very least, that those who will benefit as a result of such a pension scheme can choose whether to participate in it, but those who will not benefit are given no such choice?

My fourth question relates to the other radical proposal in the report. As the Secretary of State will be aware, existing schemes such as stakeholder schemes have a cut-off point so that those with five employees or fewer do not have to participate. Lord Turner recommends that all employees should be part of the national pension savings scheme, and that there should be no amelioration for very small businesses. Does the Secretary of State agree that that will be a matter of great concern to the Federation of Small Businesses? There are serious questions, at least during a transitional period, about whether many small businesses could cope with such a requirement. Will he also take into account the fact that the views of charities and voluntary organisation will have to be canvassed in order to ensure that they are not unfairly treated?

We believe that it is enormously important—in this respect, I share the Secretary of State's view—to try to achieve a national consensus, if that is possible, on the issue of pensions. People's security and future sense of stability will be assisted if such a national consensus can be achieved. The Secretary of State should recognise that the origins of the Turner commission lie in the savings crisis. Does he agree with the Institute of Chartered Accountants, which has said that the single most important contribution—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The behaviour of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is intolerable. He should allow right hon. and hon. Members to put their case without interruption.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can hear what the hon. Gentleman says, as he speaks so loudly. He does not need to repeat it.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: As the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is a very worthy pensioner, he should listen carefully to the exchanges taking place.

Does the Secretary of State agree with the Institute of Chartered Accountants that the single most important cause of the crisis in savings was the decision that the Chancellor of the Exchequer took eight years ago to remove the tax relief on the dividends of pension funds? Is not it indefensible that the Chancellor, who is the prime cause of the savings crisis, should now try to sabotage those who are trying to resolve the problem, which is largely of his making?

Mr. Hutton: There was some evidence in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks that he is prepared to study seriously Lord Turner's proposals, and I welcome that. I also welcome his suggestion that he supports the search for a national consensus. I conclude from his remarks, however, that there is quite a lot more work to be done if we are to secure it. I will not get into the tittle-tattle that he raised at the beginning of his remarks, because this is a serious debate, and I will not demean it by peddling rumours and all the nonsense to which he alluded. We do not do ourselves credit if we do that.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked what we have been doing for the past eight years. We have been putting right the Tory mistakes, and tackling the problem of pensioner poverty, which, as Lord Turner acknowledges, has been a significant advance in our pensions system. Why will not the right hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledge that? I agree about the importance of tackling the inequalities in relation to women in the pension system, and Lord Turner proposes a number of ways of doing that. We will study all those proposals carefully.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that there was a pensions crisis. I can only point out to him what Lord Turner says on page 345 of his report:

"there is no immediate crisis."

I made that point in my remarks. We must tackle these matters seriously, and there will be a problem if we do not take action today. Surely, at the very least, that should be common ground in the House.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman raised four specific points. He alluded to his concerns about public sector pensions. We stand by the deal that we have secured. He and his hon. Friends have been confusing several totally separate issues. Nearly half of all occupational pension schemes in the private sector provide a retirement age of 60 for current scheme members. Many employers in the private sector have been closing defined benefit schemes to new entrants, which is the policy decision that this Government have taken. I am surprised, as I said to him last week, that he wanted to raise the issue, as his party had a chance to make its position clear at the last election on whether it would extend new retirement ages to existing civil servants. The Conservative party made that clear:

"People are right to raise concerns over the Government's planned reforms to civil service pensions . . . We appreciate, for example, that there is genuine concern over extending the public sector retirement age, especially in high-risk and physical public service occupations, and we will listen to any practical concerns people have."

As I understand it, he is saying today that we should have imposed a higher retirement age on civil servants, which is flatly contradicted by his party's stance during the general election. We can therefore discount completely his remarks in that regard.

On the right hon. and learned Gentleman's second question about universal residence-based criteria for entitlement to the basic state pension, it is true that that is what the Turner commission proposes. That, too, needs to be considered seriously. As I understand it, it proposes to keep a contributory basis for the state second pension, which would continue to be national insurance based. Obviously, we must consider all those proposals carefully. I have made it clear to the House that we are not making any announcements about any of those details today. I will have to say something similar in relation to his previous points about the national pension savings scheme, and his point about stakeholder pensions and the difference between NPSS and stakeholder pensions.

It is true that Lord Turner proposes that once an employee has exercised the right to stay in a new low-cost pension scheme, the employer would be mandated to pay a 3 per cent. contribution towards that savings plan. Again, we will have to consider that proposal seriously, and we need to be mindful of the variety of different views that, I am sure, will be expressed.

In relation to stakeholder pensions, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, there is a cut-off for small employers. The Pensions Commission proposes that there should be no similar exemption for small employers in relation to the new low-cost savings scheme that it proposes. That, too, will need to be considered very seriously, as we reflect on what Lord Turner has to say and what emerges from the national pensions debate.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I congratulate Lord Turner on his report. We agree with its basic analysis and long-term vision of the pension system. We, like the Conservative party, are willing to work with the Secretary of State to find a consensus on reforming the pension system, if he is able to find a consensus within the Government with which it is possible to work. May I test the extent of that consensus by asking him whether he agrees with the Turner report's conclusion that the existing pension system is not fit for purpose looking forward? Similarly, would the Chancellor agree with those words from Lord Turner's report?

Do the Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer share Lord Turner's analysis that significant future growth of means testing would undermine voluntary private pension provision by the very groups of people most in danger of under-provision?

Does the Secretary of State agree that the Chancellor and his lieutenants were wrong to brief that the Turner proposals were unaffordable? Will he acknowledge that Lord Turner addressed that directly in his report?

Does the Secretary of State accept that we face a choice between two alternatives? We can choose either the complex means-testing system introduced by the Chancellor in 1997 and designed initially to deal with the issue of poorer pensioners, or the simple system described by Lord Turner, which would give people responsibility for individual savings on top of a better state pension. Are not both the Chancellor and Lord Turner talking about affordable systems, and is not the real issue which is likely to be more sustainable in the years ahead?

Does the Secretary of State agree with Lord Turner and me that it would be unsustainable for 70 per cent. of pensioners, or more, to retire in 2050 and have to claim means-tested benefits? Would it not be ludicrous to suggest, as the Chancellor seemed to in his leaked letter, that a Labour Government would consider breaking the link between earnings and means-tested benefits for some of the poorest pensioners in Britain? Is that not utter nonsense?

Does the Secretary of State agree, again, with Lord Turner and me that it is also ludicrous to expect, as the Chancellor seems to, that the share of national income devoted to pensions will remain static over the next 40 years despite a 50 per cent. increase in the pensioner population? Does he agree that the Chancellor should not be allowed to wreck a consensus on pensions reform that includes not just those in different parts of the House, but every major body that made representations to the commission?

Does the Secretary of State agree that if there is a higher state pension, the trade-off will have to be a significantly better state system that is fairer to women and takes people out of means-testing? Does he agree that so far the Government, including his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, have made a pig's ear of the reform of public sector pensions, which will make the Turner proposals much more difficult to introduce? Does he agree that sooner or later the Government will need to go back and think about the affordability and sustainability of public sector pensions if they are to reach a conclusion that is sustainable and fair to everyone in Britain?

A consensus is emerging in Britain about the way in which pensions policy should develop. Sadly, it seems to be a consensus with which only one man is out of step: the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Does the Secretary of State agree that it would be a tragedy for people in this country—for every pensioner in this country—if we missed the opportunity to secure a national consensus because of the veto of one powerful man in the Cabinet?

Mr. Hutton: We established the Turner commission with the precise objective of reaching a national consensus on the long-term future of our pensions system. I find it bizarre and regrettable that the hon. Gentleman should seek to turn Turner, as it were, into a negative. We have made clear today that we will study every aspect of the commission's proposals carefully and in detail with Members and with people outside, which I think is the responsible thing to do.

As far as I am aware, the only people who have pre-empted any of Lord Turner's recommendations are the hon. Gentleman and his party, and I am afraid that, in true Liberal Democratic fashion, they got it hopelessly wrong. The hon. Gentleman's principal proposals on citizens' pensions were expressly rejected by the Pensions Commission, as we read on page 9 of the report. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman will not have another chance to speak on this occasion, but his hon. Friends may, and we will of course continue the debate. I fear that it may run and run.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions about public expenditure, and about the affordability and sustainability of the package. All those decisions will form part of the debate that we shall have, and the options that we decide are sensible will have a profound bearing on the impact on public spending. I will not trade figures or get into an argument about them today, because I think that that would be premature.

I consider that any unpredictable expansion in means-testing would be a bad idea. We must look at the issue in the round, and we must look at Lord Turner's proposals. We must not, however, lose sight of one important and fundamental fact. Targeting additional support on the poorest pensioners was the right thing to do, and we did it in the face of opposition from the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends. Lord Turner has made it absolutely clear that it was the right thing to do, and it has made a significant difference to millions of pensioners. Now we need to move on to the long-term settlement.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State convey my thanks to the Pensions Commission for its work? Will he also use the first opportunity he has to assure the Chancellor that all Labour Members, and the vast majority of people in the country, thought the Chancellor was right to concentrate help on the poorest pensioners, in record terms, after we were elected in 1997? That, however, is not a long-term strategy when we expect to see 70 per cent. of pensioners being means-tested and a bill rising to 13p in the standard rate of tax.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement that today marks the next stage in our debate. Does he accept that that debate is likely to revolve around the question of whether we should opt for a higher state pension and increased taxation to pay for a decent minimum, or an increase in the retirement age with increased savings? Labour Members need to make a decision and enact it in the current Parliament. If we think that we can kick pensions reform into the long grass until after the next election, we may find that the electorate believe that many of us should join it.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his opening remarks and, indeed, for all that he said. Obviously we shall need to examine the commission's proposals in detail, along with the means by which they can be implemented.

My right hon. Friend mentioned means-testing. We shall have to examine the specific issues raised by Lord Turner and his fellow commissioners, because it would be impossible for us to deal with the country's long-term pension needs without doing so.

I accept my right hon. Friend's point, and I look forward to his contribution to the debate, which I am sure will be significant.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Can the Secretary of State guarantee that he will not rewrite, in any way, the deal allowing public sector workers to retire at the age of 60 for the next 40 years?

Mr. Hutton: We have made it clear that we will not revisit that deal.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I commend Lord Turner for the national pension scheme in particular, and ask the Secretary of State to give it serious consideration.

Witnesses from the financial services industry who gave evidence to the Treasury Committee for its report "Restoring confidence in long-term savings" asked for compulsion, but the stampede from defined benefits to defined contributions and the accompanying smaller contributions from employers mean that more of the risk is borne by individuals. On grounds of equity and risk, will the Secretary of State seek a sensible compromise from all parties to ensure the desired outcome in relation to the contributions of employers, employees and other individuals?

Mr. Hutton: We need to think about all those issues. Lord Turner and his fellow commissioners submitted a specific proposal relating to the national pension savings scheme, but when Members study the report in detail over the next few days, they will see that it proposes a number of other ways of securing the same objective.

I hope that Members and people outside will focus on the important question of how society can do more to encourage people to take responsibility for securing their retirement income in old age. It is at the top of the list of our priorities, and I think that our debate on that part of the report will define the overall framework on which we ultimately decide.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the commission's proposals assume that the generation consisting of today's schoolchildren will pay higher taxes than we are prepared to pay, and will contribute a significantly higher proportion of their gross domestic product to state pensions than we are prepared to contribute? There is legitimate room for debate about whether that is affordable without damage to the future competitiveness of the British economy. Given that after eight years in office the Government obviously have no pensions policy of their own, does the Secretary of State accept that the alternative is to do more to encourage personal and private provision of pensions and more personal and private accumulation of savings? That will involve a complete reversal of the Chancellor's policies of the last eight years, in which he has raised taxation on pension funds, reduced incentives to enter tax-free savings schemes, and extended means-testing so far that he has positively discouraged everyone of modest means from going into savings at all.

Mr. Hutton: I have a great deal of respect for the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I think that he is completely wrong when he said that the Government had no pensions policy. That is palpably not the case. As to his points on taxation and public spending, he is charmingly inviting me to announce the Government's proposals on the Turner report right now, but I am clearly not in a position to do so. I have made it clear that we have a principal responsibility, as a sensible Government, to ensure that we manage public expenditure within the rules laid out by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and we certainly intend to do that.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree with the Turner commission that voluntary contributions for both employees and employers are not the way forward? If there were an element of opting out, it would prove enormously successful. Crawley residents joined me on a citizens panel on this issue and they totally agreed that there should be a system to allow people to opt out, and I have the results with me, though it is not a weighty tome. Will the Secretary of State seriously reflect on that in the ensuing deliberations on this matter and will he thank the Turner commission very much for echoing what Crawley residents were saying?

Mr. Hutton: I am certainly not going to contradict anyone from Crawley, as that would not be sensible. My hon. Friend will see that the Pensions Commission proposes auto-enrolment, which will provide the option for employees to decide not to invest in any of the low-cost saving schemes or existing employer pension schemes. The Pensions Commission estimates that about 30 per cent. of staff may well want to exercise their right to opt out, but we will be studying such matters of detail very carefully over the next few months.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): I declare an interest in the pensions industry and I wish the Secretary of State well in finding a solution to its problems, which have largely been created by the present Government over the past eight years. May I tell the right hon. Gentleman that he will not succeed in his search if he shackles himself to the deal with the public sector unions, which will allow public sector employees to retire at the age of 60? A great deal of sacrifice is expected from everyone, as there is no such thing as a cheap pension. If he allows the combination of a complacent Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the bullying and blackmailing attitude of a union before an election in threatening a strike to dominate the starting point of his search, he will not succeed.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman started well enough, but I am afraid that it got worse quite quickly. He raised his concerns about public sector pension provision and people are aware of the detailed proposals about that. However, the hon. Gentleman and Conservative Members more widely are confusing two wholly different things. They are confusing the state pension age with the occupational retirement age under these schemes. I tried to make it clear in response to the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) that nearly half of all private sector occupational schemes have a retirement age of 60, and we should not lose sight of that. It is quite wrong to stigmatise the agreement that we made with the public sector in the way that the hon. Gentleman has. I hope that what he said is not a foretelling of his position on the search for a national consensus, as it seems to me that he has already made up his mind.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I congratulate Lord Turner—or, as we call him in Wolverhampton, the other Lord Turner—on his report. My right hon. Friend may be a little optimistic in envisaging a White Paper next spring, as the public debate may need to go on rather longer than that. On the matter of affordability, I urge him and the Government to look again into the matter of tax relief on pension contributions. His own Department's evidence is that it has no bearing whatever on encouraging savings for pensions and it is the most regressive income tax measure in this country, with 50 per cent. going to the top 10 per cent. of income earners and 25 per cent. to the top 2.5 per cent. of earners. It is £14 billion of forgone taxation, which would be better spent on poorer pensioners.

Mr. Hutton: I certainly think that we should continue to work on the assumption that we will produce our proposals in the spring. The Prime Minister and I have made that very clear. It may well be difficult, but we should do all we can to ensure that it happens then. The Turner report deals in some detail—I think, in chapter 9—with some of the issues that my hon. Friend mentioned, and we will all need to study those proposals carefully. Ultimately, any issues to do with taxation are a matter for the Chancellor.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Lord Turner specifically said that he did not recommend a major reform to the overall system of tax relief. Will the Secretary of State confirm that in the forthcoming debate that issue will be ruled in, rather than ruled out?

Mr. Hutton: I think that Lord Turner is quite right to refer to the issue in those terms, because, as we suspect, any changes would have a significant administrative burden, particularly in respect of defined benefit schemes. We would need to think very carefully indeed before deciding that we wanted to proceed with that.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): May I tell my right hon. Friend that the debate will be welcomed by many groups in my constituency—particularly, dare I say it, among health service workers in Scotland—because it may help to resolve the anomalous position of part-time women workers, people living in single-sex relationships and others that do not benefit from pension provision on the death of their partner? Does he acknowledge that the former director-general of the CBI and the president of the TUC were on the commission, thereby making it a unanimous report?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, certainly, I can confirm that the recommendations in the report were all unanimous. I also agree with my hon. Friend that it has long been recognised that there is a problem in the present pension arrangements as they apply to women. It is now clear that we will have broadly reached convergence between men and women in respect of entitlement to the basic state pension by 2025, but I do not believe that it is acceptable for us to wait until then before taking any further measures.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that Lord Turner's main and correct conclusion is that Governments must either encourage or require people to save more or work longer? Was that not as obvious eight years ago as it is today, so why have the Government done nothing for eight years—nearly a fifth of people's working lives—to encourage more savings and have instead drawn off £5 billion a year from their savings? Will not this Government's record be as damaging to the savings of the nation as Robert Maxwell's was to his employees?

Mr. Hutton: No, I do not accept any of that. As to the hoary old myths that are traded by Opposition Members about decisions taken back in 1997, let me make it absolutely clear that they were the right decisions and they formed part of an overall package of tax reform measures that were welcomed by the CBI at the time. They were partly designed to deliver, and succeeded in delivering, a significant improvement in respect of investment in British companies, so we should not be under any illusions about that. I have great respect for the right hon. Gentleman, who was a former Secretary of State, but he is mistaken and quite wrong to suggest that the Government have taken no measures since 1997 to encourage savings. As with similar comments made by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), that is palpably not the case.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend said earlier that our complex pensions system produces unfair outcomes for women and carers, and many of us would agree. Will he assure the House that the Government's approach to pension reform will start to address those unfair outcomes and increase people's ability to accrue full state pensions through their caring?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. We take the view that we should look carefully into those issues in relation to Lord Turner's report, and we hope to introduce measures at the appropriate time that will deal with my hon. Friend's concerns.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I welcome the publication of Lord Turner's report, which must be the catalyst for real changes that will help today's as well as tomorrow's pensioners. Does the Secretary of State agree that forcing more and more older people on to means-testing and into the means-testing system is, for all the reasons that have already been set out by hon. Members, neither sustainable in the long term nor desirable? Does he also agree that one of the basic elements of the way forward must be the provision of a basic state pension, set at a level that raises people out poverty, which is not based on contributions and which is linked to rises in earnings? Is that not the best way to deal with pensioner poverty, especially among women?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his positive words of welcome for the Pensions Commission report. As to his further specific comments, he is inviting me to say whether we agree with every dot and comma of the report, but we simply cannot do that today; indeed, it would be wrong to do so. Clearly, we will have to address the issues that the hon. Gentleman has alluded to, particularly the future of means-testing; such factors will be an intrinsic part of the solution and the long-term settlement. We should not forget the very significant difference that the pension credit and the savings credit in particular have made to many millions of poor pensioner households. In the rush to condemn, there is a real risk that we forget to acknowledge those genuine achievements.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend fully accept that, as other Members have said, means-tested topping up of the basic state pension is not a long-term viable option? I realise that he cannot give full answers today, but will he give a commitment to examining very closely the only real way out of this situation, which is to raise the basic pension to the pension credit level and to link it to national average earnings? Lord Turner makes it clear in his report that that is affordable. How, moreover, will my right hon. Friend deal with the very real problem of the many women who are entitled to derive benefits not on their own account, but simply because they are married and opted for reduced contributions before 1977?

Mr. Hutton: With due respect to my right hon. Friend, I tried to make it clear in my statement that in our view, the broad analysis and framework in the Pensions Commission report is right, but we will have to look very carefully at its implications for public spending and affordability over the medium to long term. It would be remiss of me not to point that out, and such considerations will be a central part of our response to Lord Turner's report. That report also makes it clear that Lord Turner acknowledges the contribution made by targeted support for the poorest pensioners. I realise that I am sounding like a broken record on this issue, but it is very important that my right hon. and hon. Friends do not forget the contribution made by such measures and investment.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): Will the Secretary of State confirm that he will consult on whether the new state second pension will be a fully funded, properly invested scheme, and will such consultation address the question of whether the Government or the private sector will do the investing?

Will the terms of such a scheme be drawn up under private sector trustee laws, or will the Government direct such investment?

Mr. Hutton: I am not sure that I can answer the hon. Lady's latter questions; I might need to take some specific advice first. We intend to conduct the national pension debate that I referred to in my statement on the basis of Lord Turner's recommendations, and of other recommendations made on the future of the state second pension and any other part of the pension system. Lord Turner is making a number of important recommendations on the future of the state second pension—for example, he proposes a broad convergence between the basic state pension and the state second pension, so that both are flat-rated by approximately 2030—and we need to consider them very carefully. He also proposes that funding continue to be provided by way of national insurance contributions. There are some big policy issues for us to consider, but I can assure the hon. Lady that all serious suggestions on the future of the state second pension, and any other part of our state pension system, will be looked at seriously during the national pension debate.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for confirming that he accepts the inequities of the current system for women and I ask him to digest very carefully the recommendation that future accruals of basic state pension be done on an individual basis. It is essential that we abolish the outmoded, totally unacceptable and inequitable basis on which women get a pension: dependency on their spouse—if, indeed, there is a spouse. I also ask my right hon. Friend to note, when considering the recommendation that pensions ultimately become universal, the potentially great benefits for women. Does he further acknowledge that if universality offers the way ahead for the young, there is none the less a present and urgent need to reconfigure national insurance credits, so that women who are part-way through their careers do not suffer from these now well acknowledged inequities when they retire?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that, and I pay tribute to the work that she and many other Labour Members have done in drawing attention to such problems. I can confirm that we will examine all those proposals in detail in the next few months. I accept the urgency of the situation and the need for reform in this very important area.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that if the Government decide to go ahead with the Turner report's recommendation for a national pension savings scheme, it will be essential to have sufficient safeguards in place to prevent future occupants of No. 11 Downing street from mounting a smash-and-grab raid on what we hope will be a mounting pot of individual savings over many years? To pick up on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), it will be essential to avoid any kind of political interference in the management of that money.

Does the Secretary of State also acknowledge that if he accepts the Turner commission's recommendation to increase the retirement age, he will have to adjust the current age discrimination laws, which allow people above the age of 65 to be dismissed on age-related grounds? If we are going to ask people to work until 67 or 68, we will clearly need to adjust those laws.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman's last point is right, and we will need to revisit that issue if we accept any part of Lord Turner's proposal. At the risk of jeopardising the spirit of consensus and good will, all that I can say of his point about my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is: for heaven's sake, grow up.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Government's proposals take account of inequality in our society? Is the Secretary of State aware, for example, that average life expectancy in my constituency is 68, and that enthusiasm there for an increase in the retirement age is therefore less than total? How does he intend to take account of these social factors?

Mr. Hutton: I agree that we have to look very seriously at this issue. To be fair to Lord Turner, his report does provide a number of options that might help to ameliorate the problem that my hon. Friend refers to, and we need to study them very carefully. They include triggering entitlement to the pension credit at 67, 66 or even earlier. It is important, however, to correct a notorious headline in The Daily Telegraph of a few weeks ago, which said that if we pursued the policy that Lord Turner was likely to recommend—a stepped and gradual increase in the state pension age—20 per cent. of men would never get to the age of 67. That is completely untrue. It is likely that, with a pension age of between 65 and 67, a further 3 per cent. of men would not make it to 67. That is obviously a matter of regret, but the situation is not quite as bad as when Lloyd George introduced the basic state pension in 1908. Then, the pension age was 70 and average male life expectancy was 45. With hindsight, that looks like something of a fiscal con-trick.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Does the Secretary of State endorse Lord Turner's specific conclusion that the 40 per cent. marginal tax rate arising from the withdrawal of the pension credit undermines voluntary private saving, or does he insist—as his Ministers were doing until as recently as this Monday—that there is no evidence of any disincentive?

Mr. Hutton: To be frank, I have yet to see any concrete evidence of a disincentive effect on saving, but the Department for Work and Pensions will shortly publish new research that might throw some light on this subject.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I greatly welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to doing something concrete about poverty among women pensioners, who were structurally locked out of adequate pension schemes for now outmoded reasons. However, will he be cautious in dealing with blandishments concerning an exemption for small firms? If we build in another barrier to adequate pensions, we will probably end up reintroducing gender discrimination. In any case, such an exemption would be unacceptable for those working for small firms, who are often low earners.

Mr. Hutton: We have made no decisions on Lord Turner's recommendation for a new, low-cost savings scheme for employees. He proposes no exemptions for small firms, but I have made it clear that we will have to consider that part of his report in the same way as other aspects of it. My hon. Friend will be aware of the changes that we have made in an effort to credit periods spent out of waged employment by women and carers, and I hope that they will make a significant difference. They apply principally to the state second pension, but they have made, and will continue to make, a significant contribution.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): At the risk of incurring the Secretary of State's wrath, does he accept that pensioners would be better off with the compounded £60 billion to £70 billion removed by the Chancellor since 1997? If not, why not?

Mr. Hutton: I am afraid to say that the hon. Gentleman needs to learn a lot more about this subject before he makes another contribution. It is much more complicated than that, and if he wants to study it further he should perhaps look at the Pensions Policy Institute's recent work on the alleged £5 billion figure. It is complicated, in the first place by increases—[Interruption.] Well, the hon. Gentleman either wants to listen or he does not, and I suspect that it is clear to all of us on this side of the House that he does not. One of the issues is longevity, and it would be foolish for him and others to pretend otherwise. Another factor is what has happened in the stock exchange over the past six or seven years, and the low level of interest rates has also been significant. The announcement about tax dividend credits was welcomed by business because it formed part of a wider overall package, and it is important to bear that in mind. I know one other thing—that the Opposition are not proposing to reverse that tax credit.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is little evidence that the reduction in the tax dividend credit, which actually began in 1993, has had any significant impact on pension levels? Was not the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) telling the truth when he said that the leading companies in the FTSE 100 list had told him that the reintroduction of the tax credit would have no bearing on their decisions about company pensions?

Mr. Hutton: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification, and agree absolutely with him. I agree with something else that the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) said recently—that Tory pensions policy would not solve the pensions crisis. I think that that is very right too.

Grant Shapps (Welwyn Hatfield) (Con): The Secretary of State is proposing to bring out his White Paper next spring. By then, the Government will have had nine years to bring proposals forward. The point made a moment ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) was rather rudely dismissed, but nine times £5 billion does equal £45 billion. I understand that the calculation may be somewhat more complex, but I have studied the issues and understand advance corporation tax better than most hon. Members. Lord Turner makes it clear that the deficit is about £57 billion, of which £45 billion could be taken from the ACT change and raid carried out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What does the right hon. Gentleman think about that?

Mr. Hutton: Again, we have spent a lot of time on this matter this afternoon. The hon. Gentleman obviously likes to read widely on the subject, so I recommend that he take a look at the material produced recently by the Pensions Policy Institute. That would require him to revisit all the figures that he has quoted to the House today. If he has a chance to look at Lord Turner's report, he will see that he declines to give a figure for the pensions savings gap that in any way resembles what the hon. Gentleman has quoted. Lord Turner says that that is not possible, and I agree.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the vast majority of the 2 million pensioners whom we have lifted out of poverty since 1997 are women and carers? I welcome what the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) said earlier, but I do not recall him saying the same sort of thing when I was a carer and part-time worker in the 1980s. Does my right hon. Friend share my concerns that simplifying and reforming the pensions system to make it less means-tested may threaten those women and carers whom we helped to receive bigger pensions? Must we not be careful, in any consideration of the Turner report, that we do not plunge those people into poverty again?

Mr. Hutton: I agree absolutely. Over the next few months, we must look very carefully at those outcomes that we think are important and that we want to secure. I assure my hon. Friend that we will take no measures that will threaten the retirement incomes of the people to whom she referred.

Point of Order

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I very gently seek your guidance about the status of the convention regarding the silence of the Whips? During the exchanges between the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind), the shadow Secretary of State, you firmly reproved one hon. Member for very loud heckling. However, you may not have been able to hear the very senior member of the Government Whips Office—I shall not name her, as she has left the Chamber—who kept up an almost compulsive and constant sedentary chattering. Moreover, today is not the first time that that has been observed. Is that in order for the proceedings of this Chamber?

Mr. Speaker: Let me say to the hon. Gentleman that I can hear a pin drop in the Chamber, so he does not have to worry about what I heard. I have a policy: I pick up one at a time, and the next time round it will be the right hon. Lady to whom he has referred.

BILL PRESENTED

Armed Forces

Mr. Secretary Reid, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Secretary Straw, Mr. Secretary Clarke, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Adam Ingram, Mr. Don Touhig and Bridget Prentice, presented a Bill to make provision with respect to the armed forces; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second Time on Thursday 1 December, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 94].

Abandoned Waterways

1.34 pm

David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about the protection of abandoned inland waterways, and for connected purposes.

The Bill will safeguard opportunities for the restoration of inland waterways, especially canals, by ensuring a more consistent approach to planning and development activities that affect the original lines of abandoned waterways.

I should start by explaining how I came to attach importance to the need for this Bill. My constituency has a rich canal history. In the centre of Ashton-under-Lyne, the Portland basin is a vital hub in the national canal network at the confluence of the Ashton, Peak Forest and Huddersfield Narrow canals. The Ashton canal runs through Droylsden to Manchester to meet the Rochdale and Bridgewater canals, forming part of the Cheshire ring. In recent years, we have seen the successful refurbishment or restoration of all of these canals and, most recently, millennium funding has enabled the restoration of the Rochdale canal through Failsworth in the Oldham part of my constituency.

Yet there is a missing link in this canal success story, and I should declare an interest as a member of the society that is working towards the restoration of the abandoned Hollinwood branch of the Ashton canal. In some places, especially through the Daisy Nook country park, this canal has been cosmetically refurbished. In other places, it has been infilled and built on. What is more, the construction of the M60 motorway has severed the original line in two places. Despite that, the Hollinwood canal society believes that it can be restored. I agree, but we are realistic about the time scale, which could be as long as three decades. I know that similar challenges are faced by many hon. Members in their constituencies

The Government's commitment to the future of inland waterways was clearly stated in the transport White Paper and the "Waterways for Tomorrow" document explains that the Government want "to promote the inland waterways, encouraging a modern, integrated and sustainable approach to their use."

The document highlights the benefits of inland waterways in terms of leisure and recreation, heritage, the natural environment and regeneration.

Planning guidance already exists in relation to inland waterways. Planning policy guidance note 12 states that local authorities might:

"wish to safeguard sites for transport related development which might otherwise be lost to other development, such as sites adjoining railway sidings or wharves alongside waterways and ports."

That is the problem, however: local authorities might wish to safeguard such sites but, then again, they might not.

In similar vein, PPG13 exhorts local authorities to work with all those concerned, including private operators, British Waterways and voluntary groups, to develop the potential of inland waterways. In drawing up development plans and determining planning applications, they are advised, among other things, to seek to protect and enhance the waterway environment, "where these are viable options".

The difficulty is that planning guidance is just that—guidance, and not mandatory. It is open to interpretation by planning officers, and one planner's "viable" is another's "non-starter".

The waterways recovery group is one of the leading voluntary organisations involved in the restoration of canals. In the most recent edition of its magazine "Navvies", the editor makes clear the commonly held view among volunteers in this sector—that planners and developers often do no more than pay lip service to planning policy guidance. His article points out some of the difficulties. For example, PPG13 stipulates that new road construction should incorporate full provision for canals under restoration, yet it does not cover waterways that have the potential for restoration where work has not yet started. It does not cover diversionary routes that have been identified because the original line has already been compromised. It does not prevent roads being built so close to the canal line, alongside it rather than across it, that future restoration is rendered impractical and extremely costly.

I know, from what the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) has told me—and I am glad to see him in his place this afternoon—that that is precisely what has gone wrong in his constituency, where ambitions to restore the Lichfield and Hatherton canals have been frustrated by the failure of PPG13 to place enough of an obligation on the local planning authority to protect the line of the canal from adverse development that has hindered its reconstruction.

One volunteer in my constituency has expressed frustration that preserving the line of a canal can hinge on whether the senior council officer with local responsibility for inland waterways is sympathetic and enthusiastic or cautious and pessimistic about restoration. Given the time scale involved in restoration, changes in personnel are inevitable and that brings the risk of inconsistency and uncertainty.

Another concern is the difference in approach towards urban, inter-urban and rural locations. Developers and planners see the benefit of waterside locations and urban sites are very likely to be restored within regeneration projects. In my own constituency, in Droylsden town centre, work has started on a multi-million pound marina, with quality housing alongside leisure and commercial developments. The line of the Hollinwood branch canal has been protected, for a short distance, as part of that scheme. Also, on the banks of the restored Rochdale canal in Failsworth, there are plans for a new district centre, including retail and waterside housing development. However, the relevance of regenerating small stretches of canal and canal-side properties within urban regeneration projects must be called into question if the original waterways between will never become navigable again. The whole point of a marina is surely that boats will visit.

Where the line runs through a rural or inter-urban setting, there is no developer interest and attracting funding is much more difficult. The burden often falls on volunteer groups to bid for funding. Volunteers devote an enormous amount of time to restoration of canals and lobbying of local authorities, funding bodies and others. Many of those volunteers have incredibly detailed knowledge and a great deal of technical expertise. Their work has had, and will continue to have, an invaluable impact on the restoration of canals. However, it is regrettable that the future of inland waterways is so heavily dependent on the existence, skills and abilities of local volunteer groups. In areas where there are no volunteers diligently checking every planning application, the danger is that the lines of more and more abandoned waterways will be permanently compromised.

So, the problems are the lack of consistency of approach between local authorities; lack of consistency of approach between rural, urban and inter-urban areas; an over-reliance on the existence, skills and abilities of volunteers; the fact that construction projects that affect the line of disused inland waterways continue to be allowed, all too often without adequate consideration of the impact on the potential for future restoration; and the fact that PPGs are open to wide variations in interpretation and are guidance rather than being mandatory.

As long as guidance is applied in a patchy way, with variations in approach between one local authority and another and between urban, inter-urban and rural areas, the Government's vision of an integrated and sustainable approach to the use of inland waterways is at risk. The Bill will safeguard the future of inland waterways by preserving the lines of much of the abandoned network until such time as the funding, and the capacity of organisations such as British Waterways, is in place to effect the necessary restoration.

The Bill will establish a requirement for local authorities to consult all those concerned in the inland waterways industry—private operators, British Waterways and other navigation authorities and the voluntary sector—to develop the potential of inland waterways in drawing up development plans and determining applications. In short, it will translate current guidance into legislation.

The Bill will establish a requirement for local authorities to preserve the lines of disused inland waterways to ensure the possibility of future restoration to a standard that meets the normal requirements of navigation. We must act now to prevent planning decisions continuing to be made that close the door forever on the eventual restoration of many of our inland waterways. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by David Heyes, Andrew Gwynne, Kelvin Hopkins, Paul Flynn, Michael Fabricant, Dr. Brian Iddon, Andrew Miller, Lynda Waltho and Mr. Ian Austin.

ABANDONED INLAND WATERWAYS (PROTECTION) BILL

David Heyes accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about the protection of abandoned inland waterways; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 12 May, and to be printed [Bill 95].

Orders of the Day

Terrorism (Northern Ireland) Bill

Not amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

MODE OF TRIAL ON INDICTMENT

'(1) Section 75 of the 2000 Act (mode of trial on indictment) shall be amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (1) insert—

"(1A) The court shall consist of three judges of the Crown Court."'.—[Lembit Öpik.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.45 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I congratulate the Government on their sensible handling of the timetable for this legislation. This is one occasion on which there has been no issue of process, but there has been an issue of content. For that reason, I am sure that we can dispense with the business fairly quickly today, even though three important issues are up for debate. The first is the issue of the mode of trial.

Right hon. and hon. Members will recall that in Committee we had a debate about the specific question of how many judges should sit on the committees known as the Diplock courts. At the moment, as we all know, it takes one judge to operate the Diplock courts. The new clause seeks to alter the way in those courts operate by increasing the number of judges from one to three.

We had the option to table an amendment that would simply have repealed the entire Diplock court system, but we were aware that we would not have gained a consensus on that and also that there may still be a case for operating the Diplock court system because of the evils of intimidation and coercion that are well known in Northern Irish politics. However, Lord Carlile, who has informed much of our debate—the Government have listened to him considerably—suggested in his last report on the operation of part 7 of the Terrorism Act 2000 that three judges of the Crown court should sit in such trials, rather than one.

It is fair to recognise that Lord Carlile's assessment that Northern Ireland judges apply rigorous standards to the quality of evidence in non-jury trials still stands, but he suggested that a three-judge court would command greater confidence across the communities, without diminishing the credibility of the court system that we are discussing.

As we try to normalise Northern Irish politics and Northern Irish law, we believe that it is necessary to do all that we can to normalise the court system. So I agree with Lord Carlile that such a move would help to secure greater confidence in how the criminal justice system operates in scheduled-offence trials in Northern Ireland. We believe that the Government should seriously consider how best to move the situation forward and should certainly take on board Lord Carlile's suggestion.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): In the scenario that the hon. Gentleman envisions, with three judges sitting, would decisions have to be reached unanimously, or could they be reached by majority vote in cases of a difference of opinion?

Lembit Öpik: I was just about to come to that point, because it arose in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) said that she thought that the decision needed to be unanimous. On consideration, and after discussion with colleagues and others, I concur. A unanimous judgment would be a check step that would guarantee that the body of evidence was robust. The argument against a unanimous vote would be that a majority vote was sufficient insurance, because at least two judges would have to agree. In my judgment, it should be unanimous. However, those details do not have to be decided now as they could be dealt with by a statutory instrument that would establish the standing orders for the procedure.

In the previous debates on this point, the Minister cited cost as a reason not to have three judges. He said that in Lord Carlile's 2003 report

"he estimated that 10 additional judges would be required to produce the same criminal justice system. Those judges would have to be recruited and trained, and accommodation would have to be provided for them. If necessary—of course we would do this if we were to move to that system—steps would have to be taken to protect their security. That would have significant financial implications."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 8 November 2005; c. 25.]

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): May I develop the theme of costs? Lord Carlile was talking about 10 judges in 2003 and although only two years have elapsed since then considerable progress has been made, so one would hope that the necessity for the number of Diplock courts envisaged by Lord Carlile might be less than it was. I would also like to make the point that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

Lorely Burt: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have not finished with the hon. Lady. She must understand that there is a distinction between an intervention and a speech. If she really wants to develop a point, perhaps she would be better off trying to catch my eye later in the debate.

Lembit Öpik: Nevertheless, the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) is valid. We are constantly told that the situation in Northern Ireland is normalising, so the estimate of 10 may be on the high side. There is a second point, which relates to other legislation that we have been discussing recently where the Government want to set up an entire, parallel quasi-judicial system to deal with on-the-runs, which will be a colossal expense. It is not acceptable for the Government to rail against the relatively modest investment in a three-judge Diplock court system while advocating an entire parallel system, at relatively high expense, for that other legislation.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): The hon. Gentleman will recall that during Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, the Secretary of State claimed that one reason why the Government were not able to go through a full judicial process for terrorists who were on the run was that it would create major problems in the judicial system in Northern Ireland. What implications does that have for his proposal that three judges should sit in such proceedings?

Lembit Öpik: I thank hon. Friends for their contributions, because as they make them we are covering all the points. In response to the hon. Gentleman, I recall the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland saying, only seven days ago, that he did not want to use the existing court structure because the on-the-runs legislation would "jam up" the courts, so if that is the state of shortage of judges in the Northern Ireland court system, the Government should be investing in extra judges in any case. There is a strong case for resolving both issues by ensuring that there are sufficient judges to administer the existing responsibilities and requirements of the judicial system in Northern Ireland, together with the on-the-runs—a matter that we shall discuss at another time—and the three-judge Diplock court system that we are proposing.

In essence, that is our case. We have given the Government some time to consider it and I hope that the Minister, on reflection, will accept that the new clause is wholly reasonable; the costs would be modest and it is very much in the interests of justice in Northern Ireland. Should the Government hold out against the new clause, it will be necessary for us to divide the House.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): We discussed this matter in Committee. The official Opposition have some sympathy with the point made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) and we have had various discussions about it.

I raised the point about unanimity in Committee although we did not discuss it much at that stage. We can see some difficulty with it. If there was a requirement for unanimity and there was a two-to-one vote in favour of the guilt of the person before the court, the majority verdict would obviously be guilty but the person would presumably be released. If there were no requirement for unanimity, I foresee further problems. If there was a two-to-one vote, there might be questions about which judge voted which way. Were they Unionist, loyalist, nationalist, Protestant or Catholic?

The initial appointment of the judges could also lead to difficulties. The number three does not divide equally, which is why it was chosen.

Lembit Öpik: That is the point.

Mr. Robertson: Indeed.

A further problem could arise: if one judge was a Protestant and the second a Catholic, how would the third appointment be made?

Mr. Donaldson: From the Alliance party.

Lembit Öpik: Although the Alliance party may require an act of faith, it is not actually a religion.

Mr. Robertson: I cannot possibly respond.

There could be an argument for considering the background of the judges, but the current system seems to be working reasonably well in practice, although I accept that trial without jury is wholly undesirable. It is acceptable—if that is the right word—only due to the difficulties in Northern Ireland, which unfortunately continue to exist.

The situation is working acceptably partly because it has as a back-stop the automatic right to appeal. Leave to appeal does not have to be sought; there is an automatic right of appeal in the present system, so although I promise the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire that the official Opposition have looked at the new clause and discussed it in great detail, we have decided on balance that we cannot support it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): New clause 1 would amend the Terrorism Act 2000 to provide that Diplock courts would in future consist of three judges of the Crown court. The business of the Crown court in Northern Ireland is dealt with by judges of the Court of Appeal, High Court and county court sitting in the Crown court in accordance with directions given by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Carlile has recommended on several occasions that a three-judge court could be a replacement for Diplock courts. However, I remind the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) that Lord Carlile draws no firm conclusions and has stated that the decision is one for the Government. Indeed, the proper context is the 2004 report, where he says:

"My overall conclusion is that a 3 judge, non-jury court could"— not "would" but "could"—

"function satisfactorily even if the judges were of non-equivalent judicial status. Nevertheless the present single-judge courts continue to offer a high standard of justice: there is no evidence of any deficit in the quality of single-judge courts."

Crucially, he continues:

"Having provided those conclusions, whether there should be a change is a matter outside my direct purview. It is a matter for Ministers, and the evolving political process. Political and economic judgments at that level are founded on broader considerations than my responsibilities as reviewer permit."

Lorely Burt: In Committee, the Minister may recall saying that when considering the necessity for a successor to Diplock the three-judge option might be tried. Why does he feel that we should wait until we are considering the successor to Diplock before looking at that option?

Mr. Woodward: Because, with the respect to the hon. Lady, those matters must be more carefully thought through and not just dealt with by trial and error. Lord Carlile acknowledges that the existing system offers a "high standard of justice". Simply to work on the basis of "Perhaps it might be better" is not an entirely good way to proceed with criminal justice in Northern Ireland.

In his 2003 report, Lord Carlile also acknowledged that there would be resource and training implications if the three-judge approach were adopted. He estimated that 10 additional judges would be required. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire raised questions about the parallel system that we are introducing for on-the-runs, but I suppose that I should say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I will not crave your indulgence by talking about that measure in the context of this Bill. Nevertheless, the fact of the matter is that 10 additional judges would cost several million pounds to maintain—the Court Service has produced that cost for us. If proceeding down that route were to produce a better system of criminal justice, of course we should consider it. However, until we know the full costings and are certain that that system of justice would be better, it would be foolish to throw out something at that even Lord Carlile accepts has a high standard of justice.

The recruitment and training of the judges would lead to significant financial costs, as would their accommodation and, quite rightly, their security. I am not clear that the proposal represents value for money, especially given that Diplock courts in their current form are due to be repealed under the security normalisation programme in about 18 months, subject to—critically—an enabling environment.

Three-judge courts could create significant problems of delay. The requirement to ensure that the three allocated judges were available for all stages of a trial might lead to delay in the criminal justice system. Unless verdicts were required to be unanimous, which would be different from the current practice in the Court of Appeal, there could be unwelcome and unhelpful speculation about the verdicts and individual views of judges involved in such cases. It is not clear to me that that would increase confidence in the system.

Mr. Dodds: Leaving aside the merits of three-judge courts for one minute, can the Minister help us on the question of costs? Will he tell us how many cases have gone through the Diplock process each year over the past few years so that we can get an idea of the size of the burden on the judicial system that would be created?

Mr. Woodward: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will write to him specifically on that point. Given the analysis that we have seen, we think that the proposal of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire would be more expensive than the existing system. However, as I said, if it were to lead to a better system of justice in Northern Ireland, it would undoubtedly be the right thing to do, but it is appropriate to consider value for money. What matters is confidence in the judicial system. The concerns are not insurmountable, and we are convinced that we could perhaps consider three-judge courts in the future.

As I said on Second Reading and in Committee, I am already committed to considering what, if any, replacement is needed for Diplock courts so that we can tackle the problems of intimidated jurors in paramilitary-style trials in the future. That is an important issue for the people of Northern Ireland. The future of certain types of criminal trial in Northern Ireland is a matter of significant public interest that merits the maximum possible scrutiny and debate. The Government would like to proceed with as much consensus as possible on any replacement arrangements for Diplock courts. Until the detailed inter-agency work that is under way on the issue has been completed, it would not be appropriate to discuss specific proposals or to commit to three-judge courts as a possible way forward.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): The Minister says that he wants to consider costs and implications. What is the time scale in which any further proposals might be brought forward?

Mr. Woodward: I might be able to answer the hon. Gentleman's question pretty much immediately. Although detailed proposals should be worked up by next summer, we would like to ensure that we are able to take on board a wide range of views, including those of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire and representatives of other political parties, before any final decisions are taken. With that in mind, and taking forward the proposals that I made clear in Committee, this morning the Secretary of State wrote to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), as Chairman of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, to make a commitment to pre-legislative scrutiny on any replacement for Diplock. Such scrutiny should facilitate the full debate that I believe the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire would like. It will allow us to take full account of all the issues involved, including costs, security and the question of majority or unanimous verdicts. We must consider those extremely important matters so that we can proceed carefully and appropriately and ensure that any arrangements that replace the present system are better than it, not worse. We look forward to hearing the views of hon. Members on the subject next summer.

Mr. Dodds: I welcome the Minister's commitment to pre-legislative scrutiny. Why is he prepared to adopt that approach on future proposals, but not prepared to accept the suggestion that the much more contentious Bill on amnesty for on-the-runs should receive such scrutiny? That matter was raised in the House by no less a person than the Chairman of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, but the Government seem to have set their face against that approach.

Mr. Woodward: I fear that I would be craving your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I started to discuss on-the-runs. However, as I have said, we believe that it would be entirely appropriate to use the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee for close examination of the proposals through pre-legislative scrutiny. For the purposes of this Bill, we think that the present system remains the right one for the next few months, so I urge the House not to accept new clause 1.

Lembit Öpik: I thank hon. Members for their contributions to the debate. May I start by emphasising the importance of being consistent with Lord Carlile's advice? We are considering the words and judgments of the man who is paid to make independent assessments, so we should think seriously about recommendations and suggestions that he puts forward, even if the Government are not inherently disposed to support them from the outset. I assure hon. Members that my dedicated belief in Lord Carlile's contributions is not based on the fact that he was the Member of Parliament for Montgomeryshire until 1997, although that is a consideration.

I understand the concern of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) about religious and community affiliations in a three-judge system. Nevertheless, it is fairly easy to show that we could find independent judges from across the community who would be trusted as faithful adherents to the standards and principles that we expect from the judiciary.

Mr. Woodward: Obviously, the Government have enormous respect for the work of Lord Carlile. However, when the hon. Gentleman makes his assessment of the matter, he must take Lord Carlile's 2003 report into consideration. Lord Carlile said that the fact that a three-judge court could work did not necessarily mean that it should be introduced.

Lembit Öpik: That is why this is a matter not of principle, but of judgment. The judgment of the Liberal Democrats is that it is appropriate to take the advice on board. I do not condemn the Minister, the hon. Member for Tewkesbury or others for holding a different view, but it is important to put down a marker today on where we should go.

Let me return to the question of the affiliation of judges. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury rightly pointed out that there might be some consideration of whether there were one Protestant and one Catholic judge. It was suggested that the third judge could be an Alliance party member, but perhaps one Baha'i could be the third member of the panel. The problem is not insurmountable. We faced it all the time when constituting the various organisations that have been set up in Northern Ireland in recent years and we got through it. If the system were coupled with a requirement for a unanimous verdict, we would ensure that we would get a cross-community verdict from the judges. We must also bear it in mind that Diplock courts have been frequently criticised for requiring one individual to make a judgment on an offence that would be made by a jury in normal circumstances, or in other parts of the United Kingdom, but I shall not labour that point because it has been made several times before.

As for the number of judges that we need, I am still not persuaded that we need 10 judges to make the change. I am disappointed that, in responding to a question from the Democratic Unionist party, the Minister could not tell us how many times a Diplock court has been used in the past few years, as such information would be helpful.

Mr. Woodward: As I have said, the Government fully respect Lord Carlile's advice. The hon. Gentleman regularly turns to that advice, and Lord Carlile suggested in his 2003 report that we would require "at least ten additional judges, from whom membership for trials could be chosen".

We are therefore also relying on that evidence.

Lembit Öpik: No doubt, Lord Carlile will learn how many times he has been cited in our debate and will have his own views on the matter. I will welcome that as the debate shifts to another place. However, circumstances have changed markedly in the past two years, and he was writing about the situation in 2003, not 2005. Nevertheless, this is a moot point because of the words that the Minister used only a few moments ago. I believe that he said that if it were to lead to a better system of justice for Northern Ireland, it would undoubtedly be a worthwhile thing to do. In my judgment, it would. The Minister is more cautious, and I understand why.

Mr. Woodward: I absolutely stand by what I said to the hon. Gentleman in Committee. We are asking him to refrain from dividing the House this afternoon. We have made it perfectly clear that later next year we will introduce proposals for pre-legislative scrutiny by the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, which will have all the evidence available to make a judgment on our proposals. That is a far more sensible way of proceeding, as it fully recognises the recommendations as well as criticisms and Lord Carlile's observations. Lord Carlile clearly thinks that it would not necessarily be a better system, but it could be. As he has such confidence in the present system, simply to tinker with it for the sake of a delay of 12 months or so would be a little foolish.

Lembit Öpik: I could be wrong, but I see the look of fear in the Minister's eyes. He is afraid that he might lose the vote, but that is the cost of democracy. I encourage him to have the courage of his convictions if the House divides and lose gracefully if it comes to that.

There are two reasons why we wish to divide the House. First, it is appropriate to discuss the details of the Diplock court system, because they pertain directly to the legislation. Secondly, and more importantly, in recent years we have been assured of pre-legislative scrutiny, proper consultation, inclusivity and cross-party accord in Northern Irish matters. In the eight and a half years in which I have been Northern Ireland spokesman for the Liberal Democrats, there has been a movement away from bipartisanship and towards unilateral deals, primarily between the Government and Sinn Fein. I am concerned that the assurance of consultation that the Minister has given us today may not be carried through in future. As evidence of that, I cite the point made by the DUP not 10 minutes ago. There has been no more important piece of legislation requiring cross-party support and pre-legislative scrutiny than the on-the-runs legislation. We are not here to debate the detail of that legislation, but we can cite the failure of process that led to the debate on Second Reading as evidence of the need to be extremely cautious about any guarantees that Ministers offer us, both today and in future.

If we do not divide the House, we will fail to put in place a limited insurance policy that recognises the importance of cross-party support and pre-legislative scrutiny before further changes to the Diplock courts. I accept the Minister's views, and I welcome his offer on paper of extensive pre-legislative scrutiny of Diplock court reform. However, I do not trust the Government to follow it through, because we have been let down in the past. For that reason, I seek leave to divide the House.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Alan Campbell and
Mr. John Heppell

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am one person who missed that vote. The reason was the irregularity of the lift in No. 1 Parliament street. I have reason to believe that it is sometimes used by people who should not be using it during a Division. It was hovering between the mezzanine floor, the basement and the ground floor, but never reached the higher floors. I do not know whether I was the only person affected. There were other people waiting for a lift, and when we got in there were so many of us that it became overcrowded and would not operate. I would be pleased if you could get something done about that so that it does not occur again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was inconvenienced by what happened. I can only offer the immediate consoling thought that his inability to cast his vote did not have an effect on the result. The point that he raises is a serious one. Lifts are meant to be exclusively for the use of Members during a Division. I will ask the Serjeant at Arms to have the matter investigated so that neither the hon. Gentleman nor any other hon. Member is inconvenienced in future. I am obliged to him for raising the matter.

Clause 1

Continuance in Force of Part 7 of the Terrorism Act 2000

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 13, leave out '2008' and insert '2012'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 3, leave out '2008' and insert '2012'.

Mr. Campbell: I shall not stray from the subject matter, but I wish to emphasise the concern and alarm that is felt not just on the Democratic Unionist Benches but in Northern Ireland that pre-legislative scrutiny can be extended to any replacement of Diplock, but apparently not to the serious matter of on-the-runs, bearing in mind the fact that there is no need or desire for the OTR legislation to proceed at all, let alone with such haste.

2.30 pm

The amendments aim to ensure that a message goes out from the House today that it is concerned that terror continues in Northern Ireland. Fewer people are being killed as a result of terrorism today than was the case 30 years ago, which is to be widely welcomed, and we will work towards the total elimination of terrorism from the streets of Northern Ireland, but sometimes Ministers imply that the Belfast agreement or some legislative process have of themselves led to a reduction in terrorism, and that those of us who oppose certain measures are in some way opposed to the improvement on the ground and the resultant improvement in the statistics. Nothing, of course, could be further from the truth.

Having said that, terrorism does continue. Within the past few weeks we have had a number of serious incidents. An SDLP Member of the Legislative Assembly was terrorised in Strabane near the border with the Irish Republic. At the weekend in Londonderry, not one but two devices were planted at the home of an SDLP Member of the Legislative Assembly. Yesterday, we had the spectacle of the arrest of a Sinn Fein public representative, who I understand is being questioned in relation to the very serious matter of the bombing of the village of Claudy some 33 years ago. A Member of this House who has not taken his seat, the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Mr. McGuinness), has admitted under oath to the Saville inquiry to being the second in command of the Provisional IRA in Londonderry at that time. But that is to digress, and I do not wish to do that.

The terrorism continues, albeit at a lower level, so there is a need for legislation to give a degree of reassurance to people in Northern Ireland that whatever length of time terror continues there will be legislation to deal with it. That is why we have added four years to the expiry date, changing it from 2008 to 2012. That of itself would be a clear message to those who engage in terror that the legislative process will counter any of their activities.

In Committee, there was some indication that the legislation would be viewed by a number of people in Northern Ireland as restrictive. It is difficult to see how that could be case—how any law-abiding person could be adversely affected by the Bill. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), who is not present today but was in the Committee, repeated areas of concern—arrests or the Diplock courts—that appeared to go back some 35 years and which may have been prevalent in the early 1970s but certainly could not be gauged to be prevalent today. There is simply no issue in the public domain in Northern Ireland now regarding those matters, and I hope that there will not be.

However, it is imperative that the Government assure the law-abiding sections of the two communities and others in Northern Ireland that legislation to deal with those who engage in violence, murder and terror, whether at a lower level, as it is at the moment, or at a higher level, as it was in earlier times, will be available to give them reassurance. That is the rationale behind the amendments. I hope that hon. Members on the Labour Benches would agree with the thrust of the argument that there is a need not just to reassure the law-abiding community, but to send out a message to those being held for questioning, convicted or arrested that the law will be sufficiently robust and of sufficient duration to ensure that action can be taken both through the process of arrest and the delivery of justice in the courts, albeit tempered with some of the qualifications that many in Northern Ireland have had to endure in recent years.

Lembit Öpik: I listened with interest to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) and I agree with the intention of the amendments. My concern is that to extend the time scale is in a sense to plan for failure. At a time when the Government rightly seek to normalise the Province, surely it would be better for us to work on the assumption that by 1 August 2008 Northern Irish politics will have achieved some kind of normality. I do not oppose the amendments simply because the DUP voted against new clause 1; I do not hold such grudges. I note that other DUP Members intend to speak, so I would ask them to clarify why they feel that that extra four years is required and how they view the assertion that by extending it to 2012 one is in some sense building into the legislation the assumption that it will take another seven years for us to resolve the problems.

Mr. Donaldson: I will endeavour to address the questions that were raised by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), whom I am delighted to see in his place today, and our thoughts continue to be with him.

As my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) has already said, we are not yet in a normal situation in Northern Ireland. It is not that we need politics to normalise; it is that we need society to normalise. We need to have the terrorist threat removed. No one would suggest—though at times I wonder—that we do not have a normal political system in the United Kingdom, and that this Parliament is part of that normal political process. Yet across the United Kingdom there is a threat from terrorism that has required the Government to introduce special legislation and enact special powers for the police and others to deal with that threat. So we are not talking about normalising, or the necessity to normalise, politics to remove the need for this legislation; it is about dealing with the threat from terrorism.

We have special provisions in Northern Ireland for our judicial system because it is not possible when there is a significant terrorist threat to operate a normal judicial system to deal with trials relating to terrorist activity. In the past, witnesses have been intimidated, and I am aware of many cases in which the prosecution collapsed because witnesses were intimidated by terrorist suspects and organisations. The potential remains for members of juries to be open to such intimidation, hence the need for the Diplock courts system.

If the Provisional IRA were to maintain a ceasefire, and if we were to receive evidence that it was not participating in further activity, either criminal or terrorist, it would not represent an end to terrorist activity in Northern Ireland, welcome though it would be. We have clear evidence, which is highlighted in the Independent Monitoring Commission reports, that the main loyalist paramilitary groups are engaged in ongoing terrorist activity, and the republican terrorist organisations are engaged in such activity, too.

The so-called Real IRA and the so-called Continuity IRA are both splinter groups from the Provisional IRA, and they both continue to be active. The Government's legislation dealing with the release of prisoners and the proscription of terrorist organisations specifies those organisations as being ineligible to receive the benefits of Government concessions, because, as the Government accept, they are continuing to engage in and prepare for acts of terrorism—the Government also accept that that is true of certain loyalist groups. Indeed, I recently participated in a Standing Committee that dealt with the specification of the Ulster Volunteer Force, which no longer benefits from certain Government concessions, because the Government have judged that it is continuing to engage in or prepare for acts of terrorism.

It is clear that there is a continuing threat from terrorism, and the judgment that must be made is how long we think that it might continue. At this stage, there is no evidence that the Real IRA or the Continuity IRA have any intention of ending their campaign of violence within the next two years, because they have not made a statement indicating that that is the case. We are aware that a debate is currently taking place within the mainstream loyalist groups, the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Ulster Defence Association, and we will encourage them to move down the path to a peaceful existence and to ending their violence and crime for good, and we would like to see all armed terrorist groups in Northern Ireland do the same.

We must be prudent in planning ahead and provide for every eventuality. To borrow a phrase from the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, we need an insurance policy, and I want an insurance policy that will not expire before a reasonable period has elapsed, which would allow real progress on ending all forms of terrorism in Northern Ireland. I have no basis for believing that that will happen within a two-year time frame, which is why my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry has tabled the amendment. The provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000 are still needed in Northern Ireland in the foreseeable future. Extending the period specified in the Bill by a further four years is a prudent step that will provide a reasonable time frame in which to allow developments to take place, pressure to be applied and, I hope, those terrorist organisations that continue to engage in or prepare for acts of terrorism to see sense and end—or for the security forces to bring to an end—their terrorist campaigns.

I hope that I have addressed some of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire. I appreciate the desire to normalise society in Northern Ireland, but there is also a need to protect society and the judicial process in Northern Ireland. In recent days, we have seen that organisations that have declared that they have ended their involvement with violence still have the capacity to frustrate the judicial process. The Robert McCartney case is a clear example how the Provisional IRA has sought to frustrate the process of justice in recent times—in that case, by cleaning the murder scene and refusing to co-operate.

2.45 pm

We must bear it in mind that the main republican movement in Northern Ireland still refuses to support the police and to recognise courts of law. Even those organisations that claim to have ended their campaigns still do not recognise the judicial process in Northern Ireland, and I therefore suggest that we still have some way to go. In those circumstances, our amendment is a reasonable and prudent safeguard. If the circumstances change within the four-year time frame, the amendment would not prevent the Government from returning to this House to seek to foreshorten the time scale and introduce new proposals. I urge the Government to reflect on the matter and not to end the provisions and safeguards for the judicial system prematurely.

Dr. McCrea: I thank hon. Members for their understanding when I intervened on the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in last week's debate.

Terrorism is an ongoing reality in Northern Ireland. It is true that we have heard certain statements; it is true that many wish to tell us that life has changed dramatically; and it is true that murders no longer take place day after day after day—we are so thankful that that is the reality. However, that does not mean that terrorism has ceased, because it has changed its form. I have never seen or heard real repentance for their terrorist acts by Sinn Fein-IRA or any of the other paramilitary groupings in Northern Irish society.

As far as my hon. Friends and I are concerned, the tag or name used by a terrorist organisation does not matter, because all acts of terrorism are totally unacceptable in any civilised, democratic society, and no act of terrorism should be overlooked. Last week, I asked the Secretary of State a question about the McCartney case and specifically drew his attention to the report that the Provisional IRA has threatened the McCartney family, who have had to move out of their home. The Secretary of State's answer was no answer because it seems that no one, but no one in Government circles is willing to name the Provisional IRA in connection with anything.

When the Provisional IRA does something, we are told that it is the work of an individual who is a bad apple. As far as terrorist organisations are concerned, individuals do not exist in Northern Ireland—such individuals could not exist within their communities without the backing of particular terrorist organisations. We who live in Northern Ireland know that different forms of terrorism such as intimidation—I have mentioned the McCartney family—have been occurring.

Mr. Dodds: My hon. Friend is right to raise the question of individual action and action by paramilitary organisations. When the Secretary of State discussed the McCartney killing last week, he blamed threats against the McCartney family on individuals rather than the IRA. Is that not a dangerous road for the Government to go down? It will not convince the people of Northern Ireland.

Dr. McCrea: I thank my hon. Friend for his timely intervention. That is the very point that the House has to face. The Government will not name the provisionals any more because they are in a sort of deal with the Provisional IRA. They are trying to tell society as a whole and the British community that the members of Sinn Fein-IRA are now democrats and that they have in some sense gone away. Let us remember that the leading lights of the Provisional IRA reminded us, "We haven't gone away, you know." They may have changed their form of terrorism, but the reality of terrorism is still within our society. I do not accept that individuals in the republican community could continue to threaten the McCartney family if the Provisional IRA were saying, "No, lay off the McCartney family." Because there has been compliance in the activity of individuals, the Provisional IRA has been able to try to cast a reflection away from itself.

We have to look even beyond the McCartney situation, however. Let us consider street violence along the interfaces. Especially in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) and in East Belfast, there are interface areas where rising tension and violent attacks on small Protestant and Unionist communities seem to be permitted, because anger is not expressed by the Government, who cannot identify those responsible as active members of the Provisional IRA.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Does my hon. Friend accept that these acts of street violence and genocide along the interfaces are not only permitted, but instigated by leading members of the IRA who are now redirecting their activities towards street violence? Indeed, over the holiday period they organised many of the protests that led to violence against the police and Orangemen in Belfast and other areas.

Dr. McCrea: I thank my hon. Friend, with whom I wholeheartedly agree. It seems that those who speak for the Government are not willing to see this picture because it does not fit in with the picture that they want to paint.

Let us face reality, because unless we do so we will not achieve the normality that we want in Northern Ireland. I can tell the House without a shadow of à doubt that no one would be more delighted if normality were to return to Northern Ireland than my right hon. Friend, the leader of my party, and my hon. Friends. We need normality in our society. We long for that normality, as would Social Democratic and Labour party Members. It is not a lack of desire for normality that makes us want to extend the period to 2012 instead of working towards 2008. We would like this to happen tomorrow if it were humanly possible, but it will not be possible until we tackle the problem. We must ensure that terrorism is defeated and that the structures of terrorism are removed. The sad reality is that under the arrangement between the Government and Sinn Fein-IRA those terrorist structures are not removed and will remain.

I note, however, that other structures are to be removed. Paragraph 5 of the explanatory notes says:

"This programme includes a phased reduction in troop levels based in Northern Ireland, the removal of army observation posts and bases and the de-fortification of police stations."

In many cases, there was not a phased reduction but immediate action. On the morning after the announcement was made, observation posts in South Armagh were being taken down regardless of whether they were needed to face the challenge. Those living in isolated Unionist communities along the border in South Armagh would want to ensure that they had proper fortification, proper deployment of troops, and Army observation points or police posts to provide security—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that he is speaking to a very specific amendment. Although it is of course legitimate for him to make the argument as to why he believes that there should be delay, and he has done so, his other remarks are starting to get out of proportion to the specific matter of the amendment.

Dr. McCrea: Thank you for your direction, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am happy to abide by that instruction.

We do not yet have normality. My hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) mentioned the MLA in Strabane and the situation in Londonderry. What about the young man who was recently murdered in Armagh? Of course, the Provisional IRA cannot have murdered him because it does not exist any more, so we have to close our eyes to it.

The extended period proposed in the amendment is necessary because we need normality in society. For that to take place, whether in 2008 or 2012, there has to be not only a renunciation of violence by the terrorists but clear evidence for it on the ground, which is not suggested by the murders. Many of the areas in which some of us live are still under the control of an organisation that may not be named the Provisional IRA any more—it may be called Continuity IRA or Real IRA—but is still the same grouping. The terrorist weaponry has come from the Provisional IRA. That creates fear.

For normality to take place, we want to be sure that there is sufficient legislation that gives a clear message to the law-abiding community that this House will provide the adequate protection in law and on the ground that they need—as well as a clear message to terrorists that there is no room for terrorism and that they will be followed until they are brought to justice or defeat. Sad to say, some of the legislation that has recently been proposed will fail in the former regard because many of those people will not be brought to justice.

Mr. Dodds: In supporting the amendment tabled in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) I intend to be brief, because many points have been covered by my hon. Friends. I remind the Minister and the whole House of the tenor of the Second Reading debate on this important piece of legislation, during which great emphasis was placed on the need for caution as we deal with these issues affecting the people of Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) asked us to look at matters optimistically. I admire his wish to do that. Certainly, we all want to be optimistic about the political situation in Northern Ireland, but we have to provide reassurance to people in the Province that important legislative provisions will not be cast aside before there is an absolute guarantee that they will not be required. It seems to me that the Bill is rushing at fences, because there is not the slightest evidence to suggest that by 31 July 2007 there will not still be a need for the provisions on Diplock courts, for instance.

I remind the House that we are talking about the provisions in part 7 of the Terrorism Act 2000 coming to an end at the end of July 2007—in some 18 months' time—unless a Minister comes to this House and seeks to renew them for a further year. I understand that on Second Reading the Secretary of State said that that would take place by way of an affirmative procedure. These provisions could come to an end within a very short time scale. My hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) was right to point out that there is not the slightest evidence to show that, by that date, we will have seen the end of organisations such as those that he mentioned, especially dissident republicans or those on the loyalist side or, indeed, the disbandment of the Provisional IRA. That must be borne in mind.

3 pm

According to the statement that the IRA issued in July, although it may not be engaged in some of the activities that it has carried out in the past 30 or 35 years, it will continue to exist as an illegal terrorist organisation in its aims and objectives. It will not have disbanded by the date that we are considering. Nothing that the leaders of the provisional movement, Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, have said recently suggests that they have any intention of disbanding the organisation. We therefore need to ensure that we do not rush ahead and do away with provisions when evidence exists to show that they may still be required.

Sammy Wilson: Does my hon. Friend accept that while those organisations are in being and carry out widespread intimidation of witnesses, it will be difficult, if we do not have Diplock courts, to get people to serve on juries? Intimidation is currently directed towards witnesses, but in future it will be directed towards juries.

Mr. Dodds: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. All the evidence suggests that, leaving aside, dissident republican activity, which is aimed at the security forces and members of the Catholic community who, for example, serve on local police boards, many organisations such as the IRA and those on the loyalist side are turning increasingly to protecting their criminal empires and activities. Their members will not think twice about intimidating witnesses. If there were jury trials, they would want to influence the outcome. The Assistant Chief Constable and other leading police officers in Northern Ireland have made it clear that the evidence shows that criminality and racketeering are "institutionalised" in those organisations.

We will not get rid of such activities in a short time. It will take a long time and a great deal of effort to rid our society of criminal activities by paramilitary organisations. We give our support to—and look to the Government for adequate resources for—agencies such as the Assets Recovery Agency as well as the police in their efforts to bear down on such criminal activities.

That emphasises that it would be premature to agree with the proposition that, by July 2007, Diplock courts and other provisions should disappear completely from the statute book unless they are renewed for only one further year. That would be wrong and misguided. The Government should not so hastily do away with provisions that would be enormously useful in prosecuting the war against terror and criminality in Northern Ireland.

What difficulty or harm can there be in keeping the provisions on the statute book, even if they are not often used, as a safety net and reassurance so that, if a case arose in which there was considerable danger of interference with a jury or of its members feeling threatened, they could apply? Although we have heard comments about optimism, wanting an end date for such emergency legislation and the progress that has been made—there has been progress—we have not yet reached the end game.

We look forward to hearing the comments of the Independent Monitoring Commission in the coming months and years as its reports roll out. In that sort of time, we can make an assessment of the position. The Chief Constable and other security sources will also produce reports and we will make our assessments, and so on. It is clear to the people of Northern Ireland that we have a considerable way to go. People do not feel confident that the IRA is moving to disband its organisation or dismantle its terrorist structures.

I was interested to note that the Minister for Justice in the Irish Republic was recently quoted in The Irish Times as saying of the IRA that "there are indications that the organisation's intelligence function remains active, though its focus may become more political."

That provides little reassurance to those of us who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland. The idea that we should take the IRA's moving its intelligence, focus and resources to more political matters as a sign of great progress, and that we should welcome IRA and Sinn Fein into the normal democratic fold or even government, when it continues to carry out the sort of activities that we have outlined is difficult to accept. For many people in Northern Ireland, nothing short of the disbandment of the IRA will do.

Michael McDowell, the Minister for Justice in the Irish Republic, also said that there was no room for ambiguity, ambivalence or double talk and that the IRA should be disbanded. He said that, without that, there would be no progress on the full implementation of the Good Friday agreement and, until that happened, the provisional movement excluded itself from government anywhere. The people of Northern Ireland would say a massive "Hear, hear" to that. What is good enough for the Irish Republic is good enough for Northern Ireland. We will not be treated as second-class citizens or accept a standard of democracy that others are not prepared to accept. We will move forward only on the basis of the cessation of all terrorism, the dismantling of all terrorist structures and the disbandment of all terrorist organisations.

I urge the Under-Secretary to reflect carefully on today's debate and consider whether it is wise to rid the statute book of an important provision, which is a safety net that can provide reassurance to the people of Northern Ireland. I ask him to think carefully before rushing ahead with something that is unnecessary at this stage.

Lorely Burt: I have a great deal of sympathy with many of the points that Democratic Unionist party colleagues have made. However, the amendments would change the date on which the legislation ultimately falls to 1 August 2012—six-and-a-half years from now rather than the maximum two-and-a-half years for which the Bill provides.

My hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said in Committee that we are considering special provisions to deal with terrorism in Northern Ireland that do not extend to the rest of the United Kingdom. It is right that the Government should keep the matter under review and return to the House in a short time with primary legislation. We do not believe that the Government should be able to retain such powers on the statute book simply by virtue of an Aye vote on a statutory instrument.

The whole House should be able to return to considering and scrutinising terrorism legislation regularly. That is why we believe that the short timetable for which the Bill provides is right. The Government should be required to come back to the House with primary legislation if they want to retain the provisions beyond the beginning of August 2008 at the latest.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I want to put on record some of comments that I made in Committee. My party believes that the legislation should have been allowed to lapse rather than being extended even to 2008. It should certainly not be extended to 2012.

We are normalising in Northern Ireland. We have made significant progress and we want to move on. We welcome the progress that has been made, and the removal of the Army observation posts and all the other outdated or unnecessary military equipment. We thank the Government and the Prime Minister for the progress that has been made on that front, because it brings a sense normality to ordinary people. It is impossible to conjure up a sense of normality while major military installations are being retained.

Increasingly, the normal laws and legal processes will be able to deal with any potential terrorist activity that might emerge. While I understand and respect the views of my hon. Friends in the Democratic Unionist party, I disagree fundamentally with their attitude. We can concentrate on the substantial progress that we have made, or we can seek problems that barely exist, or exist only on a small scale, and exaggerate them. We are concerned, however, about the mixed messages that are being sent out by the legislation. We welcome the effort to move on, and we hope that the provisions will terminate in 2008—we had hoped that they would terminate in 2007.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: The hon. Gentleman has outlined the progress that he sees Northern Ireland as making, and he has done so in the past. In what way will any of the progress, as he sees it, of recent years be inhibited, restricted or prevented from moving further on by the implementation of the Bill?

Dr. McDonnell: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my earlier comments about the military observation posts and the paraphernalia of a war situation. The very fact that such installations exist, that the police stations are fortified, and that we existed for years in a situation that was bristling with guns, prevented people from accepting a normality. There is an acceptance, even among my hon. Friends in the DUP, that we have made progress. I would argue that we have made substantial progress, and we should do nothing that will delay, obstruct or blemish that progress in any way.

Sammy Wilson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is nothing in the Bill that proposes the removal of watchtowers or military installations, or changes to police stations? It deals with the legal processes used to deal with terrorist cases. Perhaps he will address the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell): what in the Bill will stop the process that he has described?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Perhaps I should point out to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) that if he were to reply to the hon. Gentleman's question, he would be straying far wide of the amendment under discussion.

Dr. McDonnell: I entirely agree with you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was merely responding to comments made earlier across the Chamber which had drifted very wide of the mark. I felt that something should be said to refute them.

One could argue, technically, if one wanted to be perfectly legalistic, that nothing in any Bill prevents anything from happening. The reality is, however, that I want to see normality restored, and I want that normality to be reflected in our laws. I want to get us to a point at which we do not need Diplock courts. They are used very rarely today, and we are moving towards a situation in which we shall not need them at all. Our view is that we should reach that stage by 2007. We can just about tolerate the measures being in place until 2008, but retaining them until 2012 would almost result in our going back into a war situation in which we had to keep war legislation on the statute book.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: We discussed this matter in Committee; it was probably the longest discussion that we had. Indeed, I tabled a similar amendment to this one at that stage. While I have every respect for the points made by the hon. Members for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) and for Solihull (Lorely Burt), the official Opposition probably have a little more sympathy with the points made by DUP Members.

As we shall probably discuss more on Third Reading, we want to see a return to a normal society in Northern Ireland. I do not want to add to what has already been said, but I want to express my concern about the fact that the provisions will end in 2008 at the latest, and possibly even in 2007. There is a theory about the 2007–08 deadline. Given the possible retirement of the Prime Minister before the next general election in 2009 or 2010—a matter that we discussed at Prime Minister's questions—the Conservatives are worried that he might want to rush certain things forward. The Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill has been introduced, further Assembly elections could take place in Northern Ireland in 2007, and the provisions in this Bill could come to an end in 2007 or 2008. Everything would fall together rather too neatly. If that is okay, if it is right that everything should fall together neatly in 2007 or 2008, I will be the first to welcome that. However, I am not persuaded that we are anywhere near that situation yet. For that reason, if the amendment is pressed to a vote, the official Opposition will support it.

3.15 pm

Mr. Woodward: This has been a good debate, and it has ranged widely across the Government's proposals. Observations that the Government are being too soft have been made by the hon. Members for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell), for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), and for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson). The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) felt that we were being too hard, and would like to see us get rid of the provisions right now, while the hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt), a bit like one of the three bears, judged the measures to be just right. It is always a pleasure to have the support of the Liberal Democrats. It might be helpful if I try to deal with the points that have been raised, and to reassure hon. Members that we have judged it right on this occasion. I am sorry that, if the amendment is pressed to a vote, we shall not have the support of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), as I believe that, by and large, he agrees with the principles that we are trying to pursue.

In his two amendments, the hon. Member for East Londonderry puts forward proposals, the effect of which would be to allow the Secretary of State to make an order continuing the provisions in part 7 currently in force for a period ending before 1 August 2012. We do not accept his proposals, and I suggest that the choice of 2012 is rather arbitrary. Why not choose 2013 or 2011?

Mr. Dodds: Why choose 2008?

Mr. Woodward: I shall come to that in a moment.

The amendments would undermine the valuable process of scrutiny and debate that Parliament provides. The provisions would be continued in force until 2012 without the need for Parliament to consider the need for them each year or to approve their continued use. The abandonment of such reviews would be a retrograde step. Annual debate on part 7 provisions and their predecessors has been one of the key safeguards underlying part 7, and we would resist the amendments on that basis alone, as we believe that the annual review is extremely important.

I want to go further than that in my observations, however. The hon. Member for East Londonderry is concerned about the pace of security normalisation and the continuing need for these provisions. In that regard, I want to comment on the remarks made by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley. We agree that we are not yet in a normal situation in Northern Ireland, and we agree that we need the terrorist threat to be removed. That is precisely why we believe that these special provisions need to be renewed in February next year, but we shall do that in the context of trying to preserve a careful balance with the objective of creating a normalised society. That is why we are creating an enabling environment. That goal is extremely important, but we equally accept that we have not reached it yet, which brings me back to my observation that it is essential to renew the provisions. This is about judgment, and, in our judgment, it is right to retain the provisions, in parallel with a belief that the future for Northern Ireland is, and should be, an optimistic one.

Mr. Donaldson: I share the Minister's optimism but I am a realist. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that some of the organisations that are continuing to engage in acts of terrorism are not involved in the peace process at all? Does he accept also that their stated objective is to use terrorism and violence to overthrow the state and create a united Ireland? If we are to create an enabling environment to bring those organisations on board and to end their violence, what will we do to enable that to happen, short of giving such organisations a united Ireland? We cannot create an enabling environment that is for one set of terrorists and not recognise that there continues to be a threat from another set of terrorists. That is why we argue that the date should be extended beyond that which the Minister envisages.

Mr. Woodward: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman is a realist. Indeed, everyone who has participated in the debate is being realistic about their assumptions.

A judgment will be made in a few years' time. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his Ministers will not take risks with the security situation of the people of Northern Ireland. As we have again and again made absolutely and categorically clear, while it is our intention that the Bill will expire, it could be renewed with the safety net of 12 months. However, if at the end of that time the judgment of the Secretary of State, based on the advice of his security Ministers, the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland and others, is that other provisions need to be brought in, they would be. That, at the moment, is not our judgment in terms of how we forecast the future. However, we reserve the right to proceed on that basis.

It is important, as the hon. Gentleman says, to be realistic. It is important, therefore, to examine the real facts. If we compare this year to a date at the height of the troubles in 1972, the difference and the reality is extremely stark. We are talking about five deaths compared to 470 in that one year. There were 86 bombings compared to 1,853 and there were 144 shooting incidents—144 too many—compared with more than 10,500.

The hon. Gentleman should rightly say that he will take no lectures from anyone in the House about understanding the reality of the situation in Northern Ireland. I respect that, as all hon. Members respect those who represent Northern Ireland in this place.

As for the remarks of the hon. Member for South Antrim, I was moved by the observations that he made in an intervention last week, which commanded the respect of every Member of the House. Despite the huge respect that I am sure every Member, including myself, has for him, we may not agree with some of the analysis. However, I respect the basis on which the hon. Gentleman makes the comments that he does.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: The Minister is attempting to explain the reason for the 2008 deadline. I shall quote from the last IMC report. It is right that the numbers of certain crimes have fallen, and we welcome that, but the report says:

"We have concluded that because of this paramilitary involvement, organised crime is the biggest long-term threat to the rule of law in Northern Ireland."

The words "long term" perhaps explain why Opposition Members are concerned with the 2008 deadline.

Mr. Woodward: Organised crime is a serious threat, and we do not need a report to tell us that. I think that everybody in the House recognises that it is a long-term threat. We believe that we have the necessary measures outside these special provisions to be able to deal with that.

Mr. Dodds: The Minister says that there are measures to deal with the situation. How do we deal with a situation where someone is before a court and is linked to a paramilitary organisation and involved in criminality and organised crime? Is there not a real danger that a jury, in such circumstances, would be frightened to convict? What is the rationale for doing away with the provision that would allow, in such cases, a Diplock court to continue?

Mr. Woodward: Without wishing to be drawn back to the discussion on Diplock courts, which we had in the previous debate, it is our judgment that the timetable that we have set out in the Bill is a realistic one with which to proceed. However, we have put the caveats in place. There can be an extension of a further period of 12 months. At the end of that, should the forecast not be met—we believe that it should be—we would then be able to review the security situation and put forward appropriate measures. It must stand firmly and clearly in the minds of all right hon. and hon. Members that we will protect the security of the people of Northern Ireland at all costs.

Although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have committed to a programme of security normalisation that culminates in the repeal of the provisions that we are discussing, we have continued to say that we do not take the environment for granted. The Bill contains provisions to extend the life of part 7 for a further year after 2007. It will be used if the enabling environment is not sustained and security normalisation is not possible within that time frame. I am sure that all hon. Members want to see a robust system in place. We believe that the Bill will ensure for the foreseeable future that the special measures necessary to safeguard the security of people in Northern Ireland are robust and are in place, but that there is realisation that there are causes for optimism for the future.

Counter-terrorist legislation, including the part 7 provisions, is an exceptional measure, and it must be appropriate to the security situation. Coming back would give Parliament the opportunity to debate in detail what provision would be necessary and most appropriate at that time. We feel that this is the right approach. Therefore, we urge the House to resist the amendments.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: I hoped that the Minister would indicate in what way the implementation of the amendments standing in my name, and supported by my colleagues, would inhibit the progress that he has outlined. I failed to hear that. The House is faced with an option. We can see progress made over the next few years and have legislation that withers on the vine because it is no longer required, or the situation in Northern Ireland—continuing terrorism, which either increases or continues to decrease—continues and we require legislation. That is the choice. My colleagues and I are firmly convinced that it would be better to have legislation in place for a specified period beyond 2008, up to and including 2012, to give an assurance to peace-loving and law-abiding people in Northern Ireland that the law will be there.

Mr. Woodward: We do give the assurance to people in Northern Ireland that we will safeguard the security situation. In our judgment, however, we will have reached the point by 2007 whereby the special provisions in the Bill need no longer be in place, giving ourselves the safety net, if it is necessary, to extend them by another 12 months. We are saying to the hon. Gentleman, his hon. Friends and the people of Northern Ireland this afternoon that should we judge in 2007–08 that the security situation does not allow for those special measures to be repealed, we will have no hesitation in making the right moves to protect the special nature of the people of Northern Ireland should that be required.

Mr. Campbell: The Minister answers one side of the argument, but not the other. What would be negative or nugatory about extending the provisions to 2012, even if we find that there was no essential requirement for that legislation to be in place? If it was in place but was not required because the situation had improved substantially, what on earth would we lose as a community and a society by having the belt-and-braces approach? Neither I nor my colleagues have received an answer from the Minister.

3.30 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson: Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern, as I alluded to the 2007–08 deadline, that because of the introduction of the other Bill, which we are considering in Committee next week, an awful lot of people who were previously involved in terrorism might be living back in Northern Ireland by that time? Does not that make the situation in 2007–08 potentially worse, not better?

Mr. Campbell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that timely intervention, and that is exactly the case. In a previous debate within the past few weeks, it was concluded across the Chamber that, in relation to terrorism in Northern Ireland and moves forward, caution ought to be the watchword. A cautious approach would be to implement the amendments that extend the life of the Bill to 2012, ensuring that both law-abiding people and criminals and terrorists get the message that this Government will ensure that whatever legislation is required will be in place to meet the threat of terror, whether in the next 18 months or four or five years beyond that. For that reason, we will press the amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 2

Repeal of Provisions of Part 7

Lorely Burt: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 2, line 28, at end insert—

'(fa) section 108 (evidence)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 4, in page 5, line 13 [Schedule], at end insert—' Section 108'.

3.45 pm

Lorely Burt: These amendments would repeal section 108 of the Terrorism Act 2000. This issue was raised and discussed at some length in Committee and I have no desire to rehearse those arguments now, but I do want to discuss one or two of the points that the Minister made in Committee on the use of hearsay evidence. Section 108 has not been used in the seven years in which it has been available to the authorities in Northern Ireland. In responding to an amendment tabled in Committee, the Minister said that five potential cases were in the pipeline, but that we would not know whether section 108 was effective in that regard until it had been tried out. Seven years down the line, and given that we are seeking to repeal as much terrorism legislation as is safe to repeal, I wonder whether we should be trying to implement more such legislation. We have managed without section 108 for seven years.

I remind the Minister that he said in Committee that "our decision is based on the advice of those who have to deal with terrorists . . . the Chief Constable and those who wish to put away the terrorists and prevent them from carrying out the atrocities that they would otherwise carry out. This provision, like the 90-day provision, is to protect the general public."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 8 November 2005; c. 21.]

I certainly agree that it is good to take advice from our police and security services, but our job is to strike a balance between convicting terrorists and protecting the basic freedoms that we enjoy elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Of course, the Minister made those comments before the 90-day proposal was voted down. I respectfully suggest to this House that section 108 should be dealt with in a similar way.

Mr. Woodward: These amendments seek permanently to repeal section 108 of the Terrorism Act 2000. I entirely understand Lord Carlile's views on this provision and I have carefully considered whether it should be retained in part 7 of the 2000 Act. Obviously, this is a question of judgment, and judgment is based on weighing evidence and advice, including that of the Chief Constable and Lord Carlile.

The hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) referred to what I said in Committee about the 90-day provision. It is interesting to note that earlier today the Liberal Democrats drew on the advice of Lord Carlile, who did not entirely agree with them about the 90-day provision. There again, the Liberal Democrat policy of pick and mix is one that we well understand.

I am mindful that section 108 has yet to be used in a case. However, it is an exceptional provision and it was never envisaged that it would be used regularly. I am sure that the hon. Member for Solihull is aware of that, but I remind her of the very special circumstances that caused section 108 to be introduced. They still obtain and are the subject of continued investigation, and we must be very aware of them. The hon. Lady has demonstrated this afternoon her real concern to identify with what people feel about OTRs, but we must do the same in respect of the people of Omagh and accept the advice from the security advisers to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Lord Carlile has often given excellent advice, but we judge that, on balance, section 108 should be retained.

Mr. Dodds: Is not the Minister guilty of adopting a somewhat contradictory approach? In the previous debate, he said that we should have an early deadline because progress was being made and we should be optimistic. However, he now says that we should disregard Lord Carlile's advice and retain section 108 on the ground that it may be needed at some point, even though it has never been used in the past seven years. Moreover, he said in Committee that it was important to retain the option as paramilitary activities overlap further with acquisitive crime. That is exactly the argument put forward by hon. Members on these Benches in the previous debate, and the Minister argued against it. Is there not a clear contradiction in that?

Lembit Öpik: Absolutely.

Mr. Woodward: Absolutely not. Despite the sedentary intervention from the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire—and I thank him for his encouragement—I shall try and explain why my approach is not contradictory.

First, it is worth bearing in mind that one reason why the section has not been used is that cases have collapsed. Secondly, I am not contradicting what I said earlier about the expiry of the special provisions. Section 108 will expire if the enabling climate allows—if it does not so allow, the provision will not expire. It is as simple as that.

We believe that it is right to retain section 108. It is worth noting that a largely similar provision has operated successfully in the Republic of Ireland since 1972. That provision is set out in section 3(2) of the Offences Against the State (Amendment) Act 1972. The basic principle underlying it is essentially the same as that underlying section 108, namely, that it allows for the opinion of a senior police officer to be admissible in evidence in a trial on membership charges. The provision has been successfully used in the Republic to secure convictions for membership of illegal organisations for over 30 years. Only last year, for example, Liam Campbell was convicted of membership of the Real IRA. Although that case is from a different jurisdiction, it offers clear evidence that such a provision can and does work.

I know that the security advice to which I have referred contradicts Lord Carlile's recommendation, but it maintains that section 108 remains a useful provision for the PSNI to have. We understand from the PSNI that there are a number of cases in the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland in which section 108 could be used. The individuals involved have been charged with membership of an organisation that is specified, and the police are willing to make a section 108 statement.

Finally, I urge the hon. Member for Solihull to think about the conditions that led to section 108 and about the people in Omagh. The amendment could undermine a prosecution case. When deciding about pressing the amendment to a Division, she should think carefully about the consequences if it were to succeed. What would be the effect on possible prosecutions? Would it help us to achieve normalisation? Would it allow the enabling environment that I mentioned earlier to come about? This is a very serious issue—it is not just about following up a recommendation in a report. It is genuinely about whether or not cases that could come to court could be jeopardised by the hon. Lady's proposal.

If those prosecutions were assisted by section 108 and resulted in convictions for membership of a proscribed organisation, there will be clear evidence of its usefulness. It remains the case that because it has not yet been tested, we do not know. However, the risk of accepting the amendment is huge. We have concluded, therefore, bearing in mind the ongoing cases, that section 108 remains potentially useful, and we do not wish to handicap the police or those investigating the cases. However, as I have stated, like all part 7 provisions, section 108 is an exceptional provision, targeted at the specific terrorist threat that exists in Northern Ireland. Thus we are committed to its ultimate repeal, as with all part 7 measures, when the security situation allows. That assumes an enabling environment that we may see by the end of July 2007, but if we do not the Bill allows us to continue the provisions for another year. In the event that the security situation then, as judged by the Secretary of State, is not one that would allow the Bill to disappear, we would be able to consider what appropriate steps may need to be taken. However, it is still our belief that by that time the general provisions of counter-terrorist legislation for the whole of the UK will suffice for Northern Ireland as well.

On that basis, and bearing in mind the specific cases of which I have spoken, and thinking of the people in Omagh, the hon. Lady should think again about whether she wishes to divide the House. If she chooses to do so, I urge the House to resist the amendment.

Lorely Burt: I am grateful to the Minister for his comments, but I intend to press the amendment to a Division because it is an even more important point of principle than new clause 1.

Mr. Woodward: Does the hon. Lady accept that in the unlikely event that the amendment were to be accepted, she could prejudice the cases that I mentioned? What would she propose as an alternative to enable those individuals to be brought before the courts?

Lorely Burt: I was just about to come to that subject. The Minister is keen on bringing Lord Carlile into the debate, so I shall remind the House of what he said about section 108. He said:

> "I am totally unpersuaded by the arguments for its retention . . . Section 108 could be repealed without any measurable disadvantage to the cause of public protection from terrorism. It is a provision that lies uncomfortably in the broader context of normalisation and the Good Friday Agreement."

Mr. Woodward: I accept Lord Carlile's observations and I agree that section 108 lies uncomfortably with normalisation, but we are having to renew this legislation because we have not yet reached normalisation. I repeat my question. If the hon. Lady were to succeed in amending the Bill, what would she use to bring those individual cases that I have mentioned to court?

4 pm

Lorely Burt: The Minister has referred several times to the people of Omagh and the incidents in 1998—the principal cause of the introduction of the legislation. However, that was seven years ago and we are now trying to move towards normalisation.

Mr. Woodward: I have just explained to the hon. Lady that we have been advised by the police that the provision could be useful in ongoing cases in allowing people to be brought to court. Omagh may have been seven years ago, but it has taken a long time to collect the evidence. If the consequence of the hon. Lady's Division is to prevent those from individuals going to court, is she prepared to accept responsibility for that?

Lorely Burt: I have already told the Minister that we are defending a principle.

Lembit Öpik: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government are trying to pass responsibility for judgments about justice to the Liberal Democrats? The mistake the Minister makes is to assume that the police are responsible for forming legislation, when actually politicians must be responsible for ensuring that justice prevails. That is why Lord Carlile must be taken seriously on this matter. I am sure that that is exactly what my hon. Friend was about to say.

Lorely Burt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who took the words right out of my mouth. His comments summed up what I wanted to say.

Question accordingly negatived.

Order for Third Reading read.

4.14 pm

Mr. Woodward: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The purpose of the Bill is simple. It will continue in force the vast majority of part 7 provisions until July 2007. The counter-terrorism provisions are targeted at the particular threat that still, regrettably, arises in Northern Ireland. Without the Bill they would expire in February next year. There have been significant developments in the past few months that give us confidence that security normalisation can be achieved within two years. However, we are not at that point yet, and it is therefore right that we extend these provisions until the end of the normalisation programme.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): It might be possible for the Minister to argue, although I would not accept his case, that there have been noises from the Provisional IRA, but on what basis does he argue that there is any indication among the Ulster Volunteer Force, the Ulster Defence Association, the Ulster Freedom Fighters, the Real IRA or the Continuity IRA that they are bringing their so-called war to an end?

Mr. Woodward: Let us not be pejorative or trivialise the historic statement made on 28 July. Let us remember that that was not just noises. It was an extremely important moment—I accept that it was a moment—in the difficulties of Northern Ireland, and the act of decommissioning that subsequently took place was highly significant. Whatever may be said about anything else, we would all be making a mistake if we did not recognise the historic significance and described it as "noises".

The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that he should take no lectures from anyone who was not elected in Northern Ireland. I understand that, but, with the responsibility that we have, we judge that there have been significant improvements in the security situation in Northern Ireland, and on that basis we have reached the judgment that it is appropriate to renew the provisions, but only until July 2007. We recognise that the situation by then may not allow them to expire, so the safety net of a further 12 months is required.

Let us not forget the assurance that the Secretary of State and his Ministers have given in the House and elsewhere that if the extension for a further 12 months is required, and if in the summer of 2008 the security situation does not allow for the provisions to cease to have effect, the Secretary of State will review the situation again in order to provide reassurance to people in Northern Ireland.

The counter-terrorism provisions are targeted at the particular threat that continues to arise in Northern Ireland. There have been significant developments, but we think it is right to extend the provisions until the end of the normalisation programme. Many members have stressed the need for caution in our approach, and the Government entirely agree with those who urge caution. That is why we are not dispensing with the powers in February, and why the Bill includes a power to extend the provisions for a further year, should that be required.

I return for a moment to Lord Carlile, that touchstone of debate this afternoon. He agrees with us that "the duration of the powers proposed in the Bill is justified on the merits and proportional".

The House should be in no doubt that the first priority for the Government is and always will be the safety and security of the citizens of Northern Ireland. We will ensure that the police and other agencies that have provided and continue to provide protection to the people of Northern Ireland have the tools necessary to do the job. That includes, for the foreseeable future, section 108. As a matter of principle, we believe that if the police want that as a tool for prosecutions, it should be available to them, as it is in the Republic. It is important to note that they will continue to have at their disposal the permanent provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000 and other legislation. This framework collectively gives the UK the strongest and most effective counter-terrorism legislation in the world.

Before closing, I would like to express my thanks to all those involved in proceedings on the Bill. I thank those who have joined the debate in the Chamber and I pay credit to the constructive manner in which it has been conducted. I am grateful to all hon. Members who served on the Committee for the manner in which they made their contributions. The Committee considered the Bill quite rapidly, and that is testament to the almost universal support in the House for its primary purpose, which is to continue in force the provisions beyond February 2006.

We have also managed to explore and discuss some important issues of detail about the legislation, not least what ought to replace Diplock courts in the future. I am extremely pleased that the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee will consider that later next year in a pre-legislative scrutiny exercise, as set out by the Secretary of State this morning in his letter to the Chairman of the Committee. Despite the comments of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), he should take it on trust that this Secretary of State will ensure that the Select Committee scrutinises those powers.

Lembit Öpik: I am grateful for the Minister's reassurance, but I and other hon. Members are on to our fifth Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, so is he giving us an assurance that whoever may hold that office is committed, ex officio, to ensuring that that pre-legislative scrutiny occurs?

Mr. Woodward: Absolutely; there is no question about that. It is important to consider the context. The Secretary of State wants us to achieve bipartisan support. Peace in Northern Ireland will be achieved only by consensus, and it is in that context that the Secretary of State wrote to the Chairman of the Select Committee today.

The Government recognise that a serious risk of jury intimidation remains in a small number of cases. I can assure the House that we will put in place whatever arrangements are necessary to ensure the continuing effectiveness of the criminal justice system. The only question in our minds will be whether it can be done better. The standard by which everyone should approach the pre-legislative scrutiny of Diplock courts next year is whether the system can be bettered.

Finally, I should like to express our gratitude to the independent reviewer of the Terrorism Act. He considered the Bill in a letter submitted to me that was placed in the Library of the House. His letter and his reports on the operation of the Act have played an invaluable role in informing our debates on the Bill.

The Bill reflects both the confidence that the Government have in the normalisation process and the prudence that is required when dealing with the safety and security of the people of Northern Ireland. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I begin by returning my thanks to the Minister for the way in which he has dealt with the Bill. I raised a couple of issues in Committee, which by their detailed nature required him to write to me, and he duly did, explaining the situation fully. As a result, I did not pursue the matters further.

I think that I can speak for a number of hon. Members when I say that there is some confusion about how the Government assess the situation in Northern Ireland. On the one hand, we have the on-the-runs legislation, which suggests that the bad situation that we have had in Northern Ireland for so very long is coming to an end. On the other hand, we have Bills such as this, which by their very introduction would suggest that the situation in Northern Ireland is not as it should be.

The Opposition regret the need to introduce the Bill. We wish that we had normality in the Province. On every occasion I have visited the Province over many years, it has been made clear that one of the very things that people want is to be treated normally, both politically and with regard to the security situation. However, we accept that it is not possible at the moment to move towards that.

As a number of hon. Members have said, particularly those from the DUP, there is great concern at the fact that the violence continues. The nature of the violence has changed, but the violence continues. I quoted the recent IMC report in Committee, and I shall quote it again:

"The involvement of paramilitaries in organised crime goes deep."

That is a great concern. The report continues:

"We have concluded that because of this paramilitary involvement organised crime is the biggest long term threat to the rule of law in Northern Ireland . . . The criminals are flexible and resilient."

Those words are sufficient to chill most people. Such comments are very worrying, and I think that they persuaded DUP Members to press their amendment, which suggested that the provisions of the Terrorism Act should be extended not only to 2008, but to 2012.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way in his excellent summing up of the Bill's progress. The organisations involved in racketeering, protection rackets and intimidation include not only off-limits paramilitary groups such as the Continuity IRA and the Real IRA, but some of the mainstream terrorist groups. Does he agree that it is particularly depressing when the Government make massive concessions to such groups, as they are under the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right that the situation involves violence of all kinds and criminality on all sides. A week or two ago, the UVF was specified by statutory instrument, which is not the sort of progress that we want. My hon. Friend is also right to mention the involvement of the mainstream—if that is the right word—paramilitary groups.

Conservative Members accept that in some ways the situation in Northern Ireland is greatly improved. We welcomed the first IRA statement and the statement suggesting that all IRA arms have been put beyond use. As I said last week, however, we are worried about a number of aspects of the process. We are worried because we are yet to hear whether the proceeds of the Northern bank raid have been put beyond use. What has happened to that money? It is my understanding, which I think that the Secretary of State confirmed from a sedentary position last week, that the Government continue to hold the IRA responsible for the Northern bank raid. I think that the Minister is nodding—it is very gentle, but I think that he is nodding. I understand that the Irish Government and the police in Northern Ireland still hold the IRA responsible for that bank raid. Although the IRA's present arms may have been put beyond use—I have been assured that a substantial quantity of arms has been put beyond use—where has the money gone from the Northern bank robbery? Is it not possible that further arms will be bought?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will now relate his comments to the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Robertson: I thought that I was doing so, but I accept your guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I agree with the Government on the case for the Bill, because the situation in Northern Ireland is not normal or even close to normal. I would have liked the Bill to be extended to 2012, as has been proposed. I have already mentioned the fact that some Conservative Members have a theory about the 2007 or 2008 deadline—in my notes, "deadline" is in inverted commas, because it is not an official term—because a number of things could culminate in 2007 or 2008. If the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill were to get through Parliament—in its present state, I am not convinced that it will and hope that it does not—people who were previously involved in terrorism and who may not be within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom would return to the streets of Belfast and wider areas of Northern Ireland. The emergency measures that we are discussing could end in 2007 or 2008. Although it is not for me to speculate, the Prime Minister could be planning to retire then, having wrapped up the whole issue of Northern Ireland in terms of special measures.

If this proves to be appropriate because it reflects the improved situation in Northern Ireland by that time, I will be as pleased as anybody, but that may not be the case. I hope that it will, but I am not persuaded. I would have preferred the Government to accept the facility to extend the legislation proposed in amendment No. 1. The amendment that I tabled in Committee would have extended the legislation on an annual basis, but the Government were not prepared to accept that either. I wish that they had, because we would have felt more secure that the special provisions would remain in place.

The Minister said that if the Government judge in 2007 or 2008 that the situation in Northern Ireland is not normal, they will take action. Given the other things that will be happening in 2007 and 2008, including new Assembly elections, I am not sure whether they would introduce the necessary legislation at that point, but I do not want to drive the nails out of sight on that matter.

Conservative Members deeply regret that the situation in Northern Ireland is not such that this Bill can be done away with, but we accept that it is necessary. That is why we have supported the Government on Second Reading, in Committee and here today.

Lembit Öpik: First, I want to thank right hon. and hon. Members for their continuing kindness and support, and their empathic approach, following the death of my brother. I recognise that while this is a personal tragedy for me, what we are really debating today is a whole raft of personal tragedies that have taken place in Northern Ireland as a result not of destiny or nature, but of the deeds of men and women who resorted to terrorism. I should like us to remember that despite the formal and objective way in which we must debate these matters, we are really dealing with matters of the heart and trying to ensure security and closure for individuals who have suffered through no fault of their own. That is why the legislation is so important and why I am grateful to the Minister for having taken a serious and responsible approach in responding to the points that we have made, even if he may have sometimes disagreed.

I congratulate the Minister on his erudite and entertaining approach, even though we have sometimes had to endure the slings and arrows of bitter words. Only this afternoon, he accused the Liberal Democrats of being a pick-and-mix party in terms of our policies. Were I a vicious man, I would point out that at least I am not pick-and-mix in my party affiliations. Nevertheless, I salute the hon. Gentleman for his prudent judgment through the years, which has propelled him to a position of power. As I look forward to the Liberal Democrats sweeping to power in 2009, I assure him that his experience will be valued and that we can talk about that in confidence.

The main issues were debated again on Report. Those that vexed us most were hearsay evidence and Diplock courts. My colleagues and I remain unpersuaded of the Under-Secretary's case in defence of maintaining the power. His strongest argument related to the Omagh victims and the potential for five cases in the pipeline to require the use of hearsay evidence. As my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) pointed out, that is not strong enough.

Lord Carlile, who has no interest in compromising the progress towards prosecution of those responsible for the Omagh bombing or any other terrorist activity in Northern Ireland, could not have been clearer about hearsay evidence. His comments have been quoted already, but the words are so clear that it is worth repeating them. Lord Carlile stated:

> "I am totally unpersuaded by the arguments for its retention . . . Section 108 could be repealed without any measurable disadvantage to the cause of public protection from terrorism. It is a provision that lies uncomfortably in the broader context of normalisation and the Good Friday Agreement."

That is as clear as any independent arbiter could be that the requirement is not effective.

In response to the Under-Secretary's reasonable question about who would take responsibility if hearsay evidence were not allowed and the progress of justice were thus thwarted, I would say that it is the wrong question. We will not get a prosecution on the basis of hearsay evidence—that is Lord Carlile's point. The question is counter-productive—in other words, it is not neutral. The inclusion of hearsay evidence risks the far greater danger of creating martyrs, resentment and false prosecutions. I do not want to put words into Lord Carlile's mouth, but I would present those explanations to people who challenge me about why I resist the use of hearsay evidence.

The evidence of history supports my point. If hearsay evidence were so important, it would have been used at least once in the past seven years. Furthermore, the Under-Secretary argued against new clause 1, which proposed three judges instead of one in Diplock courts, on the basis that existing procedures were effective. He cannot use that argument in that instance while simultaneously rejecting it when I say that the existing procedures have been effective without hearsay evidence. There is a contradiction in the Government's case for hearsay evidence.

In essence, I believe that including the provisions for hearsay evidence may protect the general public against individuals by banging them up, but they do not protect the general public against injustice. That is at the heart of our concerns about the provision.

The Under-Secretary asked us to identify with the plight of the Omagh victims. I met Michael Gallagher and his colleagues yesterday at four hours' notice. It took the Prime Minister five years—half a decade—to meet the representatives of the Omagh victims. He therefore needs to be careful when he accuses Opposition politicians of not taking the plight of the Omagh victims seriously.

We had an extensive debate on the case for three-judge courts. The Liberal Democrats did not get what we wanted but we got something significant, for which I am grateful to the Under-Secretary. We now have a specific commitment to pre-legislative scrutiny and, I assume, true bipartisan debate about what should replace Diplock courts. The problem with the word "bipartisan" is that it implies two parties. Recent history suggests that, when two parties are involved, they are the Labour Government and Sinn Fein. I hope that, when the Under-Secretary talks about bipartisanship with regard to replacing the Diplock courts, he will ensure genuine cross-party debate, involving the Democratic Unionist party, the Ulster Unionists, the Alliance party, the Social Democratic and Labour party and, of course, Sinn Fein.

The Government often make the mistake of believing that some consultation with one party means that they do not have to engage in full consultation with all parties. I will bank what the Minister has said, but we really want to see the evidence of cross-party consultation taking place before we will be comfortable.

The Minister has also given us an explicit commitment that the measures on pre-legislative scrutiny will not share the expiry date of the existing Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office. I obviously hope that the Ministers will not move on—the Minister before us today is a very likeable chap if you meet him socially, and he does a pretty good job in the House as well. It is a long and painful process to educate successive Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office. Each time that process comes to a conclusion, the Minister is up to speed on the intricacies of what has gone on over the past eight years, only to be moved on. So we have to start again, the same mistakes are made by the new Ministers, and we all have to go back into a mentoring role to ensure that the Ministers have the basis of information that they need for such a specific technically and historically loaded subject.

The Minister before us today has given us something very important. He has given us an assurance that the pre-legislative scrutiny with regard to Diplock courts will not be dependent on those in ministerial positions in the Northern Ireland Office at the moment, but that the responsibility for that pre-legislative scrutiny will be carried ex officio by the Ministers there. I am grateful for that; it is an important assurance. There is no loss, cost or defeat for the Government in having made that commitment, and I look forward to the inclusion of a process of scrutiny that was lamentably absent from the on-the-runs legislation.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government said that there was a huge urgency about the on-the-runs legislation? If they are offering the concession of pre-legislative scrutiny on the Diplock courts, why on earth could they not do the same for the on-the-runs provisions? It makes no sense whatever that they did not; frankly, it is downright inconsistent.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct. I believe that all Opposition Members publicly—and perhaps Labour Members privately—recognise that a deal was done unilaterally between the Prime Minister and Sinn Fein, and we are all trying to pick up the pieces. If I am honest, I do not blame the Minister or the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for the difficulty with the on-the-runs, but the lesson for this Bill is that if the Government are going to make promises of cross-community, cross-party scrutiny of legislation before its publication, those promises must be kept; otherwise, the Government will reap the kind of resentment, bitterness and resistance that resulted from the on-the-runs legislation. To the credit of the Minister, he has given us assurances, in a sober and measured way, that go a little bit further than what I have heard before to reassure me that those commitments will be kept.

I want to finish on the matter with which we began our Second Reading debate. It is the contradiction between how the Government choose to approach terrorism in Northern Ireland and terrorism on an international basis. I support the Bill in its present form—with the reservations that I have highlighted—sufficiently to vote for it, should there be a Division tonight, but I find it extraordinary that there is no joined-up thinking between the Government's attempts to normalise life in Northern Ireland and what they are seeking to do to normalise life in the post-9/11 world in which we find ourselves. It is perhaps a vain hope that we can educate the Government to see those contradictions, however, because I believe that they would secretly admit that there is an utter contradiction in providing concessions to and negotiating, sometimes directly, with the paramilitary organisations in the Province, while thinking that suppressing the opportunity to terrorise is the answer to the problem in the rest of the United Kingdom and the world.

The Minister is an educated man and he is experienced in these matters. He has steered this legislation effectively, if not always in the way that I would like. Is there nothing that he can do to educate those in the Home Office and the Foreign Office so that they understand that the lessons from Northern Ireland provide a more powerful and effective solution to undermining the motives of terrorism than any effort to suppress the opportunities to terrorise ever did?

I think that we have ended up with a flawed but usable piece of legislation. My great regret is that the lessons of Northern Ireland and the many hundreds of hours that each of us has spent debating them are not transferred to the wider debate about terrorism. We can win the peace in Northern Ireland, but there is every risk that we will lose the war on terrorism elsewhere.

4.45 pm

Mr. Donaldson: My party supports the principle as set out in the Bill. We did not divide the House on Second Reading for that reason. Nevertheless, we are disappointed that the Government have not accepted the amendments that we tabled, particularly in relation to the duration of this legislation. I outlined earlier, as did my hon. Friends, why we felt that the lifetime of the legislation should be extended beyond 2007–08.

There is no doubt—I think that this is accepted by the Government—that there is a continuing terrorist threat in Northern Ireland—hence the need for this legislation. Undoubtedly, we will continue to differ over the extent to which that should influence the continued provision of special measures to deal with the terrorist threat. I understand that the Government are pursuing a policy, which is about trying to create a normal society in Northern Ireland. We want to see that normal society because it affects our constituents, the way in which they live their lives and the way in which they do their business. We have made some significant progress, but we must not remove the safeguards that are necessary to ensure that society in Northern Ireland is protected. For as long as the threat remains, the need for the protection provided by this legislation remains.

As I understand it, the Minister did not go as far as to say that there was an acceptable level of violence in Northern Ireland. He quoted figures from 1972 and everyone knows that, because of the carnage that occurred in that year, it was the worst year of what has become known as the troubles. To advance his argument, no doubt the Minister will take the worst of Northern Ireland and seek to measure that against where we are today. There is no doubt that there is a major difference, but that does not mean that we have reached a level where the need for this legislation has been removed. Where is that level?

If by 2007–08 there has been further progress, and perhaps some of the other paramilitary terrorist groups have moved to decommission weapons or declare an end to their criminal and violent activity, which would be welcome, it is highly likely that there will remain organisations such as the Continuity IRA, the Real IRA and perhaps some of the loyalist paramilitary organisations that have not reached the stage of declaring an end to their violence and criminality, or decommissioned their weapons. That is the reality.

What will be the position in 2007 if the Government extend the legislation for a further 12 months and then it ceases to exist? There will then be pre-legislative scrutiny and we will consider what measures may still be required. Why go to the trouble of bringing forward new legislation when we already have adequate legislation? We want to take on board the safeguard of extending the life of the legislation and building in periodic reviews. We feel that that would have been a more prudent way to approach the issue. I regret that the Government have not taken that line. The Government need to address the issue. Do they have in their mind a level at which the legislation will be repealed or cease to exist, and yet there is a continuing terrorist threat? We have seen that those organisations that continue to engage in or prepare for acts of violence are just as capable of threatening witnesses and juries and interfering with and seeking to undermine the judicial process as the organisations that perhaps are progressing towards a more democratic and peaceful situation.

We are still dealing, however, with the legacy of the violence of those organisations. Arrests took place just yesterday, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) mentioned, in relation to the village of Claudy. We commend the PSNI for its ongoing investigative work to find and bring to justice those responsible for the atrocity in Claudy. We note, however, that the arrests yesterday included one of Sinn Fein's Assembly Members, Francis Brolly. We are therefore still dealing with the legacy of republican involvement in violence and acts of terrorism, and that will continue to have an impact.

Sinn Fein does not support the police, and does not recognise the legitimacy of British justice in Northern Ireland. Let me quote what was said by Martin McGuinness, the Member of Parliament for Mid-Ulster, who still does not take his seat in this House, after the arrest of Francis Brolly:

"This is a blatant example of political policing and we will be taking it up with both governments."

I hope that the Government will resist any pressure that is brought to bear by Sinn Fein-IRA to interfere in any way with the judicial process or the police investigation into the matter. Even with the progress made and what the Minister described as the historic statement made in July by the IRA, Sinn Fein still does not support the police or accept the rule of law in Northern Ireland—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. Gentleman now confine his remarks to the Bill? I can see some relation, and I have given some latitude, but I would now like him to address the Third Reading.

Mr. Donaldson: I accept your direction, Madam Deputy Speaker. My point is that the need for this legislation relates to the environment in which we are operating. We do not accept the Minister's argument that we are likely to have an enabling environment in two years' time that will mean that the legislation can be repealed. Part of that enabling environment is whether or not people support the police and the rule of law. If they do not support the police and the rule of law, their predisposition to interfere with the judicial process, threaten, bully, cajole and perhaps engage in acts of violence against jurors and witnesses in legal proceedings is still there. The safeguards of the legislation therefore ought to remain extant. The Government ought to take that on board.

I do not know what progress we are likely to make over the next two years. Certainly, I hope that Sinn Fein will finally accept the police and the rule of law in Northern Ireland, but we are not there yet. I do not therefore share the Minister's confidence that by 2008 at the latest we will have an enabling environment whereby the provisions of the legislation will no longer be necessary.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) mentioned the visit to London yesterday by the victims of the Omagh bombing. We welcome the fact that the Prime Minister has at long last met those people. They are entitled to a hearing and have real concerns, which we understand, and I hope that the Prime Minister will consider carefully the points made by that delegation yesterday.

One of the things that struck me about that delegation was that its members seemed to welcome the fact that those who had been convicted, or might be convicted in future, of involvement in the Omagh bombing would not be subject to the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, and would therefore not be able to bypass the judicial process. I believe that we are creating two standards of justice in Northern Ireland, based on an arbitrary line in the sand that was drawn on 10 April 1998. That will cause enormous problems for public confidence in the administration of justice. I hope that, even at this stage, the Government will reflect on the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, and will withdraw from what I consider to be a potentially disastrous measure that will have a very detrimental effect on the judicial system in the part of the United Kingdom that I have the privilege to represent.

I alluded earlier to the victims of violence. It is important for them to have confidence in the judicial process. The Bill makes special provision to ensure that justice is done and is seen to be done, which is important, but let me also mention one of the omissions from it. The Minister said that the police must have the necessary tools to take on and defeat terrorism, but one of the most important tools that they desire—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that on Third Reading we can discuss only what is in the Bill, not what has been left out.

Mr. Donaldson: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Let me simply make the general point that it would have strengthened the Bill had provision been made for the admissibility of phone-tap evidence in judicial proceedings in Northern Ireland against terrorist suspects. That could transform the potential for the police to secure further convictions in cases involving acts of terrorism. I regret that, to date, the Government have not acceded to that reasonable request, which has come from the police throughout the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, I accept your direction, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall leave the issue for another day.

As for the future, we hope that there will come a day when there will be no need for legislation of this kind. That is our desire. We believe, however, that that day will come only when people can feel confident that the threat from terrorism has been removed once and for all. Confidence is necessary for the judicial process to operate properly and effectively. We are not there yet, and I am not convinced that we shall be there in 2007 or 2008, which is why we sought to extend the lifetime of this legislation.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire made a valid point, albeit in a slightly different context. The Government cannot continue to operate double standards in terms of how they take on the threat of terrorism. They cannot continue to believe that that is the right approach, and that it sends out the right signal to terrorist organisations not just in Northern Ireland but all over the world. When al-Qaeda and its affiliates see the way in which the Government deal with terrorism in Northern Ireland, they see weaknesses that they will try to exploit in the future. When enacting legislation—not just for Northern Ireland, but for the United Kingdom as a whole—the Government must be careful not to fall into the trap of the double standard.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there will unquestionably be unintended consequences from the legislation that we enact in Northern Ireland, which will inevitably filter into the mainstream? Neither we nor the Government have seen those consequences, which is one reason why taking two parallel and contradictory approaches is so dangerous to the Government in the context of international terrorism versus Northern Ireland terrorism.

Mr. Donaldson: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and I have to say that, on the same day as the First Reading of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, the Government were asking the House to support a measure that sought to extend the period of detention to 90 days—a clear example of the double standards operated by the Government. One cannot adopt double standards in dealing with terrorism—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are debating a particular Bill.

Mr. Donaldson: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was merely responding to an intervention, but I accept your guidance.

Lembit Öpik: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I take full responsibility for leading the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) off message and up the garden path, and I apologise for doing so.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is accepted.

Mr. Donaldson: I assure the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire that, despite all his efforts to lead me astray on this issue, I am not following.

To conclude, it is important that the legislation remains on the statute book for as long as it is necessary to afford the people of Northern Ireland the protection that they need from terrorism and the threat of terrorism.

5.1 pm

Mr. Bellingham: It is always a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson), who speaks with a huge amount of passion, experience and conviction. I also want to say to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) that the words that we expressed on his tragic family loss were genuine, and it is touching that he thanked us for them. There has been a considerable amount of Northern Ireland business over recent days and it struck us that it was courageous of him to make his contributions.

I heard what the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire said about the Minister, and I would also like to thank the Minister for his contribution to the debate. Sometimes junior Northern Ireland Ministers are young high flyers on their way up and at other times it can be a dumping ground for Ministers who are going nowhere. This Minister has demonstrated that he is almost certainly in the former category because he has shown a great deal of interest in the Bill and demonstrated his expertise in guiding it forward. I have not always seen eye to eye with him and we have crossed swords a few times on general issues, but I believe that we can put our differences behind us. As the Opposition, we want to work with the Government to find positive ways of helping the people of Northern Ireland.

I regret the fact that the legislation is necessary, but necessary it most certainly is. If we reflect on the activities of Sinn Fein-IRA and of other mainstream terrorist and paramilitary organisations, there is obviously historic significance in what has been achieved. As the hon. Member for Lagan Valley pointed out, there has been a move towards normalisation, but I remain concerned that the infrastructure of those organisations is still in place. They have also been involved in various activities involving criminal gangs, racketeering, protection rackets, fraud, smuggling—cross-border smuggling, in particular—drugs and so forth. We all know that many of the terrorist bosses who indulged in the most repugnant forms of terrorism and killing have now taken to making serious money through those rackets. Some of them are very rich and are building an enviable lifestyle on the back of such racketeering.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that many of the people who wanted the Army observation post taken down, particularly in south Armagh, are terrorists involved in smuggling across the border?

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point.

When I was involved in the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee at the start of the last Parliament, I had the opportunity and privilege of visiting the Province on several occasions. We were also able to look at the cross-border observation towers, the argument in favour of which was security and the prevention of terrorist activities. Of course, they fulfilled another role—the prevention of cross-border smuggling, a hugely profitable business on which the Select Committee produced a report. [Interruption.] I note that the Clerk is suggesting, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I might be going a tiny bit off piste; I shall endeavour to stick to the subject. However, the context of this Bill is the prevention of terrorism, so how these terrorists are financed is, in my judgment, of paramount importance.

What about the other terrorist organisations that were mentioned a moment ago, such as the Real IRA, Continuity IRA and fringe organisations on the loyalist side? They have given no indication whatsoever that they want to end their terrorist activities. There are still a number of very dangerous organisations in the Province and they could strike at any time. I shall deal with the expiry argument in a moment, but I want to point out that I am worried about withdrawing our forces from Northern Ireland and scaling down the military presence there. To do so is understandable at a time when the British Army is so stretched, but surely now is not the time to disband the two Territorial battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment; that is absolutely crazy.

The normalisation argument, about which the hon. Member for Lagan Valley made some very good points, is an important one, but a price has been paid and concessions have been made. I find utterly repugnant the concession made in the form of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill. At a time when the Government are saying that we need legislation to put in place the framework for combating terrorism, they are also introducing a unique Bill that gives terrorists an extraordinary set of amnesties.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here for a while, so he will have heard the previous ruling by Madam Deputy Speaker. The Bill is narrowly drawn—I shall not read out its title, but it is brief and very tightly drawn—and I ask the hon. Gentleman to stick to the content of it.

Mr. Bellingham: I am very grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for those slight strictures, but I do feel passionate about this issue. We are talking about terrorism and the essence of this Bill, which is indeed terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the feelings and emotions involved in such debates, but I am afraid that there can be no "buts". This is a Third Reading debate and we will stick to it.

Mr. Bellingham: I obviously accept that rap across the knuckles, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall now move on to the question of expiry, which is an integral part of our discussion.

We supported the amendment tabled by the Democratic Unionist party for a very simple reason. The Government were being over-optimistic and over-ambitious and the deadline in that amendment was much more realistic. Given that this legislation is before us now, it surely makes a great deal of sense to use this opportunity to provide extra security into the future. If former on-the-run terrorists are to return to Northern Ireland, they will be coming back at exactly the time when this legislation could well expire. That is very worrying indeed. The Government tell us that they have a fully joined-up approach to dealing with terrorism, but they are introducing this Bill, which says one thing, and another Bill that says something completely different hot on the heels of this one. That is why we supported the DUP amendment, and we hope that the Government will think again, particularly when this Bill goes to another place.

The Diplock courts are an important part of the fight against terrorism in Northern Ireland. Many of us have reservations about such courts and we have had a good debate about them, although what was said by Liberal Democrat Members did not make any sense. The Minister said that he would need compelling evidence about whether the system was working and could be improved—but, if it cannot be improved, he should stick with the status quo.

The hon. Members for Montgomeryshire and for Solihull (Lorely Burt) proposed a system in new clause 1 that would involve three judges rather than one. However, I believe that pressure would be brought to bear to ensure that two of the judges came from the different parts of the community, with the result that the third would have to try and hold the ring. Although the Northern Ireland judiciary is supremely professional, that would put the judges in a very tricky position, and that is why we were right to vote against the new clause.

Lembit Öpik: If that is logical, why does the hon. Gentleman not believe that the single judge in a trial would be put under similar, if not greater, pressure?

Mr. Bellingham: In some ways, that is a fair point, but I do not want to get into a long debate about it as I see that the Clerk is again casting a few glances in your direction, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not want to be told off for a third time—if I got another yellow card, I fear you would ask me to shut up once and for all.

This Bill is about the victims of violence, and its potential victims. We must think about their plight, and about how so many families in the Province and on the mainland have been destroyed by terrorism. However, there is an extraordinary contradiction in the Government's approach. They say that they need this Bill and we support them wholeheartedly, even though we feel that the expiry period is too short, yet they have also introduced the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, which makes concessions that many people across the UK find extraordinary.

The Government admit that we are some way from normality, but the debate has exposed the lack of joined-up thinking on their part. Their approach to combating terrorism in the UK lacks consistency. This Bill applies to Northern Ireland, but other measures are proposed for the mainland that are draconian in the extreme and that will impinge heavily on civil liberties.

The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has compared the differing approaches being adopted in Northern Ireland and on the mainland in a very succinct and eloquent way. There is hope in the Province that life is returning to some form of normality, but the terrorist organisations have a great deal of financial muscle as a result of the proceeds of illegal activity. For example, the proceeds from last year's bank raid have never been accounted for, but that money is ready to pay for more arms if need be.

My hope for the future is coloured by my fear of those organisations' financial muscle. My hope is also coloured by my fear and my knowledge that there are organisations out there that are not part of this so-called peace process. My hope is also tinged with revulsion, dismay and disappointment at the Government's double standards and lack of consistency in their approach to terrorism, in Northern Ireland and on the mainland.

I wish that the Bill was not necessary, but it is and we must ensure that it is passed tonight. I would also like to see the changes that I have mentioned, if at all possible.

5.15 pm

Sammy Wilson: I wish to continue where my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) left off. In looking at the double standards in the Bill, I will try not to wander from the path, as he did, or be led astray by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). I shall resist interventions from the hon. Gentleman, because I am so easily led astray.

The Bill illustrates the schizophrenic approach of the Government to terrorism. The Minister called the Liberal Democrats the pick and mix party, but what we have seen in the past couple of weeks from the Government—and this Bill is part of it—is a pick and mix policy on terrorism. One week, it is jelly babies, the next week it is fudge, and then we get cloven-tongued rock. Last week, the jelly babies were handed out, with the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill. This Bill is a fudge in its approach to terrorism, and yesterday the Prime Minister offered some rock to the victims of Omagh by saying, "We will never give an amnesty to the people who carried out the Omagh bombing." We have heard similar hard words before about Provisional IRA terrorists, but unfortunately those promises have not been kept.

The Government's approach has had an effect on Northern Ireland, because it has sent out the wrong signals to the terrorists and led to continuing terrorism in Northern Ireland. Terrorists need hope, and I believe that the Bill gives them that hope. On several occasions, the Minister mentioned the normalisation process. In the next breath, he spoke of the continuing threat of terrorism. We cannot have normalisation if we have a continuing threat. That is what the Bill is all about. In a couple of years' time, we are supposed to ease the regulations and restrictions, and change the way in which we deal with terrorism.

As a member of Belfast city council, I saw the effect of such an approach on terrorist representatives. I remember a Conservative Minister coming to address the council and being told by one of the Sinn Fein members, "You'll go home in a box, like soldiers have gone home in boxes." Of course, the Minister asked for the meeting to be stopped and the member to be put out, but his parting words were, "You'll talk to us someday." It is ambivalence that gives hope to terrorists and that is what this Bill will do. It gives terrorists hope that they will be listened to. It gives them hope that they will be able to escape justice.

The prospect that in a couple of years time Diplock courts may go and we may revert to jury trials also gives hope to terrorists who escape justice by intimidating witnesses. Their hope is that at some time in the future they will also be able to intimidate jurors. Rather than dealing with terrorism and leading towards normalisation, as the Minister hopes, the measure will ensure that Northern Ireland is condemned to more years of terrorism and continues to need such legislation because of the continued terrorist threat.

As other DUP Members have said, we do not want to wallow in self-pity about how bad Northern Ireland is. The accusation sometimes thrown at Unionists is that we do not want things to change. I want things to change. I want a vibrant economy in Northern Ireland. Unlike the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, I believe that Northern Ireland can stand on its own two feet and that it is viable. I want to be able to give that positive message to investors from Northern Ireland or outside, but when there is a continuing terrorist threat we cannot be sure that the necessary stability will prevail. If the picture for Northern Ireland is to be positive, an unrelenting message must be sent to terrorists: we will introduce legislation that will ensure that they are crushed and dealt with and that does not offer the hope that the Bill gives them.

As a member of the Policing Board, I know of the continued terrorist threat. We receive reports from the Chief Constable every month. Some Members have mentioned the changing nature of terrorism. We may no longer experience headline terrorist incidents—the massive bombs in shopping centres or the shooting of policemen and Army personnel—but there is constant low-level violence. It may not make the second or even third page of the newspaper, yet it corrupts, contaminates and destroys society: the inter-faith violence organised by terrorist groups, the criminality perpetrated by terrorist groups, the intimidation of witnesses carried out by terrorist groups and the control of local areas by terrorist groups are ongoing. That is why we continue to need legislation.

Those charged by the Government with monitoring terrorism have indicated that they see violence continuing in the long term, yet the Bill offers the prospect of normalisation within a short period. It will be music to terrorist ears that there is a weakening and a willingness to take a route that enables them to achieve their aims and escape justice.

The amendments proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) are essential, not because I want special legislation to have to apply to Northern Ireland for a long time, but because I believe it is necessary. The terms of the Bill are a mistake. They will give hope to those who continue to engage in terrorist acts. In a year or two, this measure, along with the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill and others that have been mentioned—I promised that I would not wander—which have been introduced as an incentive and a reward to terrorists, will not have achieved normalisation. The pick and mix, jelly baby approach that the Bill and other legislation represent will unfortunately condemn Northern Ireland to a longer period of terrorism rather than bringing normalisation.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I intend to touch on only one key aspect of the Bill. First, however, I say that I hope that the Minister is right and that the Government's judgment is right. It is in the interest of all hon. Members, especially those on these Benches, that Northern Ireland sees normality and that we reach that stage by August 2007. I am sure that Social Democratic and Labour Members, one of whom has been with us for part of the debate, would agree with me. If the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) had been in the Chamber for any of this important terrorism debate, I am sure that she would have agreed with me, too. When she comes back—at some stage—perhaps she will confirm that.

I have heard several accolades directed towards the Minister, all of which were worthy, I am sure. However, I honestly believe that the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland could do a better job than him. They are the people who should be dealing with Northern Ireland issues, not because they are wiser, more erudite or more sagacious than the Minister, but simply because they have a knowledge that he can never have as he is not part of that community. I thus hope that his judgment is right.

I can do nothing but agree with the Government about extending the special provisions. It would be rash if they did not maintain the powers in the Terrorism Act 2000, so it is right for them to do so. However, I was unconvinced by the Minister's attempt to indicate the rationale behind choosing the date of August 2007. He was unable to tell the House what was in the words, behaviour or record of the organisations that I have listed—both republican and loyalist—that gave him hope that in a few years we might be on the road towards, if not at, normality.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) made a valuable speech because he is well placed to know the circumstances of the terrorist threat in Northern Ireland. As he indicated, he is a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board. He regularly receives briefings from the person who is best placed of all to know what the terrorist threat is. The existing threat in the community is clear to not only people at that level, but those of us on the ground.

On top of that, my hon. Friend rightly pointed out that the Government set up an independent body to assess the extent of the threat of terrorism in Northern Ireland. They charged that body with the responsibility of assessing the behaviour of every paramilitary organisation in Northern Ireland. I have read the last report of the Independent Monitoring Commission. Nothing in the report indicates that the IMC expects that by 2007 we will have reached the stage that the Minister judges we will reach.

As a constituency Member who is aware of what happens on the ground in his constituency, I have to say that the paramilitary organisations are still maintaining territorial control in their areas—that is a fact. There is no indication that they will release that control; indeed, there is every indication that the Government are even assisting them to maintain it. They may have attempted to change their authority in the community but, whatever their guise, as paramilitary organisations they maintain control, whether through the Government proposals on community restorative justice or through proposals on community associations. They intend to keep stretching their tentacles into the community. Nothing in the behaviour of those organisations leads me to share the Minister's hope.

I have seen the problems created at interfaces when paramilitary organisations are in control. Nothing in their criminal activities suggests that they are about to give up paramilitary control, not only of the area but of the community as a whole. If all the signs on the ground and the views expressed to the Policing Board by the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland are mistaken, and if the IMC, which has the same sources as the Minister in the intelligence services and in the police, both in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, has got it wrong, I hope that the Minister will tell us and show us additional evidence to demonstrate that the date that has been picked is a proper one. I do not believe that it is, but let us look at the consequences.

The Minister suggested that there is no need to worry—if the Government have got it wrong they will not leave the people of Northern Ireland undefended. They will introduce legislation and take whatever steps are necessary to provide security. I do not doubt that the Minister and the Government would do so in those circumstances. However, their action could have unintended consequences. The Minister is sending out a message at a time when it is dangerous to do so. Paramilitary organisations, particularly the Provisional IRA, have always attempted to test the Government to see how much they can get away with before the Government take a stand against them. They are testing the Government at present. My colleagues and I require an end to paramilitary and criminal activity—that is an essential component in progress towards the devolution of powers in Northern Ireland. Those paramilitary organisations want to test what level of criminal and paramilitary activity the Government expect, but if there is anything other than zero tolerance the Minister will let the community down badly. The Bill gives paramilitary organisations the message that what they are doing is all right. It says, "We are content with it, and we are even establishing legislation in the expectation that you will maintain this situation in Northern Ireland."

It is not all right, but the criminality of paramilitary organisations continues every day in Northern Ireland. It does so not just at the lesser level, such as threatening the local grocery store if the owner does not make his weekly donation, but in the structured efforts of the Provisional IRA and other paramilitary organisations to exert their authority on any building proposals in their area. It is evident, too, in drug dealing and the sale of counterfeit goods in their area. All those things are still going on in those communities, but the Minister has introduced legislation that suggests that the Government are comfortable and happy about the way things are going. They are so happy, in fact, that they are content to include a stop date of 2007 because things are going in the right direction.

That is the wrong message for the Government to send out. They should hold out until they have complete cessation of all paramilitary and criminal activity. That comes back to the issue that my colleagues and I have fought since 1998. We believe that the Ulster Unionist party was wrong to accept the IRA's bona fides, and should have held out to achieve a complete end to all its activities. The Ulster Unionists let the IRA in and hoped that they would toe the line. Those are the same tactics as the Government are using now—"bring them along with you". Our view is that the Government should hold out until the IRA has met the standard. That is the only criterion that those people will understand. I hope the Minister will recognise that he needs to send out a clear message that no level of violence or criminality will be acceptable, and if any level of it exists, the legislation will be continued.

5.35 pm

Mr. Gregory Campbell: I join in thanking the Minister for the way in which the debate has been conducted, even if at times during consideration of the amendments we have been at odds. I also pay tribute to all the other Members who took part in debate. It was highly productive and constructive that two of the three Northern Ireland parties were present for and took part in the debate. For that we should all be grateful.

The need for the legislation is undoubtedly considerable. I could liken the legislative process to the position of house owners or tenants. If we felt that we were under threat or there was evidence of threat to our property, we would put up defensive mechanisms. We might not like to put up fencing or take other protective measures to ensure that our properties were secure, but we would know that those measures were essential. The Bill may be viewed in a similar light. None of us looks forward to renewing the legislation, but we know that it is essential.

We welcome the Minister's assurance that pre-legislative scrutiny on the Diplock courts will be granted to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, but, as several hon. Members have pointed out, it is unfortunate that the Secretary of State has not said that there should be pre-legislative scrutiny of the even more important Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill. Similarly, the Minister made an impassioned plea for the retention of section 108.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that even if there is pre-legislative scrutiny, there is no guarantee that the Government will take the outcome on board? I cite the fact that we have been told in Wales that the four police forces are to be merged into one, but that there will be consultation. To date, we have been given no indication whatever that the Government intend to take the consultation as useful feedback and alter their plans. One thing the Minister could do is give us an assurance that the pre-legislative scrutiny will be taken seriously by the Government and has some chance of altering the legislation.

Mr. Campbell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. Yes, when the Government indicate that pre-legislative scrutiny should take place on that or other issues in order to test the waters and find out whether there is a consensus, having established that a consensus exists, they disregard it. We remain to be convinced on the matter of Diplock. We will see then whether there is a consensus and what the Government do in response to that.

I draw attention to the apparent double standard. I listened to the Minister trying to explain his version of the absence of double standards with regard to section 108, and his impassioned defence of its retention on the ground of caution. He said that the Government were wary and did not want to be perceived as anything other than strong against terrorism. Their attitude to our amendment was, on the ground of caution and to be strong against terrorism, that the life of the legislation should be extended for a further four years. I am afraid that the Minister failed in any respect to square that circle.

There is an undoubted need for this Bill, despite its faults and with the caveats that we have pencilled in on numerous occasions. The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee was in Northern Ireland on Monday and Tuesday, and its members from all parties were able to see the continuing need for this legislation. Only yesterday, the Committee went to an interface and I was able to point out to some members the tangible, brutal realities of continuing attacks on properties. They are not simply a product of 1973, 1983 or even 2003, but they are the tangible reality of 2005, and, unfortunately, may well be the tangible reality in 2007, when the Minister seems to believe or hope, as we would all hope, that we will have reached the point where this legislation will not be required.

I wish to conclude on the issue of the level of expectation. Unfortunately, I get the distinct impression from the Minister that while he hopes that there will not be the need for this legislation to be renewed 18 months hence, that may be the case. All of us, without exception, hope that it will not need to be renewed. I would hope that we would not need this legislation tomorrow. But the issue in Northern Ireland is where we are likely to be in the foreseeable future. If the Government and the Minister believe that in 18 months the legislation will not need to be renewed, and at that point it has to be renewed, I and my hon. Friends would contend that that would do more to deflate people and to indicate that there is yet more negativity in store for them than if the legislation were renewed and was found subsequently not to be needed because the expected and hoped-for normality had emerged.

5.42 pm

Mr. Dodds: It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell), and I join him and others in thanking the Minister for his contribution to this debate and other hon. Members for the way in which the debate has proceeded. It has been very useful in drawing out some important issues.

I want briefly to put on record that we should be grateful that we are not faced with the prospect of debating the immediate end of the emergency provisions in part 7 of the Bill. Certainly the Government's approach on other issues has been one of reckless disregard for caution and the facts on the ground, and they have proceeded prematurely to take a number of decisions on normalisation, disbandment of the RIR and other issues that I will not pursue in this debate, whereas on this Bill they have taken the view that it should continue in place for at least 18 months, with the possibility of renewal thereafter for a year. Nevertheless, we still believe that the Government should reconsider that. I have not heard any really convincing argument today or previously that would have prevented the Government from allowing the legislation to remain in place, or even taking on board the Opposition's proposal for annual renewal of the legislation, rather than arbitrarily putting in place a fixed deadline, which means that the legislation comes to an end at a fixed date without any real evidence that by that stage any of the paramilitary organisations that have been referred to in the debate will have gone out of business. Earlier in the debate, the Minister said that the paramilitary and terrorist situation had improved greatly in terms of bombings, killings and shootings in Northern Ireland, for which we are, of course, grateful.

The Minister needs to be reminded of the most recent IMC report: the seventh report, which was issued on 19 October 2005, stated that many of the paramilitary organisations remained armed and dangerous and that many of them are involved in internal power struggles and crimes unrelated to terrorism. The IMC found that the Provisional IRA was still engaged in organised crime and violence after the announcement on 28 July 2005. It found that the LVF was still deeply involved in organised crime, especially drugs, and that it remains a deeply criminal organisation. It found that the UDA was still involved in violent and other serious crime and that it remained an active threat to the rule of law in Northern Ireland. On the UVF and the Red Hand Commando, the IMC found that the UVF was an active, violent and ruthless organisation and that it would continue to use violence where it thinks that that would be in its interests.

The most recent IMC report, which was published in October, formed the basis for much optimism on the part of the Government. However, it serves to remind us of the continuing threat posed by all those organisations, not least the Provisional IRA. Given the nature of those organisations and their continuing activities, in our view it is premature to include an end date of 31 July 2007 in the Bill.

My hon. Friends the Members for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) have referred to the continuing violence, agitation and disturbances at the interfaces in Belfast, Londonderry and elsewhere. Those of us who represent constituencies that contain interfaces—my constituency probably contains more of them than any other in the Province—are only too well aware of the role played by people in the provisional republican movement and other paramilitaries in continuing to keep tensions extremely high, in exacerbating violence, in stirring sectarian fears and in exploiting and manipulating situations on the ground.

Many people on this side of the Irish sea may regard those activities as trivial by comparison with the violence over the past three decades in Northern Ireland. However, the people who live in communities that contain interfaces—in my constituency, Tigers Bay, Glenbryn, the White City, Twaddell avenue and other areas that I could mention—are suffering continually because of the ongoing violence, threats and attacks against them. Yes, such attacks are not one-sided, but their weight is directed against the Protestant and Unionist community. One has only to visit those areas to see vacant houses and dereliction because Protestant and Unionist families have been forced out as a result of the activities of republicans and paramilitary organisations from that side. We therefore believe that the legislation should be extended beyond the deadline that the Minister suggests.

The other reason for doing so is that these organisations are deeply involved in criminality, as well as terrorist activities at a number of levels. I will not rehearse all the various examples of that criminality, but one need only look at the report by the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee which cited the involvement of paramilitaries in drug dealing, fuel laundering and so on. The extent of that involvement in criminality means that it will not be got rid of quickly or easily. It beggars belief that anyone could think that it will all have disappeared in 18 months' time. It will not, and that is very clear even from the standpoint of today.

We have seen the strenuous efforts that have gone into tracking down those involved in the Northern bank robbery that took place last December. The IRA was clearly involved—that is the settled view of the Chief Constable and authorities on both sides of the border. Imagine what would happen if, after the legislation has left the statute book, the police are able to gather evidence and bring people to court to face charges. Is the Minister seriously telling us that a trial in the case of the Northern bank robbery, for instance, could be run before a judge and jury in the normal way without any fear of intimidation or harassment of jurors? That does not square with the facts. The McCartney family are currently the subjects of intimidation, with witnesses being threatened and the family having to move out of Short Strand because of intimidation and threats. Last week, a friend of the family said that they had been threatened by the Provisional IRA. At some point in the future, charges may be brought against individuals for their involvement in that crime or for covering it up. Is the Minister seriously telling us if that happens after July 2007 such a case could be run in a normal court with a judge and jury? Intimidation is already taking place and threats are being issued. The Minister suggests that that would not happen in the context of a jury trial, but of course it would. That is why we find it hard to understand why he and the Government are so set on a cut-off date that has no basis in logic or fact and is wildly optimistic.

The Minister tells us that we should be reassured by the fact that if we reach that point in time and it is felt that the legislation is still necessary, the Government would have no hesitation in coming to the House to propose that it should continue. He would presumably base that on the recommendation of the Chief Constable, primarily, and on other security advice. Having listened to what the Minister said about that, I am not reassured by one iota. Our belief in the Government's willingness to take on board the Chief Constable's security advice was gravely undermined over the summer by the atrocious behaviour of the Secretary of State, who was prepared to re-imprison one Sean Kelly on the basis of the Chief Constable's recommendation that he was involved in terrorism and acts of violence, and yet released him six weeks later, against the Chief Constable's explicit advice, because Sinn Fein was demanding it as the price of its statement the very next day.

What confidence does it give the people whom I represent and the people of Northern Ireland generally if the Under-Secretary claims that he will take police advice and listen to the Chief Constable, when evidence from the summer shows a clear decision by the Government to reject the Chief Constable's advice when it came to a choice between protecting the people in my constituency and appeasing Sinn Fein? For those hon. Members who do not know, Sean Kelly is a mass murderer—a child killer who murdered nine people on the Shankill road in 1992.

Apart from the atrocious Bill to allow an amnesty for IRA terrorists, one reason for the grave lack of confidence in the Unionist community is the feeling that everything is done to make concessions to the Sinn Fein-IRA movement and that normal processes are put to one side. That is clearly shown by the case of Sean Kelly and one of the reasons why we can take no assurance from the Under-Secretary's comments today.

[Mr. Dodds]

I conclude by reinforcing the point that has already been made about the contradictions in the Government's approach. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) spoke about the difference between the approach to terrorism in Northern Ireland and that to terrorism internationally. Whatever the merits of that argument, there has been a different approach to different terrorists even within Northern Ireland. Some terrorist organisations and groups are regarded as the good terrorists and others are regarded as the bad terrorists. Ministers hailed and praised those who signed up to the Belfast agreement as unsung heroes of the peace process, only for them to be rearrested and flung back into jail a couple of month later for being up to their necks in violence and all sorts of terrorist activities. The Government have applied a clear double standard to terrorism even within Northern Ireland.

However, as several hon. Members have pointed out, the most glaring contradiction in the Government's approach is shown by their caution towards the Bill and insistence on retaining the provisions for 18 months because they are not convinced that the time is right to remove them, and their introduction last week of the most appalling Bill that has been presented to the House in recent years. The latter measure will give an amnesty to IRA terrorists and others. The Government also want to reinstate allowances and money for Sinn Fein-IRA and other groups.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman is conscious that he is straying a little. I think that he said that he was about to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Dodds: The point has been made and the Under-Secretary will note what I have said. In his response, I hope that he will take on board my point about the Chief Constable and the fact that people are not convinced by the Government's claim that they will follow what he says on the matter.

5.58 pm

Dr. McCrea: I join my hon. Friends and other hon. Members in commending the Minister for the gracious manner in which he has treated the debate. Although we do not agree with his summary of the facts, we have exchanged our opinions. We trust that, even yet, we may get further helpful statements from him in the closing moments of the debate.

The debate was helpful because something remarkable occurred. In the middle of it, the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) confessed to having sought to lead my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) astray. The hon. Gentleman stood up and acknowledged what he had done. For years in Northern Ireland, we have been trying to get those who have committed vile atrocities and done wrong to the people of Northern Ireland to admit to what they have done. We have been trying to get them to confess their actions, repent of their deeds and crimes and take responsibility for them. But of course, that is the very opposite of what the Government are demanding of people.

We have seen this happening over the years. For years, members of Sinn Fein-IRA have been responsible for some of the most vile deeds against humanity, yet they will not acknowledge those deeds; they will not confess or repent, or take the democratic path in the fullest possible sense.

Lembit Öpik: While I certainly took full responsibility for attempting to lead the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) astray, I did not say that I was sorry for trying.

Dr. McCrea: The first stage of repentance is acknowledgement. It is a step in the right direction if someone at least admits that they have done wrong. We can then lead them further down that road.

The Bill is an acknowledgement that there is a terrorist problem: it is called the Terrorism (Northern Ireland) Bill. We are acknowledging the fact that there is still terrorism in Northern Ireland. Many hon. Members have recognised the wisdom of exercising caution, prudence and due care when considering the situation in Northern Ireland, but there is confusion in the Government's position. They try to emphasise the normality—which, of course, they say originated in the Belfast agreement—and the fact that we have moved forward.

The Minister tried to illustrate that normality by noting the vast difference between the 1972 statistics and those of today. Those of us who lived through 1972, 1973 and beyond know that there is a difference, but I would say to the Minister that, when we consider the impact of a terrorist act on any family, even one incident is an incident too many. We must never acknowledge that there is an "acceptable level of violence", to use a phrase coined by a Member of Parliament many years ago. I do not believe that there is an acceptable level of terrorism in a democracy. We are far from normality in Northern Ireland. I tried to outline earlier just how far from normality we were. We do not have as many shootings now, but there is still intimidation, and terrorist activities take place day after day.

The Minister acknowledged that section 108 would be needed for the foreseeable future and must be kept. He tried to corner the Liberal Democrats on that point, using Omagh as an illustration. I have to say to him that it is very dangerous to use Omagh in that way. I represented that constituency at that time, as the former Member for Mid-Ulster. Omagh was in the old Mid-Ulster constituency. The Minister must remember that Enniskillen was equally as important as Omagh. Teebane and La Mon were equally as tragic as Omagh. So let us not choose one terrorist activity as an example because it happened to be outside the Provisional IRA's activity. Let us remember that all those other deeds were carried out by the Provisional IRA. I remember well how Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness had the audacity to come out and condemn the Omagh atrocity, when they and their colleagues were up to their necks in blood from Teebane, La Mon, Enniskillen and many other atrocities over the past 30 years. We must be careful when we try to corner some Members in trying to identify one incident and not looking at the overall picture.

The Minister said that he would give an affirmative to a future Secretary of State having pre-legislative scrutiny in the Northern Ireland Committee over Diplock-type courts. I am not sure whether the Minister has the power to commit any Secretary of State to that. Surely Secretaries of State will make the decision. We know how they can change and how their minds can change. For example, I remember previous Secretaries of State telling us that no stone would be left unturned in following the terrorists who murdered the people of Enniskillen. I can remember them coming to the House and saying that the terrorists would be hounded down until they were found and that there would be no safe haven for them. We were told that they would face the full rigours of the law. Last week, however, the Secretary of State told us how those very same persons would escape justice and the full rigour of the law. The Minister should be extremely careful about what he tries to tie another Secretary of State to. I suggest that he does not have the necessary power. We hope, however, that he is able to do so, but I am not so sure whether that is a reality. It may sound good if he is trying to suggest that he will be the next Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and wants to tie himself to such a commitment.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend speaks with a huge amount of understanding on these issues. Does he agree with me that what he has just said illustrates the complete and total illogicality of saying that one lot of terrorism is somehow all right, but that if it happens after a certain date, it is wicked, evil and terrible as it has killed people and destroyed lives, and therefore we must condemn it? If that terrorism takes place before that date, should other rules apply to it?

Dr. McCrea: Terrorism is terrorism is terrorism. There can be no justification for seeing someone now as a good terrorist. There are those who try to put members of Sinn Fein-IRA into that category, as well as other evil terrorists. Terrorism is an evil upon society and must be condemned.

The Minister must be careful in over-emphasising the statement from the Provisional IRA. We have heard and lived with such statements. New dawns have been heralded, and they can be over-played. I acknowledge that there was a major act of decommissioning. However, I do not believe that all of the terrorist weapons of the Provisional IRA have been decommissioned. There are two different situations. No Member of this place could put their hand on their heart and say that they know beyond a shadow of a doubt that all the Provisional IRA's weapons have been decommissioned. The Minister should be careful not to over-play the statement that has been made. We have heard the same statement for years.

Do not expect any member of the Democratic Unionist party to praise any statement emanating from Sinn Fein-IRA because they have stopped murdering people or because they say that they have stopped killing people. They should never have started in the first place. We need to be careful. The Bill is dealing with ongoing terrorism. There is an acknowledgement that it is necessary to continue the legislation until 2008, and the Government will not accept the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) to extend that period to 2012. The Minister, however, is not accepting the reality. The IRA is still a well oiled paramilitary organisation, which is up to the neck in criminal activity. Let us remember that such criminal activity, whether oil smuggling along the border or bank robberies, involves the use and threat of the gun, and it is still going on. Let us not give the impression that the Provisional IRA has somehow never shown the gun since the day that that statement was made by P. O'Neill, because it is not true. It is far from the truth, and it is not the reality.

The explanatory notes mention the taking down of border posts. Along the border, there are many isolated unionist families who are very concerned and worried that they have been left at the mercy of the Provisional IRA and of those who intimidate them. Let us remember that there was a policy of genocide along the border. In the Castlederg area of the Mid-Ulster constituency, there has certainly been a policy of genocide, whereby the only sons of Protestant farming families have been killed, which has moved the border back in reality because there is no son to carry on such farms. When farms come up for sale, the republicans are able to move into more territory, which was their intention. There is therefore a feeling of constant threat, so we need a continuation of the Bill beyond the date suggested by the Minister.

Criminality is engrained in republicanism. Republicans have been engaging in it for years, and it seems that in some family circles it has been going on for centuries. It is endemic within the republican community, which has not given it up. I assure the Minister that the police will find it very difficult to get republicans to move away from that criminality.

My final appeal to the Minister is to think carefully about a closure date for this legislation. When there is peace, true stability and true reconciliation in Northern Ireland, with no more threat of violence from terrorist groups, we will not need this legislation. We long for that day and we hope that it will be soon, but I believe that the Minister's thinking is premature.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I have listened to many points raised today by my hon. Friends. I think that I can safely say that no one would like to see normality in Northern Ireland more than I would.

Four members of my family were murdered at the hands of terrorism. The first one who was murdered was a police officer—he was shot outside Coalisland barracks, and he was in the Royal hospital in Belfast and South Tyrone hospital for 22 years. My other family member was shot outside Coalisland as he made his way to work one Sunday afternoon. We received a phone call at 4 o'clock on the afternoon of his funeral to tell us that another family member had been shot outside the village of Moy in County Tyrone. Some time after that, I got another phone call to tell me that a family member of 40 years of age, to whom I was very close, had been shot in Irish street in Dungannon. He was seven years out of the security forces. I was in the hospital when he bled to death.

No one would want to see normality more than I would, but I must say to the Minister today that we are a long, long way off that. I could not convince my family members that Sinn Fein-IRA had gone away. We have heard today that Martin McGuinness has said that the structures of the Provisional IRA will not be taken down. What message does that send to the law-abiding citizens of Northern Ireland in both sections of the community who want to move on? It sends a very, very negative message.

I have received several security briefings recently. I received one only last Friday. Perhaps the Minister will confirm what it said—that there has been a dramatic recruitment drive by the Continuity IRA and, to a lesser extent, the Real IRA throughout Northern Ireland. There has certainly been a dramatic increase in my constituency, targeting those aged between 18 and 20. If the Government are so confident that by 2007 we shall all be linking arms and running around with daisy chains around our necks, singing all the peace songs that were sung in the '60s, I am very confused. If the Provisional IRA and all the sister organisations of the republican movement are going into peace mode, why are they recruiting and why are they still targeting the security forces?

As I have said in the House before, numerous members of the Prison Service, the PSNI and the Royal Irish Regiment have been with me in my office, confirming that they have been and are being targeted by the republican movement and want to be moved from their homes. In view of the confidence boost that the Government have somehow obtained, can the Minister please explain why the republican movement is still recruiting? There have been four attempted bombings in my constituency alone over the past few months.

The Minister may already know the facts that I have revealed about recruitment by the republican movement. Will he please tell us whether what I have said is fact or fiction?

Mr. Woodward: By leave of the House, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to respond to a number of points during what I think we would all agree has been a powerful debate that deserves a response from the Government.

I thank all Members for their constructive approach in both amendments and speeches. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) for his enthusiastic support for the Secretary of State's offer of pre-legislative scrutiny by the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee of our proposals for dealing with the Diplock issues. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) that organised crime is now probably the most significant long-term threat. There are a number of measures to deal with it, many—indeed, most—of which are not in this Bill but in other legislation. There are also the powers vested in other bodies, such as the Assets Recovery Agency.

I thank the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) for his generous remarks. I understand his concerns about the on-the-runs legislation. Although I think that they need a response, I am conscious that were I to respond I should be guilty of preying on your tolerance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you have already handed out one or two yellow cards to the hon. Gentleman this afternoon, I have no wish to incur a third. Suffice it to say that I believe that the hon. Gentleman has raised significant points that need to be discussed. There will be an opportunity to debate them, and I will certainly discuss them with the Secretary of State, who may wish to write to reassure the hon. Gentleman on certain issues that he raised this afternoon.

The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) took us through a veritable sweet shop of fudge, jelly babies and other things. He nevertheless raised some very important points about normalisation, as did the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson). Normalisation is a goal. We do not believe that we have arrived at normalisation at the moment. It is a goal that will be achieved through an enabling environment and we believe that legislation is part of that environment, but we are introducing the Bill because we have not yet arrived at a state of normalisation. We are still very much in the transitionary period of creating an enabling environment. It is precisely because of the continuing threat—albeit one that is, I believe, significantly lower—that we none the less have to review and renew the legislative provisions. There is evidence to believe that the threat is declining. That is why it is realistic to work towards a deadline of 2007, but the Bill contains provisions to push us on to 2008.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) rightly said—I agree with him—that those elected in Northern Ireland should be taking the decisions. I think that everyone in the House would agree with him and we look forward to him taking up his position in a power-sharing Executive to take those decisions. Then, he will be able to carry those responsibilities forward. We look forward to that moment, but I think that he would agree that it has not yet arrived. Decisions need to be taken and that is why we are taking them this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East also raised the issue of unintended consequences. We firmly require an end to paramilitary activity and criminality and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said unequivocally that there will be zero tolerance of that. However, the Bill must be viewed as part of a process.

Lembit Öpik: Does that mean that any breach of legal behaviour or any indication of organised crime would constitute a breach of the ceasefire? Surely that is the only way in which zero tolerance can be applied.

Mr. Woodward: Zero tolerance means zero tolerance, but as the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge, if we want to make progress these things have to be looked at in the round.

Lembit Öpik rose—

Mr. Woodward: I will give way in a few moments.

We do not believe that being optimistic, which is based on evidence, is incompatible with being cautious. That is why we are renewing the legislation. We think that we should hold out until the standards are reached—and the standard is based, and will be based, on security advice given to the Secretary of State by his security officials, including the Chief Constable.

Lembit Öpik: I am slightly confused. The Minister says that the Government intend to enforce zero tolerance of criminal behaviour. Then, under pressure, he says that it must be taken account of in the round, which does not sound like zero tolerance to me. The irony is that I can see a case for not enforcing zero tolerance, but once again the Government seem to be saying two different things—they say zero tolerance in the Chamber, but they say nothing of the sort in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Woodward: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is confused, but I disagree with him entirely. The Secretary of State has made it absolutely clear that there will be zero tolerance of paramilitary activity and criminality, which requires an end to them.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) was right to recognise that no one is happy about introducing the Bill. There is no happiness in having to introduce any prevention of terrorism legislation because of the obvious reason for having to do so. The hon. Gentleman was also right to recognise that it is nevertheless necessary to do so—and the Government firmly believe that it is.

The hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) echoed that point. There is no disagreement over whether a threat still exists—we believe that there is still a threat—the disagreement is over our degree of optimism that normalisation can be achieved by 2007. We of course empathise with the threats still experienced by Northern Ireland Members and their constituents. Again, our difference is not in understanding them, but in the degree to which, and the cautious speed with which, we believe it is now possible to make progress on security issues.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for East Antrim took us back to section 108. He is absolutely right to expand the frame of reference beyond Omagh, and I entirely agree with him. He is also absolutely right to underline the fact—as I did earlier—that a single incident of terrorism is one too many, and that there should never be acceptance or tolerance of terrorism, wherever it takes place.

That takes me back to the need for this Bill and its provisions. It is about judgment, just as section 108 is about judgment. Perhaps section 108 will never be used. We know that it was enacted against the tragic background of Omagh, and that those dealing with the cases currently under review may wish to use it, even though those cases are not directly related to Omagh. That was the simple point that I explained to the hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt). At the moment, we are being asked to keep section 108 by those who may use it, and we respect that. However, when this legislation can fall—as I hope it can—because we have achieved normalisation through the enabling environment, it will go. That will be a good moment, if it is the right moment.

I hear what was said about pre-legislative scrutiny, the Secretary of State and the binding of future Secretaries of State, but I remind Members with a little humility that the letter written today by the Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Select Committee was concerned with examining proposals in the coming months of next year. The Secretary of State believes, with reasonable justification, that he will still be in post when that moment comes.

Everybody will have yet again been moved by the speech made by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson). The personal stories that he told are unimaginable for those of us who have not lived personally through those tragedies and that history. Of course, because of his experience all Members should take on board his caution. All will appreciate his desire for normalisation precisely because of those four awful, tragic and appalling stories. It is not appropriate, however, for me to comment on the security and intelligence reports on the Continuity IRA, except to say this—I want to reassure the hon. Gentleman, his colleagues and all Members that the security of the people of Northern Ireland is absolutely first on our list and we will not play fast and loose with it. That is why we are introducing these proposals today. We do so not because we want to, but because we recognise that the threat is still there. For the very foreseeable future, we still feel the need to have this legislation in place.

People in Northern Ireland have made huge progress in the past few years. There is more to make and, regrettably, not enough has been made to dispense with this legislation. However, enough has been made to hope, in passing this Bill today, that it will be possible for us to say by 2007 that we no longer need special provisions to deal with terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

PETITION

IsItFair Campaign

6.29 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I wish to present a petition in the name of my constituent, Mr. Yates of Rodden road, Frome, and many other constituents. It is couched in terms that are familiar to the House, as similar petitions have been raised in other constituencies. I entirely concur with the terms of the petition, which talks about the iniquities and unfairness of the council tax, especially for people on fixed incomes, and for pensioners in particular. It also mentions the upward pressure on council tax bills caused by the policies of central Government, rather than local government. It says that there is a need to scrap council tax and replace it with a fair tax based on the ability to pay.

The petition states:

The Petition of the IsItFair Council Tax protest campaign

Declares that the year-on-year, inflation-busting increases in Council Tax are causing hardship to many and take no account of ability to pay: further that the proposed property revaluation and rebanding exercise will make an already flawed system even worse.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons votes to replace Council Tax with a fair and equitable tax that, without recourse to any supplementary benefit, takes into account ability to pay from disposable income, such tax to be based on a system that is free from any geographically or politically motivated discrimination, and that clearly identifies the fiscal and managerial responsibilities of all involved parties.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

I concur, and I am very happy to present the petition to the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Television Reception (Wales)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham]

6.31 pm

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Thank you, Mr Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to raise on the Floor of the House the important matter of television reception in Wales.

There is no doubt that broadcasting is going through a revolution that is allowing more people to access more information and offering more choices. Arguably, the most important of all is the digital revolution in radio and television that is already well under way. Wales will be one of the first to switch off its analogue transmitters in 2009, and by 2012 the UK as a whole will be one of Europe's leading modern broadcasting nations.

This debate, however, is not about the benefits of digitalisation, but about how those benefits can be accessed by all. The success of any nation calling itself modern can be measured only by how it can help those in society who need assistance. More than 30 years ago, the Government commissioned a report into broadcasting coverage in the UK. The Crawford report's findings in 1974 still resonate, 30 years on. It stated that "the numbers of people unable to receive public service broadcasting are by no means negligible".

Today, 1.5 per cent of the UK population, or just under a million people, do not have television reception of acceptable quality, or even any reception at all. In Wales, that amounts to some 36,000 households. We must be clear about the matter: if the topography of Wales and its hilly landscapes prevent 36,000 households from getting TV reception, those same conditions also prevent 36,000 people from getting the mobile phone, radio or broadband signals on which so many of us rely to stay in touch with each other and the world around us. That is particularly important, given the recent general election and the forthcoming National Assembly elections. The electoral process involves people accessing information, and more people depend on television to follow politics than on any other medium. There is a public service obligation, but many people are unable to access the information they need.

My question to the Minister is: why are we not using the unique opportunity of digital switchover to secure universal coverage, in Wales and further afield? The dispiriting fact so far is that the expectation of digitalisation is merely to achieve parity of cover with analogue.

Digital switchover has opened up a debate that successive Governments have ignored for over 30 years—how we can ensure that everyone in the country gets adequate television reception. The Minister will not need reminding of the Labour manifesto commitment to "achieve digital switchover between 2008 and 2012, ensuring universal access to high-quality"— and this debate is concerned with the quality of transmission—

"free-to-view and subscription digital TV."

Universal access is non-negotiable and the Government have an obligation to honour their manifesto commitment. I look forward to hearing from the Minister what targets he suggests setting to tackle the problem of the outstanding 1.5 per cent. or 36,000 people in Wales who do not get adequate television reception—or any reception at all.

There is considerable unease. One constituent of mine, a Mr. Loftus of Taliesin in the north of Ceredigion, is currently unable to access Freeview, and asks whether his local transmitter will be upgraded in time for analogue switch-off in 2009. Another constituent, Mr. Shaftoe, is concerned at the lack of public information. The 2009 date is engraved on our minds, but what is the immediate timetable? The Minister will not need reminding that switchover is only four years away.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mark Williams: The hon. Gentleman displays a keen interest in Welsh affairs and I am happy to give way.

Mr. Hollobone: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. I represent a constituency in Northamptonshire that will be in one of the last tranches for digital switchover. Does he think that it is a good thing or a bad thing for Wales to be in the initial tranche?

Mark Williams: It is certainly unusual for Wales to be in the first tranche and, in that sense, I welcome it. However, as I will say later, we need the reassurance that the mechanisms are in place for digitalisation. If he will forgive me, I will not delve into the details of his constituency, but stay on the right side of Offa's dyke.

I appreciate the work that Digital UK has undertaken, especially its work with retailers, providing the information and staff training necessary to reassure customers. However, Digital UK is only six months old, and there is much to do. Without being alarmist, we surely need to be upping the stakes in terms of public education on the switchover.

In the past, the excuses have included lack of funding, and there are two community-funded transmitters in my constituency. Local communities had to find the £50,000 to have the transmitters in Ystumtuen and Bronnant in Ceredigion. More recent excuses have been that the technology did not exist to solve the problems of television reception, but that is not a valid excuse today. Although satellite television is by no means a panacea, it will enable most people who do not have reception today because of Welsh topography to get reception. Since the welcome announcement of a BBC and ITV Freesat in September this year, it will be much easier for the Government to avoid the sort of competition issues that promoting a Sky satellite package as the solution would have raised.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that lack of access to television signals coincides geographically with low wages in rural and deep rural communities and the most Welsh-speaking areas? Should not that concern the Government?

Mark Williams: As the Member of Parliament for a constituency in which the majority of people speak

Welsh as their first language, that is an issue of concern. I shall come to the issue of low incomes later in my speech, but the ability of constituents to access such services means that the Minister should look carefully at Welsh language provision.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Like my hon. Friend, I represent a constituency in which people have difficulty with television reception, and some communities have banded together to enhance the signal. However, when some people take advantage of satellite reception, the community spirit breaks down because they no longer want to be involved. It is therefore the poorest people in the community who suffer because they cannot afford satellite equipment.

Mark Williams: I thank my hon. Friend, who makes a valid point. I shall return to the issue of low income and some of the financial implications later.

If nothing has yet been done about TV reception, it has nothing to do with technology; it may be more to do with a lack of will. Over and above anything else, I seek from the Minister today a firm commitment that something will be done to remedy the inadequacies of the past three decades. If technology is not the problem, perhaps the Minister will allow me to share my thoughts—perhaps naïve ones—about how the difficulties could be tackled.

Ofcom's report published in August 2004, "Vulnerable Consumers in Switchover—Who Are They And Where Do They Live?", recognised that people living in low population density areas were less likely to receive TV reception and earmarked them as vulnerable groups. That may address the point made by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams). Will the Government take Ofcom's recommendations on board and broaden the eligibility criteria, to ensure that people living in rural areas who might just miss the criteria for low income, and the elderly and disabled, have the chance to access that new technology, perhaps involving some form of modulation in proportion to their income?

I applaud the support scheme that the Government have announced, as far as it goes, and its provision for helping with installation of equipment and for follow-up support for people with significant disabilities, and people aged 75 years and older—an important issue that relates to the point made by the hon. Member for Caernarfon about the Welsh language. In a written answer of 22 November to the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), the Minister mentioned such a support scheme. When will the details be forthcoming? Definite details would reassure many people and meet many of the anxieties they are experiencing.

Through what mechanisms do the Government envisage support being made available to the elderly and disabled, and those on low incomes? Will they make use of existing structures to assess those in need and to dispense help? There is already a network of Ofcom engineers—albeit not many—who travel the length and breadth of Wales investigating interference problems with TV reception. It would take only a slight broadening of the remit of Ofcom's current powers to enable its expert engineers to hold the deciding vote over whether a satellite was the only way to proceed in a reception blackspot. Ofcom would of course require additional funding to meet that extra function. In some ways, its engineers are already performing that duty, as the interference problems with which they have to deal are due to topography. Armed with an official Ofcom certificate, the individual could take a claim to the local authority and access practical financial aid to upgrade the satellite.

We are still in the dark about how and when the Government will dispense the help they have promised to the elderly, the disabled and those on low incomes, but it is obviously not too late to make plans to help those who are media poor. We know that the BBC will have to contribute £400 million to aid the most vulnerable to make the leap to digital, but what estimates has the Department for Culture, Media and Sport made of how much it would cost to solve the problem faced by the 36,000 households I mentioned—1.5 million UK-wide? Our estimates, using Government figures, suggest that it would cost the DCMS between £720,000 and £7 million to get those 36,000 households in Wales connected once and for all.

I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say. He has shown much interest in the matter in the past. He met a delegation that included my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), the hon. Member for Caernarfon and me and was receptive to our message. Like others, I feel strongly that small percentages should not disguise the fact that for many people, particularly those clustered in rural areas, things that the rest of us take for granted are not readily available. It is on their behalf that I ask the Minister to respond positively.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) on securing the debate. I also thank the Minister for allowing me to make a short contribution.

The crucial point for a place such as Montgomeryshire, which neighbours Ceredigion, is that although we may be living in the sticks, we should not be rubbing sticks together when it comes to technology. Our idea of a good night in is not Sian using the old spinning mill, me chopping wood in the back yard, and talking about the good old days. Sometimes we would actually like to watch television. Television is not only for entertainment, because it increasingly provides a range of other important facilities without which one is effectively excluded from important cultural and information-based elements of modern life.

People from the beautiful town of Machynlleth have an extraordinary ability to win pub quizzes. When I asked them why they did so well, they said, "Well, it's basically because the television reception is so poor that we've got nothing else to do than read." One could argue that that is a benefit, but it also means that they are excluded from certain media outlets, as my hon. Friend said. On a practical point, they are reduced to receiving the programming that happens to make its way into the valley. For example, they might not be able to receive Welsh regional television coverage and instead have to depend on the midlands' programmes. Such a situation necessarily causes a serious problem in Wales.

[Lembit Öpik]

I would like to watch the programmes that it is possible to watch in the midlands and larger towns. I would like to watch Sian Lloyd doing the excellent weather forecasts on ITV or "I'm a Celebrity Get Me Out of Here!"—I declare an interest of a most personal nature. However, thanks to the hills, every time I watch her weather forecasts, they are full of snow. When analogue is switched off, it is likely that a proportion of my constituents will lose access to some of those programmes completely.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, modern technology can solve all those problems, but we need initiative from the Government. Television is about more than entertainment—it is about information. It is about not only soap operas, but ensuring that parts of Wales are not unclassified roads compared with the information super-highway, which dominates much of modern business and culture.

The Minister has been receptive to our points and positive about the problems that have been highlighted. Nevertheless, I hope that he can give us some specifics about what the Government can do to resolve the situation. We are asking not for tomorrow's world, but simply that Wales is not left out. As things stand, however, a proportion of residents in Wales, through no fault of their own, will continue to regard the television reception problem as the weakest link.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): With the Minister's permission, I will make a short contribution. I thank him for receiving the delegation of my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) and the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams). However, the problem does not go away and our constituents refer to it regularly.

I sometimes believe that people who live in large towns and cities think that everyone throughout the country has the same facilities and services, but that is certainly not the case. For example, in the Nedd valley in my constituency, four families will now be receiving mains electricity for the first time. That is costing each family £20,000, so they are not getting something for nothing. One of the main reasons why they have decided to make that investment is so that they can use computer equipment, which they could not do before because they did not have the assurance of a continuous electricity supply. However, people look to the Government, as well as investing themselves, so that they can receive the facilities that the rest of the country takes for granted.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), I am worried about people who live on the border of England and Wales and get their television programmes not from Wales, but from the midlands. It is not surprising that in elections, such as those for the Assembly, it is much more difficult for those people to become aware of the issues. It is also a question of language—just because someone lives on the border between England and Wales does not mean that they want to receive all their entertainment in the medium of English. Many people in that area speak Welsh as their family language and as their first language, and they would like to receive information and entertainment in Welsh. We look forward to hearing the Minister reaffirm the commitment that he made when we met him earlier this year, when he said he would do what he can to ensure that we secure equality of service throughout the country.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): May I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) on securing this debate, and on the cogent way in which he made his case? I welcome the support from everyone who spoke in our debate for the commitment to switchover, which was universally welcomed. Rather than express opposition to the concept itself, Members were concerned that digital access will not extend far enough. The fact that Wales is one of the first two regions to go down that route was welcomed. Wales leads the world in the amount of digital TV that it receives, as 70 per cent. of households have digital TV sets—no other nation has such a high a percentage. There is therefore a genuine opportunity for Wales and the border region, when they go first in 2008, to secure leading-edge advantages for the local economy. I encourage hon. Members to work with the regional development agency, local authorities and the Welsh Assembly to make sure that Wales capitalises on that economic opportunity.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the digital switchover in September this year. As the hon. Member for Ceredigion said, that announcement confirmed that HTV Wales would be switched off in 2009. We decided that Wales should be one of the first to switch over because 43 per cent. of homes in Wales—nearly double the national average of 25 per cent.—cannot gain access to digital terrestrial television. We receive hundreds of letters every month from the constituents of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House complaining about the fact that they cannot gain access to digital terrestrial television. Without the digital switchover we could not respond to those concerns, because we would be unable to extend digital coverage.

Of course, many people prefer to receive their digital TV via satellite, cable or, in some areas, via broadband. In Wales, many viewers have already opted for satellite services. Some have done so specifically to resolve longstanding reception difficulties, including the lack of availability of Channel 4 on analogue in Wales, and to receive new digital services. For many other people, however, digital TV through an aerial is still the cheapest and most convenient option, which is why we are committed to extending the service.

Extending digital terrestrial in Wales is particularly challenging. Terrestrial reception requires a line of sight to a transmitter, but the hills and valleys in much of Wales make that difficult to achieve with ground-based transmitters. The solution adopted during the 1960s and 1970s was to build a network of relay transmitters to boost coverage, and there are more than 200 relay transmitters in Wales—a far higher number than in any other TV region. It would be fantastic to extend digital TV coverage without switching off analogue, but we are unable to do so. Only by removing analogue from the equation can we enable the digital network to be replanned and allow digital transmissions to use frequencies that are cleared internationally for high-powered use. That will be a huge amount of work. Removing analogue will create space for the network of 1,154 transmitters, including those small relay stations, to be upgraded.

This means that at switchover the same proportion of homes as can currently receive analogue services—that is, 98.5 per cent. of homes—will be able to receive channels on the three public service multiplexes. We have been clear that that is our commitment to universal coverage ever since Chris Smith laid down those criteria when he announced the Government's commitment in principle to digital switchover.

We recognise that for the 1.5 per cent. of homes that have no access to services, the figure of 98.5 per cent. offers no comfort. Even if it is a small number of households relative to the whole country, it is still extremely frustrating for people who do not have reception. Being able to play pub quizzes may be a compensating advantage, but it does not make up for being unable to receive television in Machynlleth or anywhere else.

In Wales digital terrestrial coverage will increase from around 57 per cent. to match current analogue coverage, which in Wales will be 97.4 per cent. It will be slightly lower than in the rest of the country because that is the current percentage. I recognise the point that the hon. Member for Ceredigion makes. We are seized of the need to see what can be done to help the remaining 1.5 per cent. Clearly, a number of them can currently receive satellite television, but we are working with Ofcom to conduct further research to find other ways of extending digital TV to those households.

Many homes are considering installing a taller or higher spec aerial or booster. Self-help schemes have sprung up around much of the country, allowing small communities to install their own community relays at their own expense to extend analogue TV into their locations. However, over recent months some of those schemes have started to fold as more and more people tip over into getting satellite TV. That can make self-help schemes unsustainable. Nevertheless, we will continue to work with Ofcom to see what can be done through self-help schemes and other technological solutions to expand coverage to that 1.5 per cent. We are confident that the eventual coverage will be even higher than the current rate for analogue television.

The hon. Gentleman asked why we are not extending the digital terrestrial transmitter network even further. It is a matter of cost effectiveness. We have already been criticised for our plans to extend digital terrestrial coverage to the 98.5 per cent. There were representations to the Culture, Media and Sport Committee recently, to the effect that instead of expanding digital terrestrial, we should rely on satellite for the last 10 or 20 per cent. The hon. Gentleman would probably agree that that would be of little comfort to his constituents, particularly those who are unable to receive satellite television because of proximate hills or buildings. Because of that concern, we have committed to go to 98.5 per cent., but to go further would, we believe—and Ofcom shares that belief—mean investing in transmission facilities which could not be justified on cost-effective grounds. That is why we are exploring other solutions such as satellite and self-help schemes, and even piloting the use of electricity wires to distribute television.

On the point made by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), we discussed that during the session on the issue. Of course it is frustrating for people who want to access Welsh services if they can get only English-language services. It is a difficult issue to resolve, as the mountains in the area shield those households from the Welsh transmitters. The Welsh services are available on satellite, which, as the hon. Member for Ceredigion rightly says, can already be accessed free from Sky, and the BBC and ITV are planning a freesat service, which we hope will help.

We will continue to look into the matter, and I am happy to write to the hon. Gentleman to see whether there have been any new developments. That is the answer that I can give him with regard to the 1.5 per cent.—the important minority of people who cannot get access to analogue television. We are confident that we will be able to provide access to more people. I cannot guarantee that we will be able to provide digital terrestrial access to everybody, but we are working with Ofcom and we will be happy to continue to work with the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues on seeing what we can do to provide further coverage.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

James Purnell: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that preparations for digital switchover are extremely important and, like him, we have great confidence in the work that Digital UK is doing to ensure that there is full awareness of the switchover process. He will be happy to know that Digital UK has already started to advertise, both regionally and nationally. It is being very competently led by Ford Ennals and his team, and we have great confidence in their ability to carry out that task. He may be interested to know that Digital UK is planning to start its regional campaign in Wales in the first half of 2006, so that is imminent and I hope that that will reassure him that we are focusing on trying to ensure that his constituents are aware of the switchover date.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the targeted help schemes. We had to make some trade-offs when we were making the decision about whom to include within the help scheme. It is important to understand that our starting point for that is not one of affordability. Based on the evidence and the research that we had, we thought that with the price of set-top boxes already falling and available for about £25, affordability would not be the key barrier to people going over to digital. We thought that the key barrier—again this was backed up by our research in Llansteffan and Ferryside—was technical understanding and people being able to obtain the new equipment, have it fitted and learn how to use it. That is why we focused on the people who our research highlighted as having the greatest technical barriers to being able to make the switch.

Mark Williams: Does the Minister also appreciate that, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) mentioned, language is an important barrier that needs to be overcome as well? The Welsh language therefore needs to be heavily borne in mind in any support that can be given to those groups.

James Purnell: That is an important point and the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that Digital UK is already well seized of it. I believe that it is developing a Welsh language scheme. It is certainly committed to providing bilingual advertising material and services, and that will apply to its phone lines as well as to its other services. Thus we are ensuring from the start that we are building bilingual services into the plans for Wales. If there are any issues where he or his colleagues feel that that is not being done sufficiently, we would obviously be happy to look into the matter.

Assistance through the targeted help scheme is focused on people who will have technical issues in making the switch to digital, and that is why we focused on people over 75 and people with severe disabilities. We are still researching the precise way in which that scheme will work. We have a trial in Bolton that is looking at the technical and logistical issues around giving people advice, making home visits, and a range of such issues that we need to resolve before we can make a robust estimate of the costs. We will be publishing those next year once we have a proper understanding of the matter. It would be inappropriate to make a forecast without enough data on which to base it.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to people who live in rural communities, and Digital UK will look at the role that local communities can play in reaching those people. We do not believe that it would be appropriate to make them a category in their own right, because we believe that a strong proportion of those people will be able to make the switch without any extra help. However, we are clear that we will not be turning anybody away. The basic level of services that Digital UK will be offering will be available to people whether they are in those two vulnerable groups or not.

Digital switchover is an extremely important policy for the future of UK television. British television is among the best in the world and that has been achieved because we have always been at the forefront of technology, whether it was the creation of the BBC, the pioneering of commercial television through ITV, the invention of Channel 4, or, more recently, satellite and cable television, or the development of mobile telephony. Our media industries have succeeded partly because instead of following technology we have decided to lead from the front and ensure that we were the first to develop new services. We believe that that will be good for consumers, for industry and for Britain, and we look forward to working with hon. Members on both sides of the House on that important project.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes past Seven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Microgeneration

1. Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): If he will make a statement on his Department's policy on encouraging the use of microgeneration in UK households. [33373]

2. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): Whether he expects there to be a surplus or shortfall of funding at the end of the clear skies programme. [33375]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): The Government already encourage microgeneration in a variety of ways. For example, there is a 5 per cent. VAT level on most microgeneration technologies. We have provided £41 million of support for solar photovoltaic projects through the major PV demonstration programme and support for field trials. There is £12.5 million of support for household and community renewable energy schemes through the clear skies initiative; and £30 million of funding for a new low carbon buildings programme. We have also amended the renewables obligation to make it easier for microgenerators to claim renewables obligations certificates.

My Department is leading the development of a cross-Government strategy for the promotion of microgeneration. This strategy will be published by next April, in accordance with our commitment under the Energy Act 2004.

In relation to clear skies, I expect that all funding will be allocated by the time the programme ends in March 2006, but projects will have a further 12 months to be completed and actually to spend the money.

Mrs. Villiers: Despite the warm words of the Secretary of State, it is still clear that the take-up of microgeneration is minimal and that the market for it is still very underdeveloped. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider, in assessing the upcoming energy review, how, if the Government decide to go down the nuclear route, they will ensure that the nuclear industry does not effectively crowd out microgeneration and make it more difficult for investment in it? In particular, if the right hon. Gentleman decides to go—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps this is a matter for an Adjournment Debate. That would seem to be appropriate.

Alan Johnson: I agree with the hon. Lady's assessment that microgeneration is underdeveloped. Some of the reasons for that will be dealt with in our strategy, which we will publish next April. Much of it is about public awareness, some of it is about problems with planning and some of it is about connection with the grid.

As for the hon. Lady's question about nuclear energy, if the energy review went down that path, I do not think that it would have any impact on the need to develop this particular area of microgeneration. Microgeneration is important in its own right, whatever we do in the rest of the energy mix.

Colin Challen: This being the season of good will and festive cheer, as well as reviews, will my right hon. Friend review the amount of money put into the low carbon building initiative, which year on year is quite a bit less than what was put into the programmes that it replaces? If my right hon. Friend is looking for somewhere to get the money, may I suggest that he dips into his Department's nuclear fusion research money, which is considerably more than that being given to the low carbon buildings initiative?

Alan Johnson: I suppose that as it is 1 December we can officially say that it is the season of good will, but it is not the season of distorting our figures—[Interruption]—as every other season of the year. My hon. Friend is wrong about this. I understand how passionately he feels about the matter, particularly photovoltaics. On average, under the low carbon buildings programme we shall be spending £9.5 million a year compared with £9.2 million average yearly spend since 2000 under the previous project. We have not diluted the amount of money that we are making available, although the use of grants is not the total picture in terms of how we can encourage greater use of microgeneration.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): From the Secretary of State's earlier responses it is obvious that he has recognised the true potential of micro-combined heat and power generation. Has he seen the recent report of the Society of British Gas Industries, which clearly shows that micro-CHP could, by 2015, generate enough power to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 1.1 million tonnes per annum? Will the right hon. Gentleman take urgent action to ensure that the right regulatory framework is in place to enable that to happen?

Alan Johnson: I have seen that report, which is an important contribution to our strategy review. That strategy review, to which we made a commitment in the Energy Act 2004, was designed specifically to address these issues. I mentioned planning as a problem earlier. The report is an important contribution to the debate, and it is an area of legitimate concern on both sides of the House. We will try to ensure that planning regulations do not inhibit the growth of combined heat and power.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his Department's strong support for two private Members' Bills seeking to enhance the use of microgeneration to an enormous extent, one of which was unfortunately blocked by a maverick climate change denier on the Opposition Benches. If that block continues, is it my right hon. Friend's intention to find Government time to complete those Bills and place them on the statute book?

Alan Johnson: I reaffirm our support for the private Member's Bill tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz). As for how we could get around any blockage, that is a subject for others, such as the usual channels.

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith is present. His Bill contains important principles, and I am sure that it will be supported by Members in all parts of the House. I hope that the person responsible for blocking its passage will remove the blockage; if he does not, we shall have to consider other ways of dealing with it.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) asked a pertinent question. It is in the Government's power to continue to pursue that Bill. Let us see whether they do so, or whether what we are hearing is just rhetoric. I do not support the action of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) in blocking the Bill.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers). We have had stop-go policies for the clear skies programme, and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has been very obstructive in regard to constructive building regulations for microgeneration and micro-CHP, although we know that those processes have enormous potential for reducing carbon dioxide emissions. Why are the Government being so half-hearted about those programmes and that potential? Does their attitude not underline the fact that their entire energy policy is in a mess—which, of course, is why the Secretary of State has to have a review?

Alan Johnson: That is nonsense on stilts. On clear skies, we have a go-go policy. There is no gap. There used to be a gap of about four months between money going out and the receiving of, and responses to, bids. In this case there will be a five-month interval—so if there can be said to be a gap, it is a gap of only a month—between the end of the clear skies programme and the start of the new programme.

The hon. Gentleman should give some advice to his right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). We shall be able to proceed with that private Member's Bill if it is not blocked by Conservative Members. I was pleased to hear what the hon. Gentleman said. Why should we delay and lose time? Why should the Government have to rethink the whole programme and go through the usual channels when a quiet word in the right hon. Gentleman's ear might allow us to proceed?

WTO Meeting

3. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Hong Kong. [33377]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): Her Majesty's Government remain committed to achieving an ambitious, pro-development outcome at the Hong Kong ministerial conference, which will allow conclusion of the Doha development agenda by the end of 2006. The draft text for the Hong Kong meeting was issued on 26 November by Pascal Lamy, the director general of the World Trade Organisation. He will consult Members further before the General Council meeting on 1 and 2 December. After that meeting, the text will be submitted for discussion by Ministers in Hong Kong.

Hugh Bayley: Despite the best efforts of Commissioner Mandelson, the European Union seems to have forgotten that this was meant to be a development round. Will our Government continue to press for overall cuts in European agriculture subsidies under the common agricultural policy?

Is my right hon. Friend aware of the World Bank's estimate that, if only 2 per cent. of tariff lines were protected as especially sensitive products, Europeans would be able to protect virtually every product that poor countries want to export to us? Yet under the EU's predatory policy, 8 per cent. fall into that category. Will the Secretary of State ask the EU to reconsider?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend has raised an important point. It is difficult not to be pessimistic about our chances of making the progress that we would like to make in Hong Kong. We should have been in a far better position.

As my hon. Friend knows, there are now 149 countries in the WTO since the recent accession of Saudi Arabia. Each country has a vote and a veto. Our role as President of the European Union is to ensure that the European Union has a coherent voice that Commissioner Mandelson can use during the negotiations. It is a difficult task, but we know where we are in the United Kingdom. I believe that there is all-party support for making this truly a development round.

My hon. Friend made a crucial point about the percentage of sensitive products. Virtually any tariff can be imposed on such products, because they are sensitive to the countries involved. It is not just the World Bank but the United Kingdom, in our trade and development White Paper last year, that said that those should be limited to 2 per cent. The American offer is 1 per cent. and the European Union offer is 7 per cent.—but, to be fair to the Commissioner, I must add that one member state was vociferously arguing for 15 per cent. Those are problems, but we have to come through them. It is no good our lecturing other member states; we have to persuade them to go down that route, so that we can achieve a proper outcome to the Doha development round.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): The Secretary of State has just highlighted the downplaying of expectations for Hong Kong, yet he will recall that the commitment at the G8 was for Hong Kong to be a success, not some later ministerial meeting next year, and for Hong Kong to set a date for ending subsidies and dumping. Having just returned from a Christian Aid funded visit to Ghana, I can say that the Government there are desperate to ensure that we end the scandal of dumping subsidised agricultural goods, which destroys their local markets. What precisely are the Government doing to achieve a decisive breakthrough in Europe, and to make the European process more transparent?

Alan Johnson: I am not accusing the hon. Gentleman of making political points, but let us put all the politicising to one side now. We have tried very hard, with all-party support, to use our presidency of the G8 and the EU to create some momentum leading up to Hong Kong. I cannot think of any initiative that we could have taken that we have not taken to try to get to that position. The G7 Finance Ministers are meeting this weekend, and at the instigation of the UK, Brazil and India will be there, so that the Finance Ministers can try to reach some solution. We were also at the Commonwealth conference last week. No stone has been left unturned as we try to get somewhere.

As for where we are now, and the important point that the hon. Gentleman raised about how we can make more progress, we have been instrumental in the production by the Commission of a development package. By and large, the G90 countries—the poorer countries—have not heard anything about their problems yet, because the negotiations have been stuck in an agricultural silo. The idea of a development package is to pick out an issue, such as cotton, or the least developed countries' right to export to all developed countries' markets free of tariffs, which already applies to the EU, but not to the United States and other developed countries. It is also to examine the issue of aid for trade, which is a subset of the WTO discussions, so that there is at least a discussion of the developing countries' agenda, rather than the continual and rather depressing concentration purely on agricultural issues.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): In that context, does my right hon. Friend agree that we also need to think about the NAMA—non-agricultural market access—side of the negotiations, and that we need to allow sufficient flexibility in any solution to those negotiations to allow the least developed countries to develop their own industrial bases?

Alan Johnson: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Commission says that if it is to have any chance of bringing the EU to a different position, not fixated on agriculture, it needs countries such as Brazil and India to start to move on industry. This is about agriculture, industry and services, but so far we have concentrated on agriculture alone. There is now a need for countries to start turning over cards—with conditional offers; they do not have to say that that is their final position—just to show European Union countries that there are huge advantages to be had. Everyone will gain from a successful conclusion; this is win, win. On industry and services there are huge gains to be made, not between developing and developed countries but among developed countries, if we open markets. My hon. Friend has raised an important point, which is crucial to the successful outcome of the round.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): Only last week we heard about another food crisis in Africa, this time in the republic of Niger. I support emergency aid and debt relief, but we have to move things on with reforms of tariff barriers and export subsidies. Will the Secretary of State ask his friends in the EU this: as the common agricultural policy has driven our farmers to near bankruptcy, made the British housewife pay more for food than she needs to and is damaging the third world, exactly who is it helping?

Alan Johnson: It would not be all that fruitful if I asked that question. The argument used in the EU is that common agricultural policy reform, in so far as it has already happened—it was a dramatic reform compared with the previous position—should be a bargaining chip at Doha. The rest of the world tends to say, "You would have done that anyway, so how can you argue for the virtue of such reform? You need to go further." I have to say that the vast majority of EU member states believe that we have gone far enough, and that it is now time for the industry to make a move; I am merely reflecting the views that we pick up on in our EU presidency role. One day there will have to be reform. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs achieved the breakthrough—at last—of a 36 per cent. cut in sugar subsidies, which have not been reformed for 40 years. So some movement has been secured there, at least, which will help us in Hong Kong.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend consider getting on to the WTO agenda a worldwide asbestos ban? He may be aware that two or three years ago, the United Nations interim chemical review committee, which is part of the environmental programme, recommended that all asbestos be restricted because of dangers to health. However, we seem not to have made progress on this issue, and the way to do so is to get it on to the WTO agenda.

Alan Johnson: I certainly will give consideration to the important issue that my hon. Friend has raised. There is an environmental dimension to this trade round—we have got nowhere near talking about it yet—just as there is a trade facilitation aspect. Because we have got bogged down in considering a particular pillar of agriculture, we have not got on to these important issues, but I will turn my mind to how we can ensure that progress has been made on asbestos by the end of this round.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the European Union's agricultural tariffs are economic nonsense and morally indefensible? Is that not the starting-point that we should adopt as we go into the next round of the trade negotiations? I was very disappointed to discover that he is so pessimistic about the outcome. Why do we not enter into the negotiations in two weeks' time committed to removing the EU's agricultural tariffs? That is the single most positive thing that we could do to help the third world. Surely our presidency of the EU should not be about neutrality and chairmanship, but leadership.

Alan Johnson: On the first question, I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman; indeed, my predecessor made that point in last year's White Paper on trade and development. We pointed out the hypocrisy of developed countries lecturing developing countries on removing their trade barriers, when we still hide behind protectionism, so we are sending out a very strong message. Developed countries have to dismantle protectionist policies and set a date—we think that it should be 2010—for the parallel elimination of all forms of export subsidy in agriculture.

On the question of negotiating a settlement, the gung-ho part of the hon. Gentleman's Havant constituency seems to have come to the fore; usually, he takes a thoughtful and reflective approach to these issues. Conservative Members will know, because their party held the EU presidency when in government, that the worst mistake that countries can make when holding the presidency is to push their own position from the presidential chair. If they do, nobody will follow them. Instead, they have to try to persuade other member states to their point of view. Lecturing the rest of Europe from the presidential chair and repeatedly telling them about the UK's position would be a disaster.

On the question of my being pessimistic, we will move mountains, as the Prime Minister said in his recent Guildhall speech. However, as I said in my first answer, the text has just been released—it should have been released last July—and it would be misleading, going into the Hong Kong meeting, to say that we are wildly optimistic. Of course, that does not mean that we should not complete this round successfully by the end of 2006. What it does mean is that we have to make a sober appraisal of where we are, and plan to ensure that this round is brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Willetts: May I press the Secretary of State on this matter? Since enlargement, a blocking minority of free-trade countries has existed in the EU. That is how the world has changed. I do not know why the EU still does things like imposing tariffs on Chinese textiles, when it should be organising the free traders. The Trade Commissioner will play a crucial role, so will the right hon. Gentleman have a word in his ear? Has the Secretary of State learned to love the commissioner yet? Will he tell him that Opposition Members could find a tiny place in our hearts for him if he went to Hong Kong committed to free trade?

Alan Johnson: There is love abounding in my heart for the Trade Commissioner, and there always has been. When it comes to his role, he must not be seen as a UK Commissioner. That is part of the problem: people who are a little paranoid about these matters see that the UK position is one of liberalisation, that the UK holds the presidency and that a UK national is Trade Commissioner. We—and the commissioner more than anyone else—must ensure that everyone has faith in our ability to operate within the EU mandate. We are committed to changing that mandate in respect of the CAP over the coming months and years. I think that it is inevitable that that regime will change, and that we have enough support to achieve that gradually. We do not have enough support to achieve it in time for Hong Kong, but I believe that we can bring the matter to a successful conclusion by the end of 2006.

Unscrupulous Lenders

4. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What steps he is taking to protect the most vulnerable and poorest members of society from unscrupulous lenders. [33378]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): The Consumer Credit Bill, which is currently before the other place, will improve the regulation and monitoring of consumer credit businesses and extend protections, rights and means of redress for consumers against unscrupulous lenders. Furthermore, the Government are funding two pilot schemes aimed at tackling loan sharks in Birmingham and Glasgow. That will enable trading standards officers to prosecute illegal lenders in those areas and gain a clearer understanding of the scope, extent and impact of illegal money lending.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Will he join me in welcoming the results of the pilot scheme in Glasgow, where prosecutions have been brought? However, he will be aware that the approach of Christmas makes the pressure on families even stronger than normal. Does he agree that credit unions can help people in need? Will he do something to lessen the amount of red tape that credit unions have to deal with?

Mr. Sutcliffe: First, may I acknowledge my hon. Friend's thanks to the loan shark pilot team in Glasgow? It is working very well, and has managed to get individuals put behind bars for the way that they treat vulnerable people. Credit unions are very important, and I am talking to Treasury colleagues about ways to reduce the administrative burdens that they face. Their work, and the new Consumer Credit Bill, will alleviate the problem and usher in a period of responsible lending and borrowing, with people at the bottom end of the scale, who have the most problems, getting the support that they need.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Given that unscrupulous lenders are spread across the UK, will the Minister speak to his ministerial colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office to ensure that those rogues are dealt with effectively in Northern Ireland as well?

Mr. Sutcliffe: It is important that we look at what is happening all over the UK, including Northern Ireland. We are acquiring much evidence and gaining new skills about how to tackle the loan shark problem. Loan sharks prey in the most horrible way on vulnerable people. We have made sure that people are able to get advice and support. Through the Office of Fair Trading licensing scheme, we are ensuring that people who lend money are reputable.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister knows that financial inclusion is one way for people to get out of the hands of unscrupulous lenders, and that the Treasury Select Committee has set up an inquiry into financial exclusion to which he will be invited in the new year. However, there is poor co-ordination between Government Departments on this matter. For instance, research information about postcodes for financial inclusion is available to the Treasury and the DTI, but not to the Select Committee. Will he work with his colleagues in the Treasury to ensure that we get that information before the inquiry begins, so that a map can be made of the areas of financial exclusion? That will enable us to tackle the problem in a more co-ordinated way.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I acknowledge the work done on this issue over a number of years by the Select Committee, of which my right hon. Friend is Chairman. I shall be happy to appear before his Committee again, as I was the last time that I did so, but I shall make sure that the information that he requires will be made available before then.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): Even at this late stage, will the Minister reconsider his refusal to include more detail in the Consumer Credit Bill about what would constitute an unfair relationship? Is he not aware that both lenders and consumer groups are calling for greater clarity? Their concern is that as the Bill stands, it will harm the interests of borrowers. Without greater detail, lenders will become more cautious in their lending, driving those on the fringe to borrow from unscrupulous lenders or loan sharks at excessive rates of interest. Is not it wholly unreasonable to expect such issues to be resolved through the courts, requiring some unfortunate borrower to take on the legal might of the financial institutions to establish what is fair and what is not?

Mr. Sutcliffe: This is an issue that the hon. Gentleman and I have discussed throughout the stages of the Consumer Credit Bill, and I am not minded to change my mind on the unfairness test. That test replaces the extortionate credit test, which did not work for consumers. The unfairness test will give the courts the opportunity to decide all relevant factors. We also have the alternative dispute resolution procedure before the court-based system. Transparency is at the heart of the Bill to ensure that lenders and consumers know what they are letting themselves in for.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): The pilot projects on loan sharks in Glasgow and Birmingham, to which my hon. Friend referred, have indeed proved successful. Glasgow city council, which is involved in the scheme with the Department, has written to me—and, no doubt, to other MPs in Scotland—pointing out that it has uncovered evidence of loan shark activity in my constituency, linked to that in Glasgow. Like the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), I urge my hon. Friend to ensure that the pilot schemes on loan sharks are rolled out throughout the country as soon as possible.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend has a good record of support for people on low incomes and encouraging financial inclusion. We will look at the outcomes of the pilots, which are already good. The Glasgow project is looking at the rest of Scotland, but we will try to roll out to the rest of the UK the experience and skills developed in those pilot schemes.

Trade with India

5. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): What steps he is taking to increase UK trade with India. [33379]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): We are working to increase trade through the Joint Economic Trade Committee and the Asia taskforce. UK Trade and Investment provides direct support to companies and we also support the Indo-British Partnership Network.

Mr. Crabb: I wish to draw the House's attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. The initiatives that the Minister outlines are important and to be welcomed, but is he aware of the real frustration and concern among many UK exporters that we are not capturing our appropriate share of the growth in India's international trade, given our shared history, linguistic ties and other potential competitive advantages? Does he agree with the director general of the British Chambers of Commerce, who said recently that there is too much focus on Europe as a trading bloc and that we must get out to where the action is?

Ian Pearson: I have no doubt that we can do more, but let us not forget the progress that has been made so far. In the first six months of this year, trade with India rose by 24 per cent. compared with the previous year. We had 49 trade missions in 2004, we have more this year and we will have still more in 2006. We are getting on with it. India and China are hugely important growth markets for the future—we should not be in any doubt about that—and I want UK companies to trade not only with those countries, but within the EU, with the United States and further afield. Exporting is fundamentally important to the future economic prosperity of the UK and the Government will do all that we can to support that industry.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): This is the first time in my life that I have seen a Government making so much effort to build relations between the UK and India. I praise the Government, from the Prime Minister down, for all the efforts that they have made.

Can my hon. Friend the Minister destroy the myth that has built up in the past few years that all the low-skilled jobs, in call centres and so on, are being shipped to India? Investment from India in this country is creating highly skilled jobs, and many highly professional, educated Indians are working—for example, in IT—and making a great contribution to this country.

Ian Pearson: I agree with my hon. Friend. Indian companies and Indian investment are very welcome in the United Kingdom. Companies like Tata Consultancy Services are doing a terrific job here. He will be interested to know that our balance of trade with India is roughly equal. In the first half of this year, our exports to India were worth about £1.84 billion and our imports were worth £1.85 billion. That shows what we have done. He is also right to point to our continuing strong links with India. The Prime Minister's visit to India and the UK/India summit, as well as the EU/India summit, were important developments. We are working very hard through JETCO and the Asia taskforce to strengthen our relations, and we will continue to do so in the future.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Does the Minister share my concern that the public debate on our trade and investment relations with India is too often characterised by threats, rather than opportunity? In that context, does he welcome the decision of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry to launch a major inquiry into our trade and investment relations with India, which I expect to identify policy initiatives that the British and Indian Governments could take to build a sustainable long-term improvement in our trading relations, for the benefit of both countries?

Ian Pearson: I can only agree with the hon. Gentleman. I very much welcome the Select Committee inquiry. India and China have the ability to transform our world. That is highly likely to happen over the next 10 to 20 years. We must see the growth of India and China as an opportunity, not as a threat, and take advantage of the trading opportunities that will accrue as a result of their rapid economic expansion. As a Government, we are very seized of that, and we are developing our policies and ensuring that we put our resources behind encouraging and supporting our companies to take advantage of those opportunities.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): The Minister will be aware that caste discrimination is a huge problem in India and that 160 million people in India suffer its consequences. Is he prepared to undertake discussions with any British company that operates or invests in India to adopt the Ambedkar principles, by which the people who are known as the scheduled castes in India would receive fair treatment, thus making our contribution to ending that appalling discrimination against so many people?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend raises an important point. We discuss those issues with the Indian Government, and we are very clear indeed about encouraging the corporate social responsibility of companies that invest in India. So I can assure him that the points that he makes are valid and taken into account in our discussions with industry and the Indian Government.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): Our trade with India is extremely important, but does the Minister agree that it must be conducted on a fair basis? Mr. Alistair Buchan, who is chairman of the Scottish Tartans Authority and Lochcarron of Scotland, based in my constituency, has highlighted websites, such as mytartan.com, which are passing off kilts and other products made in India as though they were made in Scotland. Will the hon. Gentleman look again at the regulations affecting websites and labelling to ensure that trading standards officials have the right powers to stamp out those abuses?

Ian Pearson: I am certainly happy to look at the specific situation that the hon. Gentleman mentions. We also want to sell more Scotch whisky to India, and tariffs are unacceptably high. One of the things that we want the Doha development round to achieve is not just help for the poorest countries, although that is absolutely central to our Government's policy, but we want India to reduce some of its tariff barriers, as well as a further strengthening of two-way trade with India. But I will get back to the hon. Gentleman with some answers to the specific question that he asks.

Employment Agencies

6. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What steps he is taking to enforce the regulation of employment agencies. [33380]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): The Department of Trade and Industry's employment agency standards inspectorate enforces the legislation regulating the activities of the private recruitment industry. Inspectors visit agencies' premises to examine their records. The inspectorate can prosecute an agency found to be in breach of the legislation, and the maximum fine is £5,000 for each offence. The inspectorate can also apply to an employment tribunal for an order prohibiting an individual from operating an agency or employment business for up to 10 years.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Is he aware of an organisation called Placement UK HR Ltd., which, in a booklet entitled "Half price staff: Shhhh! It's the best kept secret . . . ", proudly boasts that it can supply "graduate calibre staff" for

"Just £7000 per Annum—All in . . . No National Minimum Wage . . . No PAYE . . . No Employers N.I. Contributions . . . No Holiday Pay . . . No Sick Pay . . . No Contract of Employment . . . No problem"?

Will he look into this as a matter of urgency, because the outfit is clearly intent on trying to make a mockery of every piece of employment legislation that we have ever passed in this place?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue. Obviously, we will look into the company, which is operating illegally by not paying the national minimum wage and in the other ways that he raises. There is a change of demography in the workplace, so it is important that we monitor what happens with such agencies. There is, quite rightly, an influx of legal migrant workers into the UK through agencies, so I am keen to hear of any instances of people being exploited. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House want to ensure that no one is exploited by any agency that does not operate properly.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Is the Minister aware that there is a grey area of the law that applies to people based in this country who are recruited by employment agencies—particularly those based in Holland—to work on German construction sites, especially? They are not employed on the same terms and conditions as those working in Holland and Germany. Is the Minister prepared to examine the matter?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am happy to enter into correspondence with the hon. Lady about the case, or to see her. There is a change in demography and the way in which work operates throughout Europe, but we need to make sure that people are not exploited. I am happy to hear evidence from hon. Members about agencies that are not working properly.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The Minister referred to the exploitation that sometimes occurs when migrant workers are brought in by frankly corrupt and oppressive recruitment agencies in this country. One of the difficulties that we find when we try to regulate them is getting details from police forces in other European countries. Will he co-operate with the Home Office on pursuing the issue, to try to ensure that when the police in this country investigate such matters, they can get access to police records, especially Polish ones?

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend raises an important point. There is a cross-departmental approach on workers coming from other member states. He will be aware that a great deal of work has been done with the Portuguese and Polish embassies to try to give information to workers who might come across from those countries about their rights, which should stop them being exploited. I am happy to work with all agencies to ensure that we continue to monitor the situation.

Rural Post Offices

7. Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): If he will make a statement on the future funding of the rural post office network. [33381]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): The Government have committed up to £750 million, subject to state aid clearance, to 2008 to maintain the rural post office network.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. I am sure that he agrees that that funding represents only a fraction of the overall economic and social value of the post office network to our rural communities. I hope that he can assure the House that funding arrangements for 2008 onwards will be confirmed by the end of this financial year. Will he confirm that if they are not, the directors of Post Office Ltd. would be obliged to start the process that would lead to the closure of parts of the rural network?

Barry Gardiner: As ever, the Liberal Democrats proceed with all the economic foresight of a myopic fruit bat on these matters. Only they could see 800 rural post offices that serve fewer than five people a day, at an average loss of £6.50 a customer visit, and respond by proposing to create 500 more, as they did at their party conference. As usual, they were defeated, of course, but only because they wanted to pay for that by privatising the Royal Mail.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): In recognising the role of rural post offices, may I urge the Minister not to lose sight of the real value of urban sub-post offices, especially in areas of greatest social need?

Barry Gardiner: My hon. Friend is absolutely right that the urban deprived network is a critical aspect of delivering the Government's agenda on social inclusion. It is essential that people continue to have access to that network, which has been guaranteed through the programme of urban reinvention that the Government initiated.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): Recognising the importance of the post office network to rural and urban communities, will the Minister indicate the impact thus far of the switch to the way in which people receive their benefit and pension payments from post offices to banks?

Barry Gardiner: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised that important question, because 97 per cent. of benefit recipients now access their payments by direct payment into their bank account. It is often thought that the closures were precipitated by changes in the method of pension payments and the introduction of Post Office card accounts; in fact, they started long before the changes took place. Way back in 1999, a dramatic change had already started in the number of people who received their benefits by other means. Because of the new facilities available to them—internet banking and so on—our constituents have chosen different methods to access their own finances and the Government have responded to that. In 2000, about 70 per cent. of all benefits were paid by order book, but that proportion had already fallen to 57 per cent. by 2003, when the direct payment scheme was launched.

Businesslink

8. Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the businesslink.gov.uk website. [33382]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): Since its formal launch in May 2004, nearly 13 million user sessions to the site have been logged and the number of visitors is increasing monthly. There were 600,000 site visits in October, with a minimum of 160,000 coming from repeat visitors. More than 200,000 of those users downloaded material such as business publications, grant application forms and legislative guidance. The site receives a continual flow of positive feedback from the small business community and its significance has been recognised by a prestigious plaudit—it was named by the UN world summit awards as the UK's best business website for best e-content application.

Gordon Banks: I commend the website for the advice it offers on pay-as-you-earn, value added tax, corporation tax, health and safety and the like, but as one who comes from a small business background I urge the Minister to ensure that organisations such as Revenue and Customs, local government environmental health departments and business advice centres do more to promote the site. What does he intend to do to make sure that small businesses throughout the country are aware of the site and encouraged to use it as a partner in their business development in years to come?

Barry Gardiner: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, not only for his interest in the site but for his efforts to improve e-governance generally—a subject on which he has recently made valuable contributions in the House. Businesslink.gov is at the forefront of our e-government initiative and user numbers are hugely encouraging. We have made great strides in making business aware of the site's potential, but I welcome his comments on ensuring that it is more widely known throughout the country.

My hon. Friend talked about the way in which there should be link-up with Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs and an integrated approach. He will be interested to know that we are introducing an integrated service to enable customers to register for and access e-filing services provided by Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and Companies House. That has required a major change in the way in which the departments provide those services. It is expected to lead the way in the development of further transactional services across government.

WTO NAMA Negotiations

9. Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): If he will make a statement on the impact of the outcome of the non-agricultural market access negotiations at the World Trade Organisation on British trade and industry. [33383]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): The non-agricultural market access negotiations are an integral element of the Doha development agenda.

Martin Horwood: Does not the Minister agree that, at the request of countries such as the United States, Korea and China, one impact of the NAMA negotiations might be the curtailment as non-tariff barriers of measures such as energy saving labelling and safety testing on imported foods? Far from being a win-win situation, as the Secretary of State assured the hon. Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) it was, that might lead to the undermining of sustainability, consumer safety and consumer choice.

Ian Pearson: I assure the hon. Gentleman that nothing happening in the NAMA negotiations presents any real threat on those issues. Our aim in the negotiations is to achieve progress similar to the progress that we are now seeing in agriculture and to reduce tariffs—

Martin Horwood: There has been no progress.

Ian Pearson: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but the second European offer made by Commissioner Mandelson proposed an average tariff reduction on agricultural products of 39 per cent., which is more than was achieved in the Uruguay round. That is a serious offer. What we need now, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, is similar progress on NAMA and services, so that we can reduce tariff barriers and increase world trade in a way that will benefit both developing and developed countries.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is right to recognise that although there has been a great deal of focus on agricultural products, NAMA and services are important. Will he give us an assurance that in those discussions, the British Government will not force countries to privatise services that they do not want to privatise—that we will give a guarantee that they can decide about water and other public services in their country, and do what is in the best interests of their people?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend makes an important point, which has been raised by many non-governmental organisations. I can assure him that the UK's position is clear and has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on a number of occasions. There is nothing in the negotiations to force countries to privatise anything. What we want to see from the NAMA negotiations is a liberalisation of world trade, which would benefit developing and developed countries. That will be a priority in the negotiations.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister for Women and Equality was asked—

Gender Pay Gap

19. Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): What steps the Government are taking to close the gender pay gap in the public sector. [33393]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): Action and policy interventions include Agenda for Change, which aims to bring fairer pay to over 1 million non-medical staff in the NHS, including women. The local government pay and work force strategy addresses the causes and effects of occupational segregation on the gender pay gap. I am also pleased to say that all Government departments and agencies have completed equal pay reviews.

Jo Swinson: The Equal Pay Act was introduced 30 years ago, yet we still have an 18 per cent. gender pay gap. I should have thought that the Government would take every opportunity to address that injustice, so can the Minister tell me why, in the forthcoming Equality Bill, public bodies will be required only to have a pay policy in place, without explicitly being required in the Bill to take action to close the pay gap?

Meg Munn: The pay gap is an enormously important issue and it would be wrong to say that progress has not been made. Considerable progress has been made and the pay gap now is 17 per cent. on average, but down to 13 per cent. at the median. In the Equality Bill we are introducing a public sector duty to promote equality in various ways, including in pay. The work that will be done on pay will begin to make a difference, but it is only one aspect that we are considering. As I said, the local government pay and work force strategy addresses the causes and effects of occupational segregation, which we know is one of the main drivers of the gender pay gap.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the measures in the Equality Bill and the new commission for equality and human rights, with its main site to be based in Manchester, will help greatly in the work to close the pay gap for women in the public sector? Will she welcome the news that Salford council has just appointed a woman chief executive?

Meg Munn: I certainly welcome the news that Salford council has just appointed a chief executive who is a woman. One of the key issues about the pay gap in the public sector is not that there are not many women working in the public sector—there are. The issue is the level of responsibility that they have and their position within the organisation. We are making progress on that, but we want to see much more progress made. The Equality Bill is one measure which will deal with that. We also have the Women and Work commission, which goes much wider than the public sector and will report next month on related issues. I hope that will take us a great deal further.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Minister will be aware that one of the things the Government can do to ensure gender equality at the very top is to increase the number of women who occupy senior management posts in the civil service. The increase in the number of women in senior management posts over the past two years has been only 1.6 per cent., yet the Government have a target of increasing that number by 5 per cent. in the next three years. Can the Minister explain what measures she will use to achieve that target, and what the Prime Minister is doing to ensure that at Permanent Secretary level there is the representation of women that the country deserves?

Meg Munn: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman shares my and my party's concern that we should have more women in top positions. We should celebrate the existence of tough targets rather than fearing them. Implementing a range of measures to reach those targets is enormously important, and we expect all Departments to consider the issue. Fast-stream measures have been implemented to help talented people of both genders to move through the system. I am sure that improvements will be made very quickly and hope that I can report such progress in the future.

Women's Pension Inequality

20. Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to tackle women's pension inequality. [33394]

The Minister for Women (Tessa Jowell): Earlier this month, we published the report "Women and Pensions: The Evidence". The evidence tells us that men and women will reach the age of 65 with similar basic state pensions by 2025, when the average entitlement to a full basic state pension among both sexes will be more than 90 per cent. That is marked progress on the present situation and reflects the greater number of women in work. We will consider that evidence together, obviously, with the recommendations of Adair Turner's Pensions Commission to ensure that our policy proposals lead to fairer outcomes for women.

Lynda Waltho: As my right hon. Friend knows, women make up two thirds of pensioners, but their income in retirement is less than two thirds of that of men. Indeed, recent Department for Work and Pensions figures show that 2.2 million women do not qualify for a basic state pension. In the light of yesterday's Turner report and with tomorrow being carers' rights day, will she go further and confirm that the Government will closely examine the Turner recommendations to make sure that we deliver a pensions system that finally offers everyone the chance of a decent income in retirement, recognising that if we get it right for women, we get it right for everybody?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for the way in which she has campaigned to focus attention on the issue. I am sure that she welcomes the fact that 1.9 million female carers have been helped by the second state pension and that 63 per cent. of the 5.8 million low earners who benefit are female.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): The Minister will be aware that the Turner report includes the recommendation that women over 75 should receive a full pension. Although that recommendation is welcome, does she agree that she would be better advised to consider the Liberal Democrat proposal of a citizens pension for all women of retirement age?

Tessa Jowell: It is always worth, albeit briefly, considering a Liberal Democrat proposal. The position of women over 75 will be a material consideration in deciding how to take forward the recommendations in Lord Turner's report.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the percentage of women coming into work has reached a plateau? If we are to achieve a successful economy and get the next surge of women entering the marketplace and becoming productive members of our community, we need a package for women that encompasses not only pensions, but pay and child care.

Tessa Jowell: If one considers full time and part time, the number of women entering work is actually increasing. My hon. Friend is right that if we are to see a sustained increase in the number of women who choose to return to work, it is important to ensure the implementation of child care and other measures that promote the flexibility that women need, if they are to combine looking after a family with being at work.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I agree with the Minister that this is very important. I welcome what Lord Turner said yesterday, especially his particular attention to women and his stressing of the importance of flexibility for parents and carers in the work force and thereby in the provision of pensions. Unfortunately, however, the right hon. Lady will not take these decisions. She appreciates the difficulties of millions of women, but the Chancellor—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We do not have a great deal of time. The hon. Lady must ask her question, not make a statement.

Mrs. Laing: What will the right hon. Lady do to make the Chancellor see sense in this respect so that he appreciates the problem, stops rubbishing the Turner report, and does something for women pensioners?

Tessa Jowell: The position was clearly set out yesterday by the Prime Minister and the Work and Pensions Secretary. We will consider the Turner recommendations as a Government. We will take account of the pressing importance of meeting the needs of women, in particular, that arise from the necessity for flexibility in the currently inflexible pensions system, and ensure that we have a set of proposals for women that are sustainable. These decisions will be taken by the whole Government.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): In a forum on women's pensions that was organised in early November in Milton Keynes with my local chamber of commerce, the view was strongly expressed that there needs to be a universal basic state pension available on the basis of residence, as suggested by Turner, if women are to benefit in future. Will my right hon. Friend take that message forward very strongly to her fellow Ministers to ensure that that is incorporated?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That aspect of Turner's recommendations is potentially particularly beneficial to women. It is one of the proposals that will be looked at very closely because of the importance of securing a pensions settlement that recognises the age-old inequality of the system in relation to women.

Business of the House

11.31 am

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I welcome the Deputy Leader of the House to the Dispatch Box and ask him to give us the business for next week.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is on an overseas ministerial engagement. He has asked me to pass on his apologies to the House for his absence today.

The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 5 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Work and Families Bill.

I remind the House that on that day my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will present his pre-Budget report and my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government intends to make a statement to the House on the provisional local government finance settlement for England.

TUESDAY 6 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the London Olympics Bill.

WEDNESDAY 7 DECEMBER—A debate on fisheries on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 8 DECEMBER—Estimates [1st Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on the regulation of the pharmaceutical industry. Details will be given in the Official Report. At 6 pm the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

FRIDAY 9 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 12 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Armed Forces Bill.

TUESDAY 13 DECEMBER—Opposition Day [11th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion in the name of the Liberal Democrats. The subject is to be announced. That will be followed by proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

WEDNESDAY 14 DECEMBER—A debate on European affairs on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 15 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the National Insurance Contributions Bill.

FRIDAY 16 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The House may wish to be reminded that we will rise for the Christmas recess at the end of business on Tuesday 20 December and return on Monday 9 January.

Following is the information: In so far as they relate to the influence of the pharmaceutical industry (Fourth report of the Health Committee, session 2004–05 (HC 42)) and Government response to the Committee's Fourth Report into the influence of the pharmaceutical industry (CM 6655).

Chris Grayling: I hope that the Leader of the House enjoys his trip. I can well understand his desire to leave the country after the flak that he got last week for delaying the debate on police reform. I am afraid that the Deputy Leader of the House will have to take the flak in his place this week.

Does the Deputy Leader of the House realise how angry Members on both sides of the House are that the Government have again published another week's business and there is still no sign of the reinstatement of the debate on police reforms, even though there are several days on which business is light? The deadline for forces to submit their plans for merger with their neighbours is 23 December. It is simply iniquitous that the House is not being given the chance to debate these matters before that date.

One way of making time would be to postpone the Second Reading of the Armed Forces Bill until January. It introduces a new disciplinary system for the three armed services and, as Admiral Lord Boyce said recently, the armed forces currently feel under legal siege. Ministers have had months to prepare and it is not right that the Government are now planning to rush the measure through when the Opposition and those interested in it have had so little time to consider it. It is a 250-page Bill and, as yet, there are no explanatory notes for one of the most complex measures in the Session. It is not acceptable to rush it through.

Last week, the Leader of the House dismissed my request for an urgent statement on reports that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence, Lord Drayson, may have been responsible for a company that sold substandard vaccines to the armed services. Does the Deputy Leader appreciate the importance of those reports? When will Ministers brief the House on what they are doing to investigate them?

The Leader of the House has also consistently ignored my request for a statement on the forthcoming Hong Kong trade talks. They are a fortnight away and the future of millions of people in the developing world depend on them. Hon. Members of all parties want to express their views to the Government. Why are we not being given an opportunity to do so?

When will the House be given a chance to debate the Turner report on pensions? Statements of the sort that we had yesterday inevitably allow only a limited number of hon. Members to ask questions and raise points of concern. The report is sufficiently important to be debated as soon as possible. Are the splits in the Government so bad that Ministers are trying to bury it without letting Members of Parliament have the opportunity to debate it?

Nigel Griffiths: The police reforms on which the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) and other hon. Members have called for a debate have already been the subject of a well-attended Adjournment debate this week. Let me remind hon. Members of the timetable. More than three weeks remain for making representations on the first key round of consultations. Where there is no agreement by police authorities, a further consultation period will take us through next January, February and March. That allows time for the debate that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said last week and, I believe, the previous week, could happen in the new year.

I note the hon. Member's comments about the Armed Forces Bill. It is important that proper notes, which are as full as possible, are available to all hon. Members and I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is aware of that.

[Nigel Griffiths]

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House made it clear that allegations in print against my hon. and noble Friend Lord Drayson appear to have no foundation in fact. There is therefore no intention to hold a debate on them.

It is important to note that not only were the Hong Kong trade talks aired at Department of Trade and Industry questions prior to the business question, but that a report back on them will be made to the House. There has been ample opportunity for debate on the matter and there will be further opportunities to put questions to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development next week.

I hope that Lord Turner's report, which was published yesterday, will be the subject of constructive and continuing debate. It would be wrong within 24 hours of its publication to jump to any conclusions and I advise all hon. Members to read it carefully and contribute to the debate.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Could my hon. Friend reassure me that the foundations of Government policy continue to include social justice and economic sustainability? If so, why are we pressing ahead next April with the self-invested personal pension scheme, which offers tax relief on the purchase of homes? That will be enormously expensive—the cost will be greater than the Government anticipate. Will my hon. Friend ask one of the Chancellor's team of Ministers to make a statement to the House and consider the approach of offering such tax relief only if the required houses are made available for social housing? That would be one way of squaring the circle.

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend raises an important point. What lies behind the issue is the need for more to be done by individuals and companies to provide for pensions, and the need to remind people that they must make proper provision to enjoy in retirement the lifestyle that they seek to have. The proposal to which he refers is a worthwhile one, which has commanded a lot of support, and it will be yet another way of ensuring that people can provide for their pensions. The Government have ensured, however, that 2 million pensioners have been raised out of poverty, and I am sure that we will continue to do more.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): May I point out to the Deputy Leader of the House that the Westminster Hall debate to which he referred allowed perhaps six Members to speak about police restructuring? It is no substitute for a debate in this Chamber.

Is it possible, following the announcements in the last week, to have a debate on the resumption of building nuclear power stations? Many of us feel that those are not economically viable, that they represent a real danger and that they should not be resumed. It would be right for the House to have the opportunity to debate that matter.

Can we have a debate on social services? I do not know whether the Deputy Leader of the House is aware of the inspection by the Commission for Social Care Inspection, which revealed that one in four councils received only nought or one star for social care, which means that those councils are potentially failing vulnerable people, the elderly and children. We do not debate that subject enough in the House, and perhaps we should do so in the near future.

Lastly, can we have a debate on local and regional newspapers? I am aware of early-day motion 1158, tabled by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), which points out the situation in south Wales.

[That this House notes the proposed job cuts at Trinity Mirror in South Wales; further notes that Trinity Mirror in owning Wales on Sunday, the Western Mail, the South Wales Echo, the Rhondda Leader and the Pontypridd Observer, holds a virtual monopoly of the local newspaper market in South Wales; believes that a strong and varied newspaper market is vital to the democratic and journalistic health of South Wales; urges Trinity Mirror to reconsider its policy of combining editorial posts on separate titles; and urges the Competition Commission to consider a review of the South Wales newspaper market.]

We have a similar situation in the west country, with the Bristol Evening Post, Western Daily Press and associated newspapers, which have had substantial job losses over recent months, and we now know that the entire group is up for sale. Does he agree that local and regional newspapers are vital to local communities, that they must have proper news-gathering facilities, and that for our democracy we need local newspapers in independent control that are able to serve the communities that we represent?

Nigel Griffiths: The hon. Member raised the issue of the policy on nuclear power stations. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has made clear, before any decision is taken on proceeding to build any new nuclear power stations, the fullest public consultation and the publication of a White Paper setting out any such proposals will be required. I am sure that there will be ample opportunities to debate the issue on the Floor of the House.

In respect of social services, and particularly social care, it is important that all social services perform at the highest level when protecting and providing services for vulnerable young people as well as the elderly and others. I am sure that the findings of that survey will be studied with care and that appropriate action will be taken to ensure that there are no underperforming services in any part of the country.

On local and regional newspapers, of course they play an important part in disseminating information to people. As I think all hon. Members know, however, modern technology, including internet services, is putting extreme pressures on the print industry. I, for one, hope that that has a vibrant future, and I am sure that it has. I am afraid that I cannot offer the hon. Member an early debate, but I am sure that his concerns are noted.

Mr. Shahid Malik (Dewsbury) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of early-day motion 434, which deals with the appalling pay and conditions suffered by the House of Commons cleaners, and which has 178 signatories so far.

[That this House values the cleaners who maintain high standards of service to Parliament; believes the parliamentary cleaners should be treated with respect and that it is wrong that, despite the widespread concern over their pay and conditions of employment, their pay has only increased from the national minimum wage of £4.85 per hour to £5 per hour; is concerned that the parliamentary cleaners only enjoy 12 days' paid holiday and have no company sick pay or pension; believes the time has come to end this sorry state of affairs; and urges the parliamentary authorities to reach agreement with the two contractors on making available the necessary resources to ensure that cleaners earn the London living wage.]

Is he aware that the current negotiations would mean major job losses and a reduction in the standard of cleaning, and do not address sick pay, holidays or pensions? Does he agree that the cleaners, who do sterling work in this House, deserve some Christmas cheer?

Nigel Griffiths: I welcome my hon. Friend's comments although, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has informed the House, it is not ultimately a matter for the Government but for the House of Commons Commission, which has made its position clear—namely, to resolve two of the key issues raised by my hon. Friend. The first is the provision of proper facilities for the cleaners. I gather that those have been provided, but that for some reason they have not so far been taken up. Secondly, there is a substantial pay rise—in excess of 15 per cent.—on the table. No one will lose their job as a result of that pay rise because jobs are available elsewhere, even if not on the Estate and in the House. That is our information.

The parties should get around the table. A 15 per cent. pay rise seems generous given the present rate of inflation, and it is certainly worthy of further talk and negotiation. I hope that they can reach a settlement before Christmas.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The activities of the House are, sadly, increasingly irrelevant to the people of this country, and the ability of the House to do the job that people send us here to do is increasingly undermined. Will the Government, through the Deputy Leader of the House, look again at the request from both sides of the House for a major debate in this Chamber on a matter that is deeply important to everybody in the country, particularly in England and Wales? I refer to the restructuring of the police. We must have a debate on that subject before Christmas or the Government really will be held to account.

Nigel Griffiths: I think that I have made it clear that there is not likely to be a debate on the Floor of the House before Christmas, and also that the consultation period will be extended for a further four months in those areas where agreement has not been reached. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety, who addressed Members in the Westminster Hall debate, has made it clear that she is willing to talk to individual Members, as well as police forces, who have concerns. The consultation period has not yet ended. There are another three weeks for Members and others to make their views clear, so it seems inappropriate to hold a debate now when the consultation period has not finished.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend may be aware that 28 cancer charities have bonded together to form a cancer campaigning group. Although they recognise the amazing things that have happened under the Government in terms of care, treatment and early diagnosis, there is much more to do. They and many others are of a mind to discuss the possibility of a cancer plan 2 to move things forward. Will my hon. Friend advise me on how we might do that within the procedures of the House, by debate, summit or whatever?

Nigel Griffiths: I welcome my hon. Friend's championing of that cause and I know that the cancer campaigning group provides a united voice on cancer issues, keeping cancer on the agenda and at the forefront of people's minds. Every Member will be aware of the lives that have been transformed since 2000 with the introduction of the current cancer plan, which put cancer at the heart of the Government's health policy. Indeed, we have cut death rates for breast cancer in women and lung cancer in men faster than anywhere else in the world and, with the 1,177 more cancer specialists, we intend to cut cancer mortality further.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The Deputy Leader of the House will know that yesterday the Home Office slipped out a new policy on the levels of possession of class A drugs, which will constitute the crime of possession with intent to supply. Why was that announcement made yesterday? Why was it not made to the House, and when will a Minister from the Home Office come here to explain himself or herself?

Nigel Griffiths: A consultation document was published on Wednesday. It reflected measures that were called for by the police to set supply thresholds to eliminate any inconsistencies between police forces in catching and prosecuting drug dealers. It removes the excuse used by dealers that their drugs are for personal use only. The House will want to know that there have been record seizures of class A drugs in recent times. I am sure that this will be a subject of continuing debate and discussion within the House. I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman is supporting what the police were calling for.

Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave a huge boost this week to the nuclear power lobby. There are a number of us on the Government Benches who feel that the deep-mine coal industry has a part to play in our future energy needs. We are now down to eight pits. When will we have an urgent debate about taking the industry back into public ownership to guarantee its long-term future?

Nigel Griffiths: I fear that neither a debate nor that policy is on the Government's agenda. I stress the important role that coal has played in the past and that I hope it will play in the future in meeting our energy needs.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Can we have a debate on planning laws, and specifically on the PPG3 planning rules that designate people's back gardens as brownfield sites? It enables developers to exploit windfall development sites while true brownfield sites are not necessarily considered. The effect in my constituency and elsewhere is to destroy the character of the area with inappropriate windfall developments. Can we have a debate on this matter?

Nigel Griffiths: I am not sure that, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, I can promise an early debate on the Floor of the House. I am sure, however, that the subject would be a suitable candidate for an Adjournment debate, which would give the hon. Member a chance to spell out her concerns in more detail.

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): On the subject of the House of Commons cleaners, I am slightly concerned by the Minister's earlier response. I understand that the proposal on the table would result in up to 30 job losses on the House of Commons Estate, which would mean a major reduction in cleaning standards in this place. May I urge my hon. Friend to do all that he can to bring the Serjeant at Arms to the negotiating table with the trade unions, the cleaners and the contractors to try to bring about a resolution of this dispute?

Nigel Griffiths: I recognise that many hon. Members are concerned about this issue. There seems to be a degree of less-than-wholly accurate information being transmitted, although I do not impugn the motives of those who are circulating it. The position is as I have stated. Everyone is guaranteed a job. If my hon. Friend is saying that that job may not be in this place, that reflects what I said a few moments ago. This is a matter not for the Government but for the House authorities. I have set out, I think fairly, the offer that is on the table and have expressed my hope that it is agreed before Christmas.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): What is the future of the hapless Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, which would effectively give an amnesty to terrorists on the run, bearing in mind that every party in Northern Ireland is opposed to this legislation with the exception of Sinn Fein? It should also be borne in mind that every person who spoke at the meeting of the British-Irish parliamentary body, which met at Edinburgh on Monday, from both north and south of the border was opposed to the legislation. Only one Government Back-Bench Member supported it during the debate. Is it not time that it was knocked on the head completely? It is very bad legislation.

Nigel Griffiths: No, it is not—the Bill is part of the peace process, which has brought big dividends to us in this part of the United Kingdom and, most importantly, to Northern Ireland. These are always difficult decisions. Hon. Members have spoken with a great deal of passion and anger about their personal experiences. Nothing can bring back people who have been killed by terrorists. However, we would not be where we are today if we had not embarked on a peace process that required us to move forward rather than to look back. That has been one of the causes of the problems in Northern Ireland. I would expect someone with the experience of the right hon. Gentleman in this area to promote the peace process rather than make criticisms that have been made by others, and which the Government do not accept.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): The chief constable of the North Wales force has today criticised the unseemly rush in which the Government are deciding the future of Welsh policing. In Wales, there is a strong feeling that the views expressed by Mr. Giffard on an all-Wales police force do not take into account the peculiar geography and the circumstances within Wales. Will my hon. Friend please reconsider the issue of a debate, particularly on the future of policing in Wales?

Nigel Griffiths: Those views are not shared by the association that represents police constables in Wales and the Association of Chief Police Officers. If there are concerns, I have laid out a timetable to my hon. Friend—the decision will be taken after consultation, and the consultation period has not yet ended.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Virtually everything that the Deputy Leader said on policing is wrong. I was lucky enough to be called in the Westminster Hall debate. The Minister did not answer any of my questions. There were Opposition Members right round Westminster Hall to within two seats of where the Parliamentary Private Secretary should have been sitting who were not called. At a debate that I had with the Under-Secretary of State, he could not answer any questions from the chief constable and the chairman of the authority—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I allowed the hon. Gentleman to ask a question because he seemed so excited and I wanted to calm him down. It seems that that has not helped. Will he ask a question? If he does so, he may get an answer.

Mr. Paterson: Can we replace the debate on pharmaceutical regulations with a debate on a substantive motion on restructuring the police forces?

Nigel Griffiths: The opportunity to have a debate on this issue will arise early in the new year. I am sure that one of the key facts that my right hon. and hon. Friends will want to put forward is the increase by 14,000 in the number of police officers, which is why the report of Her Majesty's inspectorate has recommended, in part, a reorganisation of the policing forces.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): It is a while ago now since the excellent Animal Welfare Bill was published. There was then an indication that Second Reading would take place before Christmas, but that now seems unlikely. When are we likely to have the Bill before us and why has there been a delay?

Nigel Griffiths: I hope that we are able to consider that Bill when parliamentary time allows that to happen. I regret that it has not allowed it to date.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): In announcing the new appointments to the Northern Ireland Parades Commission, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland referred to a fresh start on the issue of parades in Northern Ireland, which has caused so many difficulties with attacks on parades and the obstruction of parades. Can we have an early debate so that we make it absolutely clear that as well as fresh faces on the commission, we need a fresh framework in which all of these issues can be discussed and decided by root-and-branch change, and not by tinkering with the problem?

Nigel Griffiths: I will ensure that my right hon. Friend is aware of the hon. Member's concern about this matter, if he is not already.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of the significant increases in young women being forced into prostitution in this country, particularly from eastern European countries. Will he arrange for a Government statement on what measures are in place or are proposed to deal with this evil trade in human beings?

Nigel Griffiths: I know that my hon. Friend, police forces and enforcement authorities take this matter extremely seriously. Indeed, there was a high profile case this week—it is vital that this evil trade is stamped out. Police authorities have the necessary powers and are using them, and we hope that they will continue to use them as effectively as possible.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): The Deputy Leader of the House rightly spoke of the importance of the publication of explanatory notes on the Armed Forces Bill, but I understand that they are not to be published until Friday next week, which is not even a full parliamentary day before Second Reading. The Bill has 373 clauses and 15 schedules, all pretty impenetrable. Will he undertake either to speed up publication of the explanatory notes or to slow down Second Reading?

Nigel Griffiths: I undertake to ensure that the explanatory notes are made available as quickly as possible.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend press for an early debate on media coverage of Select Committee sittings? There has been a sharp decline in the number of hours of coverage. The independent companies say that it is because they cannot afford it, but one would expect the BBC to step in. Coverage of the scrutiny process is central to our parliamentary democracy.

Nigel Griffiths: I agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, I raised the issue during an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall last month. It is important. I shall ensure that both the House authorities and the BBC are aware of the concerns of my hon. Friend and, I am sure, other Members.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): I am grateful to the Deputy Leader of the House for giving us his view of how police reorganisation should be debated here, but it is an important issue that affects all Members on both sides of the House. The Government should think again about a debate before the end of the year, so that they may be in a position to assess parliamentary opinion rather than just the opinion of the Association of Chief Police Officers, with its method of canvassing for information.

Nigel Griffiths: As I have said, there will be a debate. It will take place at the end of the first phase of the consultation that ends later this month, before final decisions are made where there are contentious matters, and before the end of the final consultation period in another four months-plus starting from mid to late December. There will be ample opportunity to debate the reorganisation.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): I am sure my hon. Friend agrees that the Ministry of Defence's honouring of veterans who served in the war could be extended to others who also served in the war, particularly those who were in the Land Army and the Bevin boys. Those people have been applying for badges, but unfortunately have been turned down. Will he use his good offices to try to rectify the position?

Nigel Griffiths: I shall ensure that the appropriate Minister is made aware of what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that this time last Thursday, the Leader of the House sought to give us the impression that Members would have an opportunity to debate legislation relating to the reorganisation of the police. It is true that, were Kent to be merged with another county, the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 would have to be amended through primary legislation, but I do not think that that is quite what the Leader of the House had in mind. He knows perfectly well that all the reorganisation can be dealt with by means of statutory instruments.

At the end of the famed Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall, the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety sought to explain to the House—as has the Deputy Leader of the House today—that there would be an opportunity for a debate on the police. Almost immediately afterwards, sources very close, shall we say, to the Home Secretary were to be found briefing lobby journalists, saying that the measures would go through, that it was all done and dusted and that it did not matter.

There are two non-sitting Fridays between now and Christmas. Why can we not have the debate on one of them?

Nigel Griffiths: In view of the clear strength of feeling among Opposition Members, I might ask why one of their important Opposition days was not used to debate the issue. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Whatever we do, we must allow the Deputy Leader of the House to reply. Some Members may not be too happy with the reply, but that is another matter.

Nigel Griffiths: They have their reply, Mr. Speaker.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May we have a debate next week on regulation of the video games industry? Has my hon. Friend seen early-day motion 1172?

[Keith Vaz]

[That this House denounces the recent rise in violent video games; condemns the forthcoming video game Bully, which allows players to adopt the persona of Jimmy Hopkins, a 15-year-old thug who has been incarcerated in a boys' boarding school, and in which points can be scored by terrorising other pupils with a range of physical and psychological abuse; further notes with grave concern that last year more than 31,000 children and young people spoke to a ChildLine counsellor about bullying; and calls on the Government to urge the British Board for Classification to take a much more cautious approach with this game and ban it from being sold in the United Kingdom.]

If my hon. Friend has seen the motion, he will know that Rockstar has decided to publish a game called "Bully", and that a central character is someone called Jimmy Hopkins. Players will be given points as the character terrorises other schoolchildren psychologically. Given the rise of bullying, I believe that the video should be banned. May we have a debate so that we can hear the Government's view?

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend is right to raise the continuing concern about the matter. While I cannot offer him a debate, I shall certainly ensure that the Minister responsible for such matters is aware of the concern.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Yesterday, a petition bearing more than 155,000 names was handed in at No. 10 Downing street as part of the continuing campaign to save Scotland's historic regiments. As a Scottish Member, the Deputy Leader of the House will know of the strength of feeling about this issue, and the real anxieties about recruitment. He will also know that the golden threads that were promised for the new regiment look particularly threadbare when we learn that the Black Watch cannot wear the famous and iconic red hackle at all times. May we have a debate in Government time, even at this late stage, to stop this amalgamation madness?

Nigel Griffiths: I pay tribute to the veterans and those currently serving in our armed services. The design of the cap badge for the Royal Regiment of Scotland is the culmination of several months of discussion and consultation with both those who are serving and those who have retired. The design was submitted to Her Majesty through the Army dress committee and has been given Royal Assent. It is a requirement for each new regiment to have a unifying symbol and all officers and soldiers in this new regiment will wear the new cap badge from formation day.

An announcement was made earlier in the year that recognised the strong identification that local people and those who have served in regiments feel with historic regiments. Many aspects will be preserved, not just dress but museums and anniversaries. I think that the Government have gone a long way towards addressing the concerns, but I note the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): May we have a statement early next week on whether United Kingdom airports and other facilities have been used by the United States to transfer what are described as terror suspects across Europe to be put in various interrogation centres? Will my hon. Friend bear it in mind that allegations have been made about torture? If such torture were taking place in centres in parts of Europe, it would be in defiance of both British and international law. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will be able to come to the House early next week to set our minds at rest.

Nigel Griffiths: The Foreign Secretary, as part of the European Union presidency, wrote to the United States Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, seeking clarification of the issue and of media reports of so-called CIA terror camps in eastern Europe. I suggest that my hon. Friend await the response before calling for a further statement.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): Consultation, or lack of it, seems to be a recurring theme in today's business questions. This morning I met Sir Bob Reid, chairman of Milton Keynes Partnership, the Government quango charged with delivery of the expansion of Milton Keynes. He confirmed that the people of Milton Keynes have only until 15 January to respond to the document. Will the Deputy Leader of the House find time for a proper debate on the Floor of the House? There is a genuine fear throughout the country that expansion of our cities is being forced on us without proper local consultation.

Nigel Griffiths: I am sorry to hear that the hon. Member feels that. I shall make sure that the appropriate Minister is aware of his concerns about the timetable for that consultation.

Dan Norris (Wansdyke) (Lab): May we have an early debate on the no-blame approach to bullying in our schools, as adopted by Liberal Democrat-controlled Bristol city council? Does the Deputy Leader of the House share my view that, although that council may not want to blame or punish bullies, the voters of Bristol will want to blame and punish the council for its irresponsible approach to child protection?

Nigel Griffiths: I share my hon. Friend's views that there must be zero tolerance towards bullying, and that firm action must be taken to tackle it. As in my local high schools, that should include interviewing bullies' parents to ensure that they are fully aware of the consequences of such acts. I favour, as the Prime Minister said two weeks ago that he did, the tougher rather than the tender approach on this subject.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we have an urgent debate in Government time on the imprisonment of British citizens abroad? In Spain in 1998, my constituent Teresa Daniels was convicted of drug smuggling after an outrageous trial in which she thought she was a witness not a defendant. She was released by the Spanish authorities and has now been extradited back to Spain to serve a 10-year prison sentence, more than five years after she was released. Does the Deputy Leader of the House agree that such a debate would allow the concerns of Fair Trials Abroad to be expressed about a miscarriage of justice, and pressure to be put on the British Foreign Secretary finally to raise the matter with his Spanish counterpart, in the interests of natural justice—a principle that ought to unite all member states of the European Union?

Nigel Griffiths: As the hon. Member knows, it is not policy to comment on individual cases that may still be subject to appeals and other proceedings. He will know that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary does raise cases of apparent miscarriages of justice, and has made clear to the House in response to other hon. Members' questions his involvement in certain cases at certain stages. This is an important issue and I know that the hon. Member will be working tirelessly on behalf of his constituent, and that the Foreign Secretary and his officials will be following his comments.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): The Prime Minister announced the long-awaited energy review at the CBI earlier this week, and I understand that a written statement was placed in the Library. It is unfortunate that an issue of such importance was not brought to the House as an oral statement. Can my hon. Friend give us an assurance that there will be an early debate on the issue in the Chamber in Government time, because it is vital that the House should have an input into the energy review at an early stage, rather than after it, when it is a fait accompli? Nuclear power and its relationship with other aspects of energy policy is a vital issue—one of the most important that the Government have on their agenda.

Nigel Griffiths: Any decision taken on the future of nuclear power will, as I said earlier, be the subject of a White Paper, which is likely to be accompanied by a ministerial statement. There will be ample opportunity for a full debate on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Is the Deputy Leader of the House aware that my constituency continues to be plagued by unauthorised Traveller encampments in the green belt—a matter on which I pressed him during the July Adjournment debate? What has happened to the long-overdue review of Travellers and planning law, and when will district councils be given stronger powers to resist the current abuse?

Nigel Griffiths: I shall find out what has happened to the review and ensure that the appropriate Minister writes to the hon. Member.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): It was left to a member of the public to notify me of the disgraceful actions of FirstBus in my constituency in unilaterally cutting services and closing a depot. Will my hon. Friend arrange a debate in Government time on the conduct of bus companies, and when will the Government consider re-regulating bus companies outside London?

Nigel Griffiths: I hope that my hon. Friend will have the chance to put that to Transport Ministers next Tuesday, at Transport questions. Obviously, the provision of local bus services affects the lives of many people and has to be handled sensitively. I hope that the company that he mentioned will note his comments and I am sure that it will want to meet him to discuss his grave concerns on behalf of his constituents.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Following the comments of the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) on the Black Watch, I am sure that my hon. Friend will be aware of the high profile of that issue in my constituency. My grandfather, Hugh MacDonald, served in the Black Watch, and is buried in the military cemetery in Gibraltar, where he died in 1941. I believe that one of the concessions made to the Scottish regiments during the merger process was that they would retain the right to their identity via the right to wear the cap badge at all times. Obviously, in the case of the Black Watch that means the red hackle. Will my hon. Friend use his good offices to ask the armed forces Minister to intervene to allow the Black Watch and the other Scottish regiments at least to retain their identity?

Nigel Griffiths: No, I cannot give my hon. Friend that undertaking. There has been a long process of discussion on the reorganisation of the regiments, and it was the settled view of the armed forces themselves that this was the way ahead. I am sure that the memories to which my hon. Friend paid tribute will never be lost.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Can the Deputy Leader of the House explain to us why the Armed Forces Bill, which has been long years in the making, has been shoehorned into the parliamentary timetable at a time when no one can possibly prepare properly for Second Reading, whereas the debate on police restructuring, for which everyone is ready, prepared and raring to go, has been withdrawn from the parliamentary timetable? Is it not blindingly obvious that the former should be delayed and the latter reinstated?

Nigel Griffiths: No, it is not. The Armed Forces Bill is an important piece of legislation that has to be properly timetabled in this House and the other place, and clearly the suitable time for debating it is in eight or nine days' time. As I said, I hope that the fullest possible information on the Bill is available. I know that the hon. Member, like other hon. Members, will not come cold to this subject.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): Tomorrow is carers' rights day. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is now timely to have a debate on carers' rights, particularly on issues such as the overlapping benefit rule, which means that carer's premium and carer's allowance cease for carers over pension age? That matter has been raised by many carers in my constituency, and no doubt will be raised by other carers throughout the country tomorrow.

Nigel Griffiths: Carers do a fantastic job and we all owe them a debt. I can ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is aware of the issue that my hon. Friend highlighted, and I am sure that he will want to respond.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Two days ago, the national security archive published analysis of recently released documents that show conclusively that the then British Government misled the House and the country about Indonesian atrocities in East Timor in 1975 and further suppressed information about the killing of Australian and British journalists. For example, at Christmas 1975 the then British ambassador to Indonesia sent a cable to London describing Indonesian soldiers as going "on a rampage of looting and killing".

In the same cable, he went on to say:

"if asked to comment on any stories of atrocities, I suggest we say that we have no information".

May we have an urgent debate on the previous Government's complicity in the cover-up, which will give Members an opportunity to press the current Government to release further documents that will be of assistance in the much-delayed inquest, to take place in Sydney early next year, on one of those British journalists, Brian Peters?

Nigel Griffiths: I read the accounts that the hon. Member has shared with us and I found them as disturbing as he did. I cannot offer him the debate in this House that he asks for, but I hope that he manages to secure an Adjournment debate that allows him to air these issues with the Minister responsible and to get an appropriate response.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Given that an increasing number of housing developments built on contaminated land are coming to light, such as that in Littleport, which is in my constituency; given the contradictory views of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs about the inclusion of soil sampling in the house sellers pack; given the comments of the Leader of the House in response to a recent question from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Steve McCabe); and given the now obvious problems in implementing part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, will the Deputy Leader of the House arrange an urgent debate on contaminated land development, so that we can clear up this mess?

Nigel Griffiths: I can ensure that the concerns that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House reflected in his response to that question are drawn to Ministers' attention, so that the hon. Member can assist his constituents and we can hopefully ensure that the policy is appropriate to the contaminated site issue.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): May we have a debate on the future of the Rhondda Leader, a very fine local weekly newspaper in which I happen to have a regular column? It has a rising circulation, but its problem is that it belongs to Trinity Mirror, which also happens to own nearly every newspaper in south Wales. Further to the point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), this is an important issue and we all enjoy a wide diversity of competitive and lively national newspapers. All too often, however, we see monopolistic practices in our local newspaper markets—practices that the Government, through the Competition Commission, should surely investigate.

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend can raise his concerns directly with the Competition Commission and I urge him to do so. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry takes competition matters very seriously.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Deputy Leader of the House arrange for the Home Secretary to make an urgent statement to this House on the effect on the criminal justice system and natural justice of leaked reports that the Sentencing Guidelines Council is about to recommend that sentences for muggers be cut from an average of three years in jail to two and a half years?

Nigel Griffiths: Those guidelines constitute arrangements made under criminal justice legislation. Previous offenders were in the community with no oversight at all for a substantial part of their sentence. It is important that a more onerous regime for offenders be introduced, so that if they breach licence conditions, they can go back to jail. The problem that the hon. Member highlights, and which was reported, is that young teenagers on a first offence—I am not sure that mugging was the offence; I think that it was snatching of bags that involves no violence—may not, under magistrates' guidelines, get an automatic custodial sentence. That will be a matter for debate in this House and elsewhere.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Last week, a disgraceful incident occurred in which policemen stopped a woman breastfeeding on a bench in a high street. This House will spend a lot of time discussing whether to ban smoking in public places, yet there are already 68 signatures to early-day motion 1046, on breastfeeding in public places.

[That this House recognises the benefits of breastfeeding for babies and welcomes the provisions of the recently introduced Breastfeeding etc. Bill which propose to address some of society's attitudes to breastfeeding; notes that research shows that breast milk is the ideal first food for most babies; regrets that the UK has one of the lowest breastfeeding rates in Europe, with just one in five babies receiving breastmilk by the time they are six months old, although the World Health Organisation recommends that babies need nothing other than breastmilk for the first six months of life; is deeply concerned that many mothers report having been harassed for breastfeeding in public while others have stopped breastfeeding early or chosen not to breastfeed as they have anticipated embarrassment or difficulties in feeding their babies whilst in public; supports UNICEF's call for legislation to protect breastfeeding mothers' rights to feed their babies in public areas and the Baby Friendly Initiative; appreciates that social attitudes are slowly changing but that there is a long way to go; and calls for greater understanding and positive attitudes to ensure that breastfeeding is a normal part of everyday life.]

In the light of those points, will the Deputy Leader of the House consider allocating parliamentary time to this really important issue, so that we can permit a perfectly natural activity that has so many beneficial outcomes? I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that I am not calling for breastfeeding in this House.

Nigel Griffiths: I share the hon. Member's views on this issue; indeed, I was in Gracemount, in my constituency, last Friday discussing this very subject with a community health group. I was going to say that it is important that we bring our attitudes to this subject into the 21st century, but of course, breastfeeding is a natural function that has stood us in good stead in the past. I will ensure that the hon. Member's views are made available to my colleagues in the Department of Health.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House agrees that, when a Minister speaks at the Dispatch Box, his comments should be factually accurate. That is particularly true of the Prime Minister, but yesterday, he said at Prime Minister's questions that from midnight last night, there will be a maximum wait of six months for operations in the NHS. This morning, I checked with my hospital and 437 people are still waiting more than six months for an operation. Can the Deputy Leader of the House help me by explaining how the Prime Minister might go about correcting what I am sure was a slip of the tongue?

Nigel Griffiths: I will certainly ensure that there is an inquiry into why services in the hon. Member's health authority seem to be failing. They are not failing in other health authorities, and there will be a reason for that.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Has the Deputy Leader of the House had the opportunity to look at early-day motion 1120, signed by Members from all parts of the House, which pays tribute to the soccer legend George Best, who died last week?

[That this House mourns the passing of East Belfast and Northern Ireland soccer legend George Best; salutes his unequalled football skills; acknowledges his place at the pinnacle of world class soccer; and tenders to his family its deepest condolences.]

Will the Deputy Leader of the House join me in expressing condolences to the family, and will he urge the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to make a statement to the House on the Government's intentions regarding a national stadium, given that a large body of opinion in Northern Ireland feels that it should be named after the soccer legend?

Nigel Griffiths: I join the hon. Member in praising the memory of George Best; indeed, I used to watch him play for one of the Edinburgh teams in the 1980s, and he set the stadium alight with his dazzling skills. I will ensure that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is aware of the hon. Member's strong feelings on behalf of his constituents and others on the question of a national stadium.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The Deputy Leader of the House represents a Scottish constituency, which perhaps explains the breathtaking insouciance of, and even the occasional inaccuracies in, his answers concerning a debate on police reform. We are talking about the most important reform of policing in England and Wales in a political generation. No police officer in my area—West Mercia, which covers Herefordshire, Worcestershire and Shropshire—supports the Government's proposals. There should have been a debate on the principles underlying the report produced by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, which I challenge, before proceeding to detailed proposals for a merger. The Government could save some shred of honour by having such a debate before Christmas; it would be shameful not to do so.

Nigel Griffiths: I have been not just forthright with Members, but accurate in my comments on consideration of that Bill. I note that for all the so-called concern voiced today, not one Opposition day has been devoted to this issue.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): The Deputy Leader of the House is doubtless an avid reader of the Local Government Chronicle. If so, he will see that, in today's edition, the Minister of Communities and Local Government has announced a White Paper on local government, to be published in the middle of next year, that includes proposals for structural reform. I welcome that announcement, but can the Deputy Leader of the House arrange an early debate on the relationship between that White Paper and the Lyons review, in which the Government can explain why it has taken so long to give that review any political direction?

Nigel Griffiths: The White Paper coming before the House next year covers a distinct policy area and, once it is published, I am sure that there will be an opportunity to debate it. Before its publication, there will be an opportunity for the hon. Member and his Liberal Democrat colleagues to provide their input.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May I revert to the amalgamation of police forces? The Deputy Leader of the House will know that the proposals are widely resisted in the east midlands, especially in Lincolnshire. He has spoken repeatedly of consultations, but does he not understand that, in a representative democracy, this House, speaking collectively, should be involved in that process? That means that there should be a substantive and votable motion before Christmas.

Nigel Griffiths: No, it does not. It means that there should be a debate, and one has been promised. That debate should take place at the end of the initial consultation period, which I understand is 23 December.

Points of Order

12.30 pm

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At Culture, Media and Sport Question Time on 21 November, I asked whether the Secretary of State thought it proper "to have held ministerial meetings with Philip Anschutz and other members of the Anschutz Entertainment Group to discuss their plans for . . . a casino at the millennium dome".

The right hon. Lady replied:

"I am not aware of any ministerial meetings as such having been held."—[Official Report, 21 November 2005, Vol. 439, c. 1227.]

However, in a written answer today, the Minister for Sport and Tourism states:

"Ministers and officials have had a number of meetings with casino operators . . . These include meetings with representatives of the Anschutz Entertainment Group and Kerzner International, its partner in the development of the Millennium Dome site."

Setting aside the disgraceful fact that the Secretary of State does not know what meetings Ministers in her Department are holding, I seek your advice about how best we can have the record put right.

Mr. Speaker: In a sense, the hon. Gentleman has put the matter on the record by raising his point of order, but there is nothing to stop him putting down more parliamentary questions about it.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At Treasury questions on 10 November, I asked the Chief Secretary to the Treasury why the UK economy was growing more slowly than any other major economy in the English-speaking world. The right hon. Gentleman's reply can be found at column 462 of the Official Report for that day, when he said that the UK was growing faster than Australia and New Zealand. Late last night, I received a letter from him apologising for misleading the House. Mr. Speaker, I seek your guidance as to how the matter can be put more clearly on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Let me make it clear that the Chief Secretary would not mislead the House deliberately. I am not responsible for the quality of replies, and I repeat that there is nothing to stop the hon. Gentleman putting down an identical question and seeking elucidation about previous answers.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): On point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) made a serious point when he said that this House should concern itself with matters of great public interest. The Government have flatly refused to address the huge public issue of police reform, and I think that there is a real danger that the House's reputation will be diminished in the eyes of the public. As the guardian of the House's reputation, what powers do you have to call in the Leader of the House and the shadow Leader to discuss a way forward, so that we can have a debate and a vote before the deadline of 23 December?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps if I answer, there will not be further points of order on the matter. I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's feelings, but there is the institution known as the usual channels. These matters should be taken through the usual channels because, as he knows, the Speaker cannot determine the business for the forthcoming week. That is up to the usual channels—

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: That does not help the hon. Gentleman?

Peter Luff: I am sorry, but it does not. Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noted the passion on all sides of the House about this matter, which needs to be debated. If the usual channels are unable to reach an agreement—and the response of the Deputy Leader of the House today suggests that the Government are not prepared to give ground, an intransigence that I find genuinely surprising and shocking—are any mechanisms available to Back Benchers to work through you to secure an urgent debate on this subject?

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this matter not eloquent testimony to the fact that this legislature must take back control of its agenda from the Government?

Mr. Speaker: I advise hon. Members that, on this matter, I am governed by the rules of the House. I can only operate by the rules that the House has given me. I cannot go beyond them.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): On a fresh point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is a refreshing change. Thank you.

Mr. Forth: Can you assure the House that Opposition Members will not be penalised if too few Labour Members show an interest in business questions? We are very enthusiastic about those questions, but can you assure me that we will not be penalised simply because they run out of people?

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is always helping me, and his question helps me to clarify for newer Members exactly what happens. It does not matter whether we run out of Labour Members to ask questions, because a far higher proportion of Opposition Members get called at business questions. I shall let the right hon. Gentleman into a secret: my policy is to give priority to new Members, regardless of which side of the House they are on. Sadly, some hon. Members have been left without an opportunity to ask a question today, but I think that they will be very pleased next week.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I take you back to the lack of papers available for the Second Reading debate on the Armed Forces Bill? You will know that I have raised many times the threat perceived by our armed forces as a result of the climate of prosecution in Iraq. Given the amount of public concern about the widespread threat of prosecution that young soldiers in Iraq face, is it not extraordinary that debate on the Bill should have been brought forward? It is 250 pages long, and will merely turn the system even more upside down than it already is, in many cases removing commanding officers from the decision-making process. No explanatory notes have been supplied, even though we have been given only about a week's notice of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: On the general point, the hon. Gentleman is correct. Explanatory notes for Bills should be made available for Back Benchers, and I am obliged to him for raising the matter.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Further to the points of order about a debate on policing, Mr. Speaker. You will have heard the Deputy Leader of the House say that such a debate would be inappropriate before the consultation process ended even though, three weeks ago, it was apparently not inappropriate for the Government to table a debate on the subject for today. Can you help me with this matter? Does any doctrine or rule state that it is not possible to hold such a debate?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman may be trying to extend business questions. He can have a go next week.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, I received a letter from Stephen Geraghty, the chief executive of the Child Support Agency. The letter responded to a written question that I tabled about the enforcement directorate. In effect, it confirms that that directorate managed to retrieve £8 million last year, but that its running costs were more than £12 million. Have you had any notice that Downing street has resolved its difficulties with the Department of Work and Pensions about the CSA's future? Will a Minister come to the Dispatch Box and give us a statement about the mater? That would help us deal with angry constituents, who express their fury at the state of the CSA nearly every week of the sitting year.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should bear it in mind that I am a constituency MP in my own right, and that I get lots of these complaints myself. He would help me by putting down parliamentary questions on this matter, as I cannot do so.

Orders of the Day

Council Tax (New Valuation Lists for England) Bill

Not amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

Clause 1

DATES ON WHICH NEW VALUATION LISTS MUST BE COMPILED FOR ENGLAND

12.39 pm

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 1, line 8, at end insert—

'(1B) An order under subsection (1A) may be made in relation to an individual billing authority, a group of adjoining billing authorities or all billing authorities.'.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are dealing here with a very important piece of legislation, but it is not freestanding and does not introduce a new concept. Instead, it seeks to amend the Local Government Finance Act 1992, which makes that Act very relevant to our debate. I was shocked to be told by the Vote Office that that Act is not available. Therefore, we are being asked to debate a Bill that amends an Act of Parliament, a copy of which is not available for right hon. and hon. Members to peruse. I therefore ask that you consider suspending this sitting until such time as that Act of Parliament is available.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we must continue, and I have called Sir Paul Beresford to move his amendment. However, I instruct the officials that copies of the Act must be available for the right hon. Gentleman and any other hon. Member who wishes to see it.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful for your helpful suggestion, but can you confirm that if by any chance the Act is not available by the time we reach Third Reading, the sitting would have to be suspended because that debate might require references to the Act for the sake of completeness?

Mr. Speaker: I like to deal with here and now, not any period in the future.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman is going to go on about this matter, it is not a point of order.

Mr. Davies: It really is a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I shall be surprised if it is.

Mr. Davies: As you can see, Mr. Speaker, there are many references to the Local Government Finance Act 1992 in the Bill before us this afternoon. It is impossible to understand the force of the amendments without seeing the Bill that they amend. Can you give us some indication of the point in our proceedings, if we must continue, at which we will have a copy of the Act available to us?

Mr. Speaker: I knew that it was not a point of order. I have instructed officials to make the Act available and when I instruct officials, the House can believe that they move quickly. They will be moving quickly as we speak and I think that the request of right hon. and hon. Members will be met shortly.

Sir Paul Beresford: I am sure that we will be able to limp on without that Act, although I admit that I do not know it word for word. I am honoured to move amendment No. 3, which also stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). He intended to be here to support this little amendment on this little Bill. Unfortunately, the Government's last-minute decision to replace some uncomfortable business with this relatively non-urgent Bill has caused a major conflict in his diary and he is unable to join us. My right hon. Friend and I were both local government Ministers, but I note that my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who was our much more learned Secretary of State, is in his place and will be able to add his support and make a few points to the discomfort of the Government and, perhaps, our Front-Bench colleagues, judging from their response to Second Reading. I am also sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon will be able to find enough time to wheel across and join us in the event of a vote.

Bearing in mind that council tax and local authority finances are excessively complex and generally dead boring, I must express my surprise and delight at seeing so many fascinated souls in the Chamber eager to join this debate. They are even, for the moment, still awake. The intention of the amendment is quite simple and straightforward. It would enable the Secretary of State to allow, or require, a particular billing authority, a group of adjacent billing authorities, or all billing authorities to carry out valuations for council tax purposes. It is perhaps worth emphasising that because of the nature of the valuations and the banding system that applies.

Mr. Greg Knight: On such matters, my hon. Friend's voice carries great weight with me, because I know that he has studied the subject long and hard and is an expert on it. However, I am most concerned by the scope and provisions of the amendment. Should it be added to the Bill, what would prevent a malevolent Minister from deciding to order a revaluation just for Conservative-controlled local authorities?

Sir Paul Beresford: There would have to be some justification for doing so. An order would have to be produced, which could lead to a debate in the House and the opportunity to make points. However, given the trend of local elections, it is conceivable that there could be so many Conservative councils that a Minister had no opportunity to do anything else.

Mr. Forth: The point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) also worries me. Were such a malevolent decision to be made by a Minister, could it be subject to judicial review? Does my hon. Friend think that there would be any protection, judicial or otherwise, against such targeted, political action?

Sir Paul Beresford: My right hon. Friend answers his own question. In such a situation, a judicial review would be a protection, although I do not really envisage such a situation arising, even if the next local government elections—as I anticipate—result in a clean sweep for the Conservatives and a fall in the number of Liberal and Labour councils. We shall have such a collection of Conservative councils that that situation might be more likely than my right hon. Friend envisages.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): It is remarkable that it is accepted as completely plausible that a Government might behave in the way suggested. Would my hon. Friend care to reflect on the fact that the Government have already done so in their reallocation of local government finance and the budgets for primary care trusts? Some primary care trusts are under-funded—and not over-spent—because the Government have shifted money from Conservative areas to Labour areas on purpose.

Sir Paul Beresford: I agree, and the amendment derives from the point made on Second Reading that it would provide an opportunity to change the way in which the funding formula worked, to make it fairer and restore the balance that existed before the funding formula under which we now suffer.

I believe and I hope that you agree, Madam Deputy Speaker—the interventions may support the necessity—that it would be appropriate to explain the background to the thinking behind this short amendment. As the House will be aware, on Second Reading, it was explained that the Bill in effect stops the programmed and vastly expensive national revaluation of every home in England to place them within council tax bands. It also gives the Secretary of State, whoever that may be at the time, the power to call for a national revaluation when he or she deems it appropriate, if ever. The whole discussion on revaluation for council tax purposes was questioned during the run-up to the election. Many felt that there was no requirement for a revaluation, and my Conservative colleagues and I numbered in that group.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Because we do not have the Act that the Bill will amend before us, it is very difficult to follow even my hon. Friend's lucid argument. Clause 1 states:

"A new list must be compiled, in relation to billing authorities".

What is that new list? Is it a list of people liable to pay the council tax, or a list of properties, or a list of billing authorities? What is the list that the amendment addresses?

Sir Paul Beresford: I should perhaps have explained that, but I was aware that in doing so I might transgress a little beyond the amendment. The new list is a list of valuations of properties within a billing authority, so that they may be put in bands for the redistribution of grant, on the basis of ability to pay, and to determine the amount collected in council tax from the owners of the properties within the billing authority's boundaries. The Government, especially the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), were emphatic that a national revaluation was required and that, as it was programmed, it should go ahead. Suddenly, post the election—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman said that he wanted to give a brief explanation. I was prepared to allow that, but I will not have another debate effectively on Second Reading. Perhaps just giving a brief background to the amendment will be appropriate.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would you not perhaps concede that a degree of flexibility would be helpful, given that we are struggling, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) has pointed out, because we do not have the originating statute in front of us? Would it not be more appropriate than normal for my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) and perhaps other hon. Members to give more of the background to the amendment and, indeed, to clause 1, given the absence of the originating statute? Would that not be helpful to the House, Madam Deputy Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am afraid that I disagree with the right hon. Gentleman, because he is a very experienced Member and really does not struggle at all.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am a slightly less experienced Member than my right hon. Friend and I probably know much less about local government finance, but I am trying to make a conscientious effort to participate in the discussion of this matter, which could be important to my constituents. We cannot follow the amendments because we do not have the text of the Act that is being amended. So we depend particularly on the acknowledged expertise of my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) to explain the background to and, therefore, the rationale of the amendment to the Government's proposals to amend an Act that we do not have before us. It would be most helpful to hon. Members in my position if he could be given a little latitude in explaining the background to both the Government's proposed amendments to the Act and his proposed amendment to the Government's amendment to the Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not accept that point of order. The hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) has been given an opportunity to give a brief explanation of the background to the amendment. The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) may not be quite as experienced as the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), but I am quite sure that he is more than capable of following the debate. The Minister may be able to elucidate a little when he replies.

Sir Paul Beresford: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The Bill relates to a national revaluation, and as I have tried to set out, there is an opportunity for a smaller or minor revaluation in appropriate areas. Interestingly, my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon and I are ex-local government Ministers and we have some knowledge of the matter. On Second Reading, I asked the Minister of Communities and Local Government to confirm whether the "Bill effectively puts revaluation in limbo, and there might be no revaluation in future if there is a rethink on the grant formula".

The Minister, in effect, confirmed that by saying that the Bill was in keeping with a situation where the Government were leaving their options open and that "all options remain open in the future."—[Official Report, 7 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 34.]

So such a revaluation is conceivable. That caused a bit of a flutter in the dovecotes for the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich—whom I expected to be here today but he is not—because he felt compelled to back his previous position. The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow), who spoke as an ex-valuer, probably felt a little like a turkey at this time of the year—if not more frequently.

Valuation for council tax is different from valuation for rates and business rates in that it essentially serves two purposes. First, it serves a role in the funding formula, as it is used to give an estimate of the ability to pay. As I said on Second Reading, that could be done in different ways. Secondly, it is used to rank properties in valuation bands, thus enabling a billing authority to distribute its council tax charge. As long as that proportion of spread remains the same—generally, that seems to be so—there is no need for a revaluation, especially an expensive national revaluation. However, one can foresee occasions where a national revaluation may not be needed at all for some considerable time but a small local revaluation might be appropriate.

The example that most readily comes to mind is that the Government are following previous Conservative Governments in pushing for redevelopment on brownfield land—in particular, the Thames Gateway. It is well known that the Deputy Prime Minister wants to cover sections of the Thames Gateway with large numbers of new—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, the hon. Gentleman is straying very wide of the amendment, which is narrow in scope. I have given some latitude; I now expect him to adhere to the amendment.

Mr. Gummer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to raise this issue. I have been carefully following my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford). One of the difficulties with the amendment is understanding where it would be applicable, but it seems that he cannot refer to those places. This is the first time that I have been following this bit of the argument. May I ask you kindly to allow him to refer to some of those places, so that we can judge whether the amendment is a good one?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he is not chairing the debate—I am—and I have made a ruling.

Sir Paul Beresford: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am trying to set out exactly such an example, but perhaps I strayed a little far in pointing out a particular area.

It is conceivable that an area could have a large number of new properties, the valuation of which would be set by their sale price, but that would distort the gradation and, therefore, the proportional spread across the council tax bands of the rest of the authorities in that billing authority's area or the area covered by a group of billing authorities.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): If I understand the spirit of the amendment correctly, it would essentially allow a localised revaluation, as opposed to a one-size-fits-all national revaluation process. New clause 1 was not selected for debate—in no way do I seek to challenge the decisions on the groupings—but, in spirit, it would have allowed both a top-down power, whereby the Secretary of State could order a revaluation, and a bottom-up request, whereby a group of authorities could come together to seek the Secretary of State's authorisation of such a revaluation. My hon. Friend may be about to cover that anyway, but will he make it clear whether he believes that amendment No. 3, which is much briefer, would work in both ways and that the bottom-up, as well as the top-down power, should exist?

Sir Paul Beresford: I admit that my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon and I tabled new clause 1, but we realised in retrospect that it could have been ruled slightly out of order. If my hon. Friend looks carefully, he will see that the drive of that new clause is, in effect, contained in this much simplified amendment. In fact, the effect is still there.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am afraid that my hon. Friend is not making much headway with me, because I have reached the conclusion that his drafting is defective. The amendment refers to "a group of adjoining billing authorities".

Why must they be adjoining? Would not a better phrase have been "a group of comparable billing authorities"? City centre property values may well rise and a view may be taken that urban authorities, not county authorities, should carry out a revaluation, yet under his wording, they would have to be adjoining billing authorities, not comparable ones.

Sir Paul Beresford: Perhaps that explains why the opportunity to give a broader explanation would have been helpful, because the situation that my right hon. Friend mentions is covered by the amendment, as he will see if he looks very carefully. The amendment covers an individual authority or lots of authorities. I specifically picked the term "adjoining authorities" because I chose as an example—I shall be ruled out of order if I continue with it—the Thames Gateway, which includes a number of authorities to which such circumstances might apply. Given that they are adjoining, it would be appropriate to carry out a revaluation at the same time.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I have an interest in that my constituency has suffered the biggest ever increase in council tax. Who would decide whether a group of neighbouring authorities had to revalue?

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State would decide. My hon. Friend needs to recognise that if the ability-to-pay assessment in the funding formula were changed—as I mentioned earlier, before I ran the risk of being ruled out of order—the readjustment in a billing authority or in a group of billing authorities would make no difference to the council tax for those properties, unless the local authority's sum council tax bill for the whole billing authority increased.

1 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies: I refer my hon. Friend back to what he said about the phrase

"a group of adjoining billing authorities"

in amendment No. 3. Is not the word "adjoining" redundant? If the amendment referred simply to a "group of billing authorities", it could cover a group of adjoining authorities, if necessary, and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) suggested, a group of authorities that, by virtue of the fluctuation of the country's real estate values, found themselves in the same position regarding the movement of average values, and should thus be grouped for the purpose of a special revaluation? Would it not be helpful for the purposes of the amendment if—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions are to be brief.

Sir Paul Beresford: I think that the answer to my hon. Friend's question is that I was attempting to make the amendment sufficient, but succinct.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I, too, have followed closely the logic of the hon. Gentleman's exposition of the amendment. I understand that if the Local Government Finance Act 1992 were to remain in place, there would be a guaranteed revaluation. Indeed, his party's position coming into the debate was that it wanted the provision for a guaranteed revaluation to stay in place because that was what they voted for. Is it the case that amendment No. 3 would mean that the position relative to the 1992 Act would change, so it would be an addendum to a Bill that he would then happily support, or does he want it to replace the position in the Bill? Alternatively, does he want to change the policy adopted by his Front Bench for the debate?

Sir Paul Beresford: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his complex twisting questions and red herrings. I think that he will accept that the Bill changes the situation by removing the programming of revaluation, but allowing the Secretary of State to set the timing for a revaluation—if that ever happens. I thus suggest that there might be an opportunity to save the enormous expense of national revaluation by having local revaluations, if that is appropriate. As the hon.

Gentleman will be aware, given his interest in local government, the cry for a national revaluation is virtually nil.

Mr. Gummer: Is not my hon. Friend being rather unkind to the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead)? Is it not clear that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what has happened simply because his Government came into power saying that there would be a revaluation, but have now decided that there should not be one, which has left him confused?

Sir Paul Beresford: My right hon. Friend is perhaps right. The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) gave a long dissertation on Second Reading and I think that it supported the assumption of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I declare an interest as a member of Kettering borough council. I am trying to wrap my mind around my hon. Friend's amendment in the context of Kettering borough. Due to Government diktat, there will be 13,100 extra houses in the borough up to 2021, which will increase the local population by a third. Given that one of the consequences of council tax revaluation in Wales was a large increase in council tax bills, should residents in Kettering borough be worried that the Government might impose a revaluation—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that I might just protect the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) so that he does not stray on to Wales during the debate.

Sir Paul Beresford: Bearing in mind my accent and recent sporting activities in Wales, that is probably a very good thing, Madam Deputy Speaker. I thank my hon. Friend for citing the sort of situation in which a local revaluation might be appropriate.

Mr. Quentin Davies: My hon. Friend argues the case for the law to be changed to permit individual or group revaluation instead of universal revaluation. The Government have already disgracefully spent £60 million on preparing for revaluation, although they now say that that might not happen. A general revaluation would be enormously expensive, so perhaps my hon. Friend can indicate how much that would cost. What would be the cost of an individual revaluation for an average authority? Before we agree to allow individual authorities to be revalued, surely we should have an idea of the cost of such a revaluation that the taxpayer would be obliged to bear.

Sir Paul Beresford: Unfortunately, I do not have the figures with me. However, I am sure that the Minister for Local Government, who is smiling at me, has them in his large portfolio and that he will produce them. Presumably, the cost of revaluation for an individual authority or a group of adjoining authorities would be proportionate to the expenditure for a national revaluation. However, I suspect that the Minister will find reasons why a local revaluation would be proportionately much more expensive, if he does not accept that the amendment is a genuinely positive move that, in a funny way, supports the Bill that he brought forward in the first place.

Grant Shapps (Welwyn Hatfield) (Con): Some 80,000 homes will be built in Hertfordshire, mostly up in Stevenage, which is above my constituency. If my hon. Friend's amendment were accepted, would it be possible for my district to opt out of the grouping for a revaluation, or would it be linked with the revaluation because of the vast number of new homes in Stevenage?

Sir Paul Beresford: I am worried that as many hon. Members are citing areas in which they want revaluation, they seem to be supporting the view of the hon. Member for Southampton, Test that we might need to have a national one. Fortunately, there are a few hundred Members to go.

I have had ample assistance in explaining why it is necessary to make this small amendment to the Bill. I suspect, however, that the Minister will not accept it, although it would give us the opportunity, in a funny way, to support both the Bill and the reasoned amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on Second Reading. I say that with a touch of concern because when my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) made his winding-up speech on behalf of the Opposition on Second Reading, he said that he felt that my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon and I were not following the party line. Perhaps I can persuade him to follow the proper line rather than necessarily the party line in this particular case. That might even tempt the Minister to accept at least the drive of the amendment.

If the Minister gives the matter careful thought, he will realise that the amendment could be useful. It would have been useful if such a provision had been included in the Bill, but I suspect that he rejected that opportunity, if it had even occurred to him, because it would have looked as if he were going for no national revaluation—at least not for a considerable time—which would have made his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich, who sat behind him on Second Reading, really upset, instead of just mildly upset.

Mr. Quentin Davies: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I left the Chamber a moment ago—I apologise for such discourtesy to my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley and hope that I missed only a small number of sentences of his speech—to find out whether I could now get a copy of the Local Government Finance Act 1992. Staff of the Vote Office tell me that the Act will not be with them for at least an hour and a quarter, so we will have had about two hours of a debate on an amendment to a Bill that refers to a text that we cannot see. Is that your feeling of how the business of Parliament should be conducted, Madam Deputy Speaker? If it is not, may we accelerate the production of the text, or else suspend the sitting until the text is available?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when Mr. Speaker made his ruling about the urgency of getting the papers into the Vote Office.

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

That happened little more than half an hour ago. I think that we can proceed with the debate, and I will be informed as soon as the papers are in the Vote Office.

Mr. Gummer: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. When the Speaker made those points, it occurred to most of us that we were talking about a shorter period than two hours. Can you make sure that the Speaker himself knows that it is taking two hours for us to receive the text? The Speaker's words and their tone suggested to most of us that it would be a matter of a few minutes, or perhaps half an hour. May he please be informed of the matter?

Madam Deputy Speaker: My intention, which I hope will satisfy hon. Members, is to make further inquiries into precisely how long we might have to wait. In the meantime, we can proceed with the debate.

Mr. Forth: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Perhaps you will help by allowing my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) sufficient flexibility to expand his remarks for about two hours, so that he could give us the benefit of his wisdom and we could postpone our contributions until we had the appropriate documents in our hands.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I will not be minded to do that.

Mr. Greg Knight: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wish to put on the record the fact that the situation is more serious than you may realise. I went to the Vote Office today to ask for a copy of the Act and was told that it was not available, but I also went to the Vote Office yesterday and said that I wanted a copy of the Act before this debate commenced; I was assured that it would be available. A request for a copy of the legislation has been in force for more than 24 hours, yet we still do not have a copy of it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have already said that I shall make further inquires into how soon the necessary papers will be in the Vote Office.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not intend to take any further points of order on that issue.

Mr. Quentin Davies: On a separate point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Leaving aside entirely the shambles of not having the Act today, is there not an important issue to be dealt with if this is not to set a precedent for the future conduct of Parliament's business? Will you make a ruling that in future the Government must make sure that all the relevant documentation is available to Parliament at least 24 hours before the debate begins, not two-and-a-half hours afterwards?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the Government. Members of the Government are present and will have heard the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Sir Paul Beresford: For a moment, I feared that the carefully thought out suggestion offered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—that I speak for another two hours—would become a request from the Chair. One of the difficulties caused by my national background is that, like my previous countrymen, I tend to make speeches that are short and sweet.

I am relieved and pleased to see so many of my hon. Friends here to support my amendment—at least I hope that that is why they are here. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): This is an interesting debate on an important amendment. The basic architecture of the Bill would put off revaluation. There is little difference between the Opposition and the Government on that. We think that postponement is a good thing because there is widespread concern about the revaluation originally set down in the Local Government Act 2003—the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) was wrong about that. The Government have had a genuine change of heart on proceeding with revaluation and referred the matter to the Lyons review.

Mr. Francois: I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend, but he referred to the Local Government Act 2003, which is mentioned in clause 1(7) of the Bill. Is a copy of the 2003 Act available in the House this afternoon?

Mr. Syms: I am sure that the authorities have heard my hon. Friend's question. No doubt he read that legislation when it was discussed in 2003, as he was a Member at that time.

Mr. Quentin Davies: As my hon. Friend says, the Government's U-turn on revaluation in response to the arguments that we have advanced for the past year or so is welcome, but must not they still account for the money spent—misspent, rather—on the preparations—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) will speak to the amendment.

Mr. Syms: Thank you for your protection, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Amendment No. 3 is simple, but there is a debate to be had on whether the revaluation should be national—for the whole of England—or whether it can be done bit by bit. The amendment states that "an order ... may be made in relation to an individual billing authority, a group of adjoining billing authorities or all billing authorities."

That seems to leave open several policy options. The Secretary of State may lay before both Houses an order for a national revaluation. Subject to the outcome of the Lyons review, I suspect that the Government will do that at some point.

1.15 pm

The second option under the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), who is an acknowledged expert on local government, is to do something less than a national revaluation. Within the terms of the amendment, there are several options available in that respect. A regional revaluation would be possible—as we discussed in the Committee, house prices change nationally, regionally and sub-regionally—so that revaluation took place bit by bit. In effect, we have already had a regional revaluation in Wales. Some of the concerns expressed by my hon. Friends arise from the consequences of that revaluation. Revaluation county by county would also be possible: in a large county such as Hampshire, one could get the agreement of all the billing authorities—the districts and boroughs—and produce a revaluation on that basis. It would also be possible on the micro-level, with revaluation only within a district or borough area.

Implicit in the amendment are major policy decisions on how to proceed, because council tax is one part of a jigsaw comprising council tax, unified business rate and the Government grant structure. Historically, both Conservative and Labour Governments have set a grant structure once they know what local billing authorities are collecting through council tax and the unified business rate, and various forms of redistribution go on. Members are often unhappy with the grant their area gets from central Government—it is a common theme. I have never heard an hon. Member say, "My local authority has more than sufficient grant," and it has been argued that the way in which grant is distributed ought to be revisited. A national revaluation, as the Government propose, leaves open the possibility of moving resources between regions and councils, which makes it the logical thing to do from a national policy perspective. My concern about the amendment is that revaluing bit by bit will prevent us from seeing the national picture and making judgments on needs and on particular areas.

Sir Paul Beresford: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Syms: Yes, of course.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentlemen will not mind my intervening to inform the House that the necessary document is now in the Vote Office. It has taken only slightly longer than the half hour that Members expected. There is a slight error, which is being corrected, but the document is now in the Vote Office.

Mr. Syms: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I give way to my hon. Friend.

Sir Paul Beresford: I am beginning to wonder whether I should do as was suggested earlier and give my speech all over again, because that might enable my hon. Friend to follow my argument. As I understand it, the system of valuation, revaluation and council tax banding gives two results. First, there is a distribution ladder within the banding system for redistribution of council tax itself. Secondly, the system is used to assess the ability to pay. I made it clear on Second Reading and very briefly today, in case I got stopped, that that would have to change and that it could be changed into a much fairer system that used Treasury figures on earnings and income tax paid within the billing authority areas.

Mr. Syms: I am glad that my hon. Friend has explained that—even though he is straying somewhat from party policy—because it is useful to the debate on amendment No. 3.

A national revaluation enables the setting of national policy objectives on the redistribution of money. That becomes much more difficult if revaluation is conducted on a regional, sub-regional or local authority basis. My fear as one whose county is not treated well by the grant system is that local revaluation might freeze an unjust distribution of the revenue support grant, which is one of the main political elements of that system.

Dr. Whitehead: The hon. Gentleman is right. In my previous intervention I should have referred to section 77 of the Local Government Act 2003, which derived in part from the 1992 Act. The 2003 Act is the one that requires regular revaluations to take place, which was the position of his party at the end of Second Reading. Is he saying this afternoon that because he does not feel particularly warmly disposed towards the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), he is in favour of regular revaluations, as laid down by the Local Government Act 2003, or he is not in favour of regular revaluations, as stated in the amendment moved by his party on Second Reading, or would he be prepared to cling to the lifeboat offered by the hon. Member for Mole Valley, which proposes some form of revaluation, but not necessarily that set out in the 2003 Act?

Mr. Syms: I do not want to stray too far, not because I do not want to answer the hon. Gentleman, but because I want to discuss amendment No. 3. On Second Reading of the Local Government Act 2003 the Opposition moved a reasoned amendment. I sat on the Committee which considered that Bill, as did the hon. Gentleman, I think. We had concerns about various aspects of that Bill—we agreed with some parts but not with others. At present we do not see the need for a revaluation. That is why we broadly support what the Government are doing.

Sir Paul Beresford: My hon. Friend is very patient. I would hate to shorten his speech, but one of the difficulties with his argument is that he does not recognise a lifeline when one is thrown to him and he is starting to blow bubbles from underwater. He ought to recognise my earlier point that the ability to pay is the second way in which the valuation and the spread of valuation is taken into account for the national distribution, under the Government's present formula. That would have to change, and it could easily be changed and improved, as I have already suggested three times this afternoon.

Mr. Syms: I thank my hon. Friend for putting that again on the record. The Lyons review is examining a range of issues, including banding and alternative ways of raising money via local government. The council tax as we know it may, therefore, not remain in its existing form in the future, particularly when we come to whatever date it may be for a future revaluation. The revaluation that we are putting off today was to have taken place in 2007. If we have a revaluation in 2010 or 2011, it may be with wholly different bands, they may be progressive, and there may be changes and amendments to the system. My hon. Friend would like further reform of the manner in which we raise money, and I understand that.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I draw the attention of the House to the fact that I am a chartered surveyor, a fellow of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and involved in practice in this matter. We now have a copy of the relevant Act that we are seeking to amend—the Local Government Finance Act 1992, and section 22B of that Act, as amended by section 77 of the Local Government Act 2003. There has been some comment in the House about that, so for the edification of the House I quote subsection (6) of section 22B, which states:

"Before a list"—

that is, a valuation list—

"is compiled under this section, the listing officer must take such steps as are reasonably practicable in the time available to ensure that it is accurately compiled on the date on which it is to be compiled."

There have been some comments in the press that entry into people's houses, photographs and other such intrusive measures could be contemplated in that exercise—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I understood this to be an intervention.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Yes, indeed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Interventions, as the hon. Gentleman knows, are to be brief. I hope he has now concluded. I call Mr. Syms.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) is speaking about the widespread public concern about Government inspectors and I do not intend to comment on that subject, as I wish to speak about amendment No. 3.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The purpose of my long intervention was to say that such measures would increase the cost of such valuations. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Syms: There is no doubt that the cost of a national revaluation is a little under £200 million—£170 million or £180 million. I think the Government would acknowledge that. When my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley moved amendment No. 3, he said that one of the advantages would be that a revaluation could be done in smaller chunks by moving slowly throughout the country, doing particular regions, and there might be benefits in that. I accept that that might be true.

Sir Paul Beresford: I thank my hon. Friend for taking another risk by giving way. In fact, that is not what I said. Although what he suggested is conceivable, there is an opportunity to delay or even stop national revaluations by carrying out revaluations only in those areas or billing authorities where it became a necessity because of the spread across the banding system.

Mr. Syms: That is an interesting argument. Given the various options that amendment No. 3 allows, how would that be actioned? Would it be by public consultation? Would the Member of Parliament need to have an Adjournment debate? Would the billing authority, having decided that things were seriously out of kilter in its area, have to petition Parliament to be a special case for revaluation purposes? I cannot see that happening, but I can see that the moment one moves from a national revaluation on a particular date to a local revaluation, that raises a number of questions such as in what order, when, which authorities are included, why a particular authority is included, the appeal structure, what happens when one area undergoes a rebanding process but an adjacent area does not. Would there be complaints from residents in that area?

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend not find at least slightly attractive the idea of a small expert hit squad of valuers moving seamlessly round the country valuing each district or region, instead of some massive bureaucracy attempting to value everything at once? With the nip and tuck approach, that little squad could apply the same principles around the country.

Mr. Syms: That is a point. The Government acknowledged in Committee that putting off the revaluation meant that 1,250 people who worked for the Valuation Office Agency would have to be made redundant. Many of them are on short-term contracts. An issue raised on Second Reading was how—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not on Second Reading, and we will not have a repeat debate on Second Reading. We are dealing with the amendment.

Mr. Syms: Thank you for your guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was led astray.

Mr. Gummer: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend get back to the amendment. Does he accept that although this may not be the right amendment, the Government need to embrace the concept that we need a mechanism for going to specific areas where there is such great change that any alternative would be very much worse? Will he ask the Government to do precisely that—to take that element out of the amendment, so that it can be done?

Mr. Syms: My right hon. Friend makes a very good point. The difficulty is that if the current structure of council tax were settled, we could move away from a national revaluation, as the amendment suggests, and carry out regional or sub-regional revaluations, as we would still get similar bands A to H in each area. Under the Lyons review, the Government are considering alternatives, and—this is relevant to the amendment—they have the powers to vary the number of bands or make them more progressive, less progressive or whatever the Government want to do. If there was a partial revaluation in one area of the country on bands A to H, but at a later date the policy changed so there was different banding in a different area, that would cause immense debate in the House. Until we settle the form of local government finance and the manner in which it is introduced, we cannot move from the concept of a national revaluation to the concept of a local revaluation. The Government are right that the Lyons review needs to examine all the options and report on them.

If amendment No. 3 were drafted more cleverly, the Government might want to consider it. In that case, the Secretary of State would have to return to the House and lay orders for a national revaluation. Perhaps the Lyons review should examine the matter. When the Minister replies to this important, short and specific debate, perhaps he will say that the Lyons review should consider amendment No. 3 very carefully. There are major changes in relative values and house prices, and they may occur in particular areas rather than nationally.

1.30 pm

We must consider a range of issues, and I understand the strength of feeling among my hon. Friends on the Back Benches. I have not made up my mind how I would vote on this one: my general instinct is to say, "No", but there are good reasons why the Government should throw the matter to the Lyons committee for further consideration. I shall listen to the rest of the debate, take into account hon. Members' points and advise my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley which way we would go, if he were to feel so strongly about the issue that he presses the amendment to obtain the opinion of the House.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): There are two reasons why I shall be very brief. First, I am a late substitute for my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), who is sadly unwell. I hope that all hon. Members will join me in wishing her a speedy recovery. Secondly, I understand that there is some annoyance on this side of the House that we are taking this business rather than another debate today, which is a point that hon. Members raised at business questions. However, it strikes me that the protest would be more effective if we were to dispatch the business of the House without unnatural prolongation to demonstrate to the Government, as I said last Thursday, that we could have had both debates on the same day. I shall reiterate my party's position. We support the Bill and want to see revaluation stopped, for the simple reason that under the system of local government taxation that we would adopt—local income tax—no valuations or revaluations would be necessary in the first place.

On amendment No. 3, the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) has made a serious point. I agree with the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) that if we support the general idea of council tax, amendment No. 3 is an interesting idea that should be explored, and I hope that the Lyons committee will explore it. There is, however, a serious objection, which Conservative Members raised almost as soon as the hon. Member for Mole Valley rose to speak. As the amendment stands, the Secretary of State's power to order separate local or regional revaluations could be used in a politically biased way.

The hon. Member for Mole Valley has repeatedly raised another serious problem in the debates about the Bill—the connection between the council tax banding system and the grant that the Government hand out to particular local authorities. It would not be beyond the wit of the Government to use that connection to produce a politically interesting result, which has not been unknown in the past. In reply to that point, the hon. Member for Mole Valley said that he would institute a different system of calculating the grant. I was interested to hear him say that he would use a system based on income levels in various districts, which is the precise basis for equalisation under local income tax, and I urge him to go much further along that line of thinking.

Sir Paul Beresford: The hon. Gentleman is being provocative, and I refer him to what I said on Second Reading. There is a distinct difference between my position and local income tax—the proposition advanced by the Liberal party is mindlessly complicated and includes all the problems of the poll tax, and more.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are not discussing any other kind of tax; we are discussing amendment No. 3.

David Howarth: I was about to make the same point, Madam Deputy Speaker. I would be glad to debate the merits of local income tax on a different occasion, but we are discussing a particular amendment to a particular Bill, which is very narrow in its scope.

If we were to adopt the system proposed by the hon. Member for Mole Valley, because income is distributed more evenly than property values the equalisation system would be easier to manage and less difficult to make work. Nevertheless, the central objection to amendment No. 3 is that the system, which is a good idea, would not appear in the Bill. If amendment No. 3 were passed, it would make the Bill worse rather than better. I urge him not to press his amendment to a vote and, perhaps, to discuss the matter with his noble Friends in another place to allow the introduction of a different version of the amendment that deals with the problems raised in the course of the debate.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) on tabling the amendment. I also declare an interest: as many hon. Members know, I am a county councillor. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Thank you very much. I am also the finance spokesman for Northamptonshire county council, which is currently battling a very difficult budget.

Let us get this out of the way, straight away—I believe that if we have a property tax, we must have a revaluation. I said that during the election and hope that I have not offended my hon. Friends on the Front Bench. That is my view and I have retained it. Amendment No. 3 is a way of ensuring revaluation, where local authorities think it necessary. Giving local authorities greater autonomy in that respect is a laudable objective.

Mr. Greg Knight: If what my hon. Friend has just said were in the amendment, I could agree with him. On reflection, does he agree that as the amendment is drafted, the power to order a partial revaluation rests not with local authorities, but with the Secretary of State, who may seek to use it to punish a particular area for voting for another political party?

Mr. Binley: My right hon. Friend has made a valid comment, but I argue that amendment No. 3 would at least allow local authorities to appeal to the Secretary of State for a local revaluation, which would be a step forward from the current position. As for the Government's ability to distort the measure, that power ranges over a very wide area, if they were to choose to use it. It is up to this House to scrutinise their activity and make sure that the use of such powers does not stray too far from what most hon. Members consider to be decent and fair.

Sir Paul Beresford: I thank my hon. Friend for supporting the amendment. In response to my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who is more paranoid and concerned than me and who is to my right in more ways than just geography, it is possible for the Government to change the funding system undercover and lay the blame on local government. However, it would be too open for the Government to distort the system in the way that he fears.

Mr. Binley: I understand that point and accept the dangers. However, I see the matter from a local government perspective, and I am sure that my hon. Friend does, too. On balance, it is in the interests of local authorities to take such action.

Turning to my other points, first, as I have said in this House and Westminster Hall, there is considerable uncertainty in local government that ranges from the revaluation being put off to the Lyons report. I therefore believe that we should give local authorities the opportunity to exercise at least some power; and I repeat the point that there is power in the ability to appeal to the Secretary of State. Unless we give local authorities some power in that respect, we will diminish them to the point where they become almost worthless. I want to increase, not decrease, their powers, and the amendment would achieve that.

Secondly, the degree of unfairness increases with every year that goes by when a revaluation does not take place. That must be so, because the need for revaluation is based on creating a fairness taking into account local changes. The amendment would enable local authorities to recognise those changes instead of being forced by a Government into a situation whereby unfairness increases. That would increase the value of local authorities in this respect.

Thirdly, there is no doubt that, by the very nature of the Government's decision on revaluation, local authorities will be increasingly under pressure with regard to appeals. My own local authority fears that as unfairness increases, so will appeals and complaints. Council tax payers put the whole issue of local taxation under considerable scrutiny as it becomes increasingly unfair. The amendment would give an outlet to local authorities in at least being seen to do something on behalf of their council tax payers.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes an important point about unfairness. Does he agree that unless there are regular revaluations the differential between new and old houses, with new houses being valued as soon as they are built and old houses not being valued until revaluation takes place, will become ever wider, creating great unfairness between different constituents within the same billing area?

Mr. Binley: That is exactly the point that I was trying to make, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for supporting me. He is absolutely right.

The sustainable communities programme will lead to massive changes in certain areas, dramatically increasing the need for revaluation. The Government say that they are fully committed to that growth agenda. In the light of that, the ability of authorities to appeal to the Secretary of State for local revaluation has considerable relevance.

Mr. Forth: I am becoming increasingly worried about my hon. Friend's touching faith in the integrity of a mechanism of appeal to the Secretary of State. He may have more faith in Secretaries of State than I have had hitherto, but can he tell me, hand on heart, that he really believes that any Secretary of State would deal even-handedly and fairly with the appeals to which my hon. Friend attaches such touching faith?

Mr. Binley rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman to make his remarks relevant to the amendment, not just revaluation?

Mr. Binley: I understand and take your guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker. My point was that the amendment would enable local authorities in a growth situation to ask for their own revaluation, which would alleviate pressure on them. That has a relevant connection to the debate.

In response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), no, I do not have that faith—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman's right hon. Friend might be leading him somewhat astray.

Mr. Binley: That certainly would not be for the first time, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I am grateful to you for pointing it out. Under your guidance, I shall ignore my right hon. Friend and continue with the points that I wish to make.

I want to refer to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who is no longer in his place. He suggested that the Secretary of State might have too much power and asked whether he would be fair or could act politically.

I simply repeat that this House is the scrutiny body in this respect, and I hope that it would act in that way. However, I understand my right hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. Friend, with his huge experience of local government matters, agree that a Secretary of State does not actually have to use a power that he is given, but the mere threat of his having it could force some local authorities to carry out a revaluation?

1.45 pm

Mr. Binley: As I understand it, local authorities could carry out a revaluation only if the Secretary of State agreed to it. I have faith in the goodness of humankind. I see good when I look at the Government Benches, and I hope that that will be repaid to me by the Minister when he winds up.

To sum up very quickly—

Mr. Forth: There is no need to do that.

Mr. Binley: Well, I wish to do so. Again, I refuse to take the advice of my right hon. Friend.

The amendment would be good for local government administration and for the perception of local government. It would place in its hands at least the opportunity to request revaluation where it thinks it fit and proper and I hope that the Secretary of State would respond in good part to such a request. The amendment would give local authorities greater autonomy and a greater field of action in this respect, and as a champion of local authorities I would be in favour of that.

Local government has always been a political football, but this particular issue has added to the intensity of the game. That is sad. The amendment would help to relieve that situation by giving local authorities a safety valve where growth, whether forced on them or otherwise, is such that there is a real need for action that is not a national need. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley for presenting it to the House.

Mr. Francois: I rise to make a few points about the amendment. It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley), who is in effect the chancellor of Northamptonshire in this context. I wish him good luck with the challenges that he faces.

On Report, we can debate only the amendments that are before the House. I have some reservations about the way in which amendment No. 3 is worded and shall try to explain the reason for my concern. I have some sympathy with what my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) is trying to achieve, but I think, in all sincerity, that he may have tripped himself up slightly. Let me refer to new clause 1(2) to illustrate my point. That would give the Secretary of State a top-down power to permit a localised revaluation, which is the spirit of what my hon. Friend is trying to achieve in the amendment, but would also allow for a bottom-up request to the Secretary of State to exercise that power. I am worried that the way in which amendment No. 3 is drafted could allow the Secretary of State to decide, for some arbitrary reason—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could address the Chair.

Mr. Francois: I am sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was looking at my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley to try to emphasise my point.

The Secretary of State could, for some arbitrary reason, decide to impose a revaluation on a local authority or group of local authorities that are adjoining rather than comparable—as my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) pointed out—and there might be some suspicion that that was being done for an open, or perhaps less open, political reason. If there were two separate amendments—the first to make the same provision as amendment No. 3 and the second to provide that the power could be exercised only in response to a request from the bottom, so that it could be effected only when a group of local authorities had got together to make that request—I would have more sympathy with the aim of my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley. In those circumstances, the Secretary of State could grant a revaluation only when there was clear evidence that the local authority or authorities had made the request.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): Does my hon. Friend have any concerns about pressures, for example, to provide land for development more quickly—perhaps every five years when we are considering a 10-year revaluation—which could mean even greater pressures on revaluation? If land and buildings are provided more quickly, the revaluations can be done more quickly. Clause 1 would allow for that.

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend makes a good point, which I intended to raise because it is the second reason for my concern about the amendment.

I have reservations about the amendment's drafting because the power is too broad. I would be more inclined to support it if it were drawn so that revaluation could take place only when a request had been made from the bottom up—from the relevant authority or authorities. I hope that I have made my first worry clear.

My second concern relates to growth, which several hon. Members mentioned, including my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire and my hon. Friends the Members for Northampton, South and for St. Albans (Anne Main). I am a Thames Gateway Member of Parliament, but the point does not apply only to that area. Some of my hon. Friends have argued that an area of especially high growth might give the local authority an incentive to revalue. I understand the logic of that but it is no secret that, in some of the proposed high growth areas, there is much local resistance to the amount of house building that the Government want. That is true of parts of the Thames Gateway and I believe it to be true of the other growth areas that have been mentioned.

If we allowed local authorities to revalue specifically in those areas on the basis of growth, residents and council tax payers might feel that they were being doubly punished. Not only would they be asked to accept all the additional housing—to which many constituents and I are resistant—and the attendant pressures on infrastructure, which I do not need to repeat in case I stray out of order; all hon. Members are familiar with the arguments, but they would also get a revaluation thrown in. That is not likely to be popular with residents and council tax payers even if the local authority wanted a revaluation for understandable financial reasons. However, people just over the border of the development area would not have to accept so many houses, suffer the infrastructure pressures or get the revaluation thrown in.

Sir Paul Beresford: My hon. Friend must take account of the point that, if the local authority does not increase its total tax take, the distribution in the area will be evened up only if the Government recognise that the way in which they assess ability to pay—based on valuation band spread—must be corrected and moved not towards local government, as the Liberal party suggests, but a Treasury assessment. The Treasury already conducts such assessments.

Mr. Francois: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I, too, served in local government, albeit not at the same senior level. My hon. Friend successfully led Wandsworth council in London. However, although I understand his technical point, I was making a more avowedly political point. We all know that the growth is controversial and a potential consequence is that people would get a revaluation thrown in on top. Those people are suffering enough.

Mr. Gummer rose—

Mr. Binley rose—

Mr. Francois: I shall give way to my right hon. Friend first.

Mr. Gummer: Will my hon. Friend consider the other side of the argument? If the people who live near the new development feel that they are unfairly taxed because of the change, would not revaluation on a local basis have the opposite effect to that which he adduces? The revaluation would make them happier because it would be fairer not only to the new people but to them.

Mr. Francois: I understand my right hon. Friend's point, but if one considers, for example, the experience in Wales, revaluation has been relatively unpopular. If one could guarantee that the bulk of the people in a growth area would be pleased to be revalued, his argument would carry more weight. However, I believe that they would be happy to be revalued in isolation when people who lived nearby did not have to accept the additional houses and the attendant pressures or revaluation. I hope that I can deal with that matter in more detail if I am lucky enough to catch your eye on Third Reading, Madam Deputy Speaker. I understand the constraints on the current debate.

The overall problem is with the inequitable nature of the funding formula whereby so much local government money derives from the Treasury. I shall not go further but changing the formula and making it more equitable, not accepting the amendment, is the way to deal with that.

Does my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South want to intervene now?

Mr. Binley: No, my hon. Friend has now covered the point that I wanted to make and I thank him.

Mr. Francois: In that case, I shall conclude my remarks.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is an expert on the matters that we are considering. He served on the Committee that considered the Local Government Act 2003. He knows that, when tax is raised by revaluation, the system already provides for redistribution to transfer money from higher-based to lower-based authorities. Would not accepting the amendment create a genuine incentive for that to happen?

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend and I both served on that Committee and I greatly enjoyed the debates. I genuinely understand the aim of my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley in amendment No. 3, but the way to tackle the problem is by dealing with the inequity of the funding formula in the round. That is the nub of the problem. I hope that we shall take that on instead of accepting the amendment, which simply tweaks a much larger problem.

I understand what the amendment tries to achieve. If two separate amendments along the lines of the subsections in new clause 1 had been tabled, I might have been tempted to vote for one but not the other. Unfortunately, I am worried about supporting the amendment as drafted because the power is too broad and the Secretary of State could abuse it in certain circumstances.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I support amendment No. 3, which was tabled by my former colleague on Wandsworth council, my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford). It is an ingenious amendment, which introduces flexibility and could go a long way towards dealing with the problem of perceived and actual unfairness in specific local authority areas.

I should like to show what the amendment could do in the case of the two billing authorities in my constituency, Christchurch and East Dorset. Those local authorities have experienced much higher than average increases in council tax per dwelling since 1993. A much higher than average percentage of people who are 65 and over live there. There is therefore probably a strong case for considering revaluation to get a fairer distribution of the burden within those local authority areas without affecting the overall grant distribution mechanism.

Mr. Forth: Before my hon. Friend becomes too enthusiastic, does he agree that the original wording in the Bill makes it clear that the Secretary of State will take the action? Sadly, all the amendment would do is allow the Secretary of State to use his discretion in determining whether action should be taken locally or regionally. Why does my hon. Friend, even in the early stages of his remarks, appear to imply that we should be hopeful that the anomalies, which he is about to describe in some detail, could be corrected by the Secretary of State, of all people?

2 pm

Mr. Chope: I think that the anomalies could be corrected by a Secretary of State of a Conservative hue. That is why I think that there is some merit in the amendment. I accept the reservation articulated by my right hon. Friend and others who think that such a power given to the current Secretary of State would indeed be abused. There is some evidence that the Secretary of State's capping powers have been abused and used to bear down unfairly on small Conservative-run local authorities.

Mr. Francois: To drive the point home again, the reservations of some of us, to draw another parallel, are based on some of the planning decisions made by the First Secretary of Sate. I know that we are not debating planning this afternoon, Madam Deputy Speaker, but on a number of occasions local inquiries have found one way and the First Secretary of State has overruled the decision of the local inspector. Real practical examples therefore exist of the Secretary of State going beyond the merits of his powers. Those are additional reasons for our concerns.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. Of course, the First Secretary of State talks a lot about localism, but in reality he is in favour of centralisation. The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley would introduce a degree of localism into the process, and it would be useful for that reason.

I am not sure whether Members realise the extent to which average council tax per dwelling has increased since 1993–94. The Halifax has done some useful work on the subject, and the average council tax per dwelling in 1993–94 was £456, whereas this year it is £1,009. That is an increase of £553, or 121 per cent., when average net income has gone up by 82 per cent. That is an increase of about 50 per cent. more than the increase in average net incomes.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Halifax survey, by its own admission, did not take into account the effect of council tax benefit and age-related payments?

Mr. Chope: Certainly. That does not undermine my argument, however, that the overall average council tax bill has increased by 121 per cent. since 1993–94, when the national average net income has increased by 82 per cent.

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend agree that we knew that that would happen because it became clear from the Red Book that the Government intended to move a greater weight of local authorities' costs to the council tax, and then to blame the local council for the increase in tax?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not discussing the clarity of local government finance.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is right.

Beyond the Government's overall policy to increase the national burden of council tax faster than the rate at which national incomes have increased, the situation is much worse in some local authority areas and the amendment might address that. For example, in my constituency, under the Christchurch borough council billing authority, in 1993–94, the average council tax per dwelling was below the national average at £441 per dwelling. This year, however, it is £1,193 per dwelling—an increase in the average bill of 171 per cent., which is 50 per cent. more than the England average. To take up the Minister's point that that does not take account of council tax benefit, the amount of council tax benefit in Christchurch is very small, with only 16.2 per cent. of households receiving it. We know, however, that more than 30 per cent. of the population are aged 65 and over. It is a privilege to be one of the younger people living in Christchurch. I am conscious of the burden faced by pensioners and those on fixed incomes.

The situation is similar under East Dorset district council billing authority, which covers another part of my constituency. There, in 1993–94, the average council tax per dwelling was £516, significantly above the then national average, but it has continued to increase, going up by 163 per cent. since then, and is now no less than £1,356 per dwelling. That is about £350 more per dwelling than the national average. It is not surprising, therefore, that my constituents come to see me frequently to complain about the actual and perceived unfairness of the council.

Mr. Greg Knight: What would my hon. Friend's constituents say if amendment No. 3 were incorporated into the Bill and became law, and the Secretary of State made an order that one of my hon. Friend's billing authorities should revalue, but not the other?

Mr. Chope: My constituents would be angry with the Government for using such perverse reasoning. My right hon. Friend identifies what I see as a weakness in the amendment, but it is not such a weakness that we should not support it today. The amendment demonstrates some lateral thinking about how to try to introduce greater fairness into the system, rather than leaving things drifting under this Government. The prospects are that council tax will continue to increase way beyond the rate of inflation, and will increase by a higher rate in small district council areas such as Christchurch and East Dorset than in the metropolitan, urban areas that used to be regarded as Labour heartlands.

There is a problem, and I am not saying that the amendment is the perfect solution to it, but it contains the prospect of introducing some increased fairness. A revaluation in Christchurch or East Dorset would show which houses had increased in value by more than the average for the area, and which had increased by a lower proportion. The bills that were issued could then be adjusted to reflect that new equity. That should be a zero sum game within each local authority area, because otherwise we would end up having to pay much higher bills because of the redistributive effects of the national grant system. Provided that it was a zero sum game, such a measure might have a role to play within an individual local authority area. The Secretary of State might decide which local authorities to include, but he might also want to start off by saying that the pensioners are really the ones complaining most about the unfair burden of council tax, and that, therefore, in all local authority billing areas where the proportion of the population aged 65 and over is higher than, say, 25 per cent., there should be revaluation to see whether the burden on pensioner households could be reduced.

At the moment, the council tax is essentially a stealth wealth tax, and the value of properties is being used as a proxy for ability to pay. We know jolly well that the ability to pay of many pensioner households is very small.

David Howarth: I accept that what the hon. Gentleman says is true in part, but one problem with his argument is that about a quarter of households that pay council tax—those in council housing, housing association housing or private rented accommodation—do not own the property on which the tax is calculated. To that extent, therefore, it is not a wealth tax.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think we are straying a little wide of the amendment.

Mr. Chope: I accept that council tax is not wholly a wealth tax, but it is being used as one by the Government, which is one reason why we were so strongly against—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will relate his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Chope: I shall certainly go back to the argument that I was deploying, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Another criterion that the Government could use when deciding in which billing authorities a revaluation should be held could be the percentage of households receiving council tax benefit. When I was a Minister in the then Department of the Environment, one of the Treasury's biggest concerns was the increased bills that resulted from high rates. The Government could decide to hold a revaluation in areas where the percentage of take-up of council tax benefit was relatively low. In Christchurch and in East Dorset, council tax benefit is available to far fewer households than it is nationally, and in East Devon the figure is only 13.7 per cent.

Anne Main: As my hon. Friend has so far mentioned only pensioners and people in receipt of council tax benefit, is he suggesting that, as part of the revaluation process, we should look more at the occupants of the property than the property itself?

Mr. Chope: I am illustrating a possible criterion upon which the Government might choose to exercise their discretion under the amendment. Does not my hon. Friend agree that the burden on pensioners is particularly great? Indeed, the Halifax paper pointed out that the burden of council tax had risen most among the pensioner population.

Anne Main: There may be many elderly pensioners suffering in that way in my hon. Friend's constituency, as there are in mine, but they often occupy larger homes than they need and cannot afford to downsize, so they could be disproportionately disadvantaged in a revaluation.

Mr. Chope: That remains to be seen. As I said, it would be a zero-sum game. In my constituency, more modern bungalows, where people moved in more recently, or bungalows that have been modernised and extended would probably rise in value relative to properties occupied by more senior pensioners—people in their 80s and 90s, of whom we have a large number in Christchurch.

Sir Paul Beresford: May I slightly disagree with my hon. Friend? The whole point of the driver that I am proposing is that there would be revaluation where a change in the value of properties in a billing area needed to be reflected. He is drifting on to a point that I covered on Second Reading: rather than using valuation, there is a fairer way to redistribute council grant. That would cover what he seeks.

2.15 pm

Mr. Chope: I shall not refer to Second Reading, Madam Deputy Speaker, as it is a verboten subject, but I am sorry that my hon. Friend thinks that my support for his amendment is misplaced. It gives one the opportunity to point out just how unjust the present system is and how unfairly it impinges on particular billing areas and councils and particular groups of people in those areas.

The other part of my hon. Friend's amendment has great virtue, as it would enable the revaluation process to be carried out incrementally—if it has to be carried out at all. Having studied the Valuation Office Agency report, I was horrified, as it shows that an enormous number of staff were taken on for the national revaluation and, despite the fact that the Government have said that there will be no national revaluation during the lifetime of this Parliament, a large number of those extra staff are still in post, because the VOA has a no-redundancy policy.

The Minister is grimacing, but I can illustrate what I said by reference to figures from the VOA annual report and accounts for 2004–05. On page 29, the VOA crows about the fact that it has taken 1,200 extra staff to deal with the national revaluation, yet the Minister told the Standing Committee, that as a result of the Government's decision not to go ahead with the revaluation, there had been a number of redundancies. However, the number fell far short of the 1,200 extra staff taken on during the last financial year. He said:

"The immediate impact is that some 420 staff working on casual and fixed-term contracts will leave the agency by this Friday."

I think that was the Friday before last. He continued:

"The agency is also running an early departure scheme for permanent employees"—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 15 November 2005; c. 24.]—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman help me by indicating how that relates to amendment No. 3?

Mr. Chope: It would be the consequence of having a national revaluation in one big chunk. Amendment No. 3 would give the Government scope to carry out revaluation in bite-size chunks, which would mean that the VOA did not need to employ so many staff, as those working on a valuation in one year could move on to another one in the next year. That is what happened in Wales. Some of the VOA staff employed for the revaluation in Wales were redeployed to deal with the start of revaluation in England.

I am illustrating the consequence of the peaks and troughs in demand for VOA staff necessitated by a national revaluation. Those peaks and troughs could be ironed out if revaluation was in bite-size chunks. I am trying to illustrate the benefits of the amendment by drawing attention to the costs, which are on the public record—how much the Government have wasted by moving from what was to be a national revaluation to no valuation at all. They took on extra staff and are keeping many of them on, doing I know not what.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend pre-empts something of what I thought I might explore myself. I have a similar reference, which I may cite should I catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. Has he any feel for the relative costs of the national structure—buildings, staff and so on—on the one hand, which would be required by a national valuation approach, as opposed to a more transient, small, mobile force that could move around the country, on a local or regional basis, as he described? We might be able to tempt the House to vote for the amendment of our hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) if we could demonstrate that benefit.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend makes a good point but unfortunately I have no figures to illustrate it. All I can do is to illustrate the costs of a national scheme with its inherent inflexibility. As I understand it, despite the fact that that role has been withdrawn from the VOA, the Minister said in Committee that 600 staff would leave the agency between 30 March and 30 June 2006. What are those 1,200 staff doing in the meantime? Why were they not made redundant immediately, given that the function that they performed was removed? The Minister may feel for the families and the employees—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's concern has been noted, but that is sufficient.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you are right that the House has noted our concern about the plight of people who are seduced into jobs that they believe to be long-term only to find that that is not the case.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we have heard sufficient on that particular point. He may now continue with his remarks.

Mr. Chope: Certainly, Madam Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend's amendment would require a much smaller cohort of staff who, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said, could be sent around the country at the behest of the Government to carry out a rolling valuation. The amendment has two great virtues. It is not perfect, but it is much better than nothing, and it demonstrates the imagination that Conservatives bring to the subject, given our constituents' frustration with the fact that the Government insist on maintaining an unfair system that penalises many of them.

Mr. Greg Knight: You will be aware, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I raised my concern at the outset about the absence of a copy of the Local Government Finance Act 1992. May I place on record my gratitude to you, the Speaker, the Clerks of the House and everyone involved in producing that document? In the past few minutes I have received a hot copy fresh off the photocopier. It is nearly 2 in thick, and consists of more than 200 pages, so I do not know how I am supposed to digest it while addressing the House. I believe that the Speaker will support my view that that must never be allowed to happen again.

Mr. Forth: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's frustration. Even though his ability to digest material his legendary, he may wish to concentrate on the provisions in the Act that are explicitly referred to in the Bill and the amendment. I have done a little work on that, and I hope to help the House with the fruits of my labour later. If my right hon. Friend concentrated on section 22 of the Act, referring to section 21 on which it rests, that would naturally lead him to the amendment and the Bill itself. My right hon. Friend need not be alarmed—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) has had sufficient help.

Mr. Knight: I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) for his advice, and I shall peruse the Act in greater detail as we proceed. However, given that I asked for a copy yesterday, it is not satisfactory to have to mug up and refresh my memory of an Act of Parliament that I helped to steer through the House as a Whip.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) for initiating this debate. Whatever one's view of the sloppy drafting of his amendment, this is an important debate. There are merits in the broad principle of his amendment, because it has often been impossible for Governments to conduct national revaluations. The revaluation scheduled for 1938 was deferred for two years, but the second world war broke out, so it never took place. A revaluation was scheduled for 1952, but it was deferred until 1953, and was eventually carried out in 1956. A revaluation was scheduled for 1961 under a Conservative Government, but it was deferred until 1963. The Labour Government that followed deferred the 1968 revaluation.—[Interruption.] Indeed, that Government did not carry out a revaluation at all, and it was Edward Heath's Conservative Government who carried out a revaluation in 1973. Throughout our history, therefore, there have been occasional problems with getting national revaluations off the ground. If we cannot undertake a national revaluation we should consider whether it is worth undertaking a regional or partial revaluation.

I therefore do not oppose the principle behind my hon. Friend's amendment but, given its poor drafting, I am afraid that I cannot support him. I have explained why in my interventions. A politically motivated or malevolent Secretary of State, for example, may decide to make a blatant political order to carry out a revaluation of properties in areas that voted for another political party—perhaps the Conservatives or the Liberal Democrats—to teach the residents a lesson. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst asked about judicial review, but I am not confident that such a review would work in those circumstances, because that Minister would be unlikely to say publicly that the basis of his decision was his wish to punish voters, even though that was the motivation behind his order.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The right hon. Gentleman is talking about a politically motivated or malevolent Secretary of State. He was the well-regarded MP for Derby, North when, for many years, the Conservative Government were politically motivated against my adjacent county of Leicestershire. Does he not agree that they were notorious for their politically motivated council funding?

Mr. Knight: You will stop me if I stray too far in responding to that question, Madam Deputy Speaker. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's allegation. For a period, I was sponsor Minister of the city of Derby, and I did whatever I could, whenever I could, to bring more money and investment into the city.

Make no mistake that bullying takes place. Birmingham city council has removed one of the Government's precious bus lanes to reduce congestion, and the Secretary of State has threatened the council with loss of grant unless it reinstates that lane. Ministers do make threats to local authorities, so my concern is not exaggerated or far-fetched.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley described me as paranoid on this issue. I would put it this way: I am rightly concerned about corruption of power. Are we to pass a sloppily drafted amendment that gives a Secretary of State the unfettered right to make an order in any circumstances that he chooses? The amendment puts no limitations on the exercise of his power; nor does it say that he has to consider what has happened to property values or to population movement. I am deeply concerned that the provision could be used in an unfair way.

2.30 pm

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend is making a serious statement and, more serious, it is now almost universally accepted that such pressure, such institutional corruption, is part and parcel of the means by which the Government operate.

Mr. Knight: I am making a serious point and I do not make it lightly. In the process of legislating, we should come to the Chamber to put our concerns on record. I have some sympathy with the principle behind the amendment, but because the House is not a debating society and because we are making legislation, I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley that I cannot support him if he pushes the amendment to a vote. I fear that, potentially, the amendment would give unbridled power to the Secretary of State, who might use it in a malicious way against certain local authorities.

Mr. Gummer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the other problem is that the amendment could be a means whereby the Secretary of State could cover up the fact that the real reason for the heavy cost of local government in particular areas was the manipulation of the grant, rather than the incidence of the council tax?

Mr. Knight: That is another of my concerns. Given the wording of the amendment, I am not satisfied with the phraseology that my hon. Friend has used. He says that the Secretary of State may make an "order . . . in relation to an individual billing authority, a group of adjoining billing authorities".

I cannot grasp why my hon. Friend felt it necessary to use the words "adjoining billing authorities". If the amendment merely referred to a number of billing authorities and omitted "adjoining", I could understand that approach. As I said when I intervened on him earlier, the use of a limiting word in the amendment means that the Secretary of State may not be able to make orders for comparable billing authorities.

In my view, the drafting of the amendment is dangerously defective. For that reason, it cannot be supported.

Mr. Francois: From memory, I think that it was Lord Acton who said that power corrupts and that absolute power corrupts absolutely. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the problem with the amendment is that it does not give the Secretary of State absolute power, but gives him too much power? That is not counter-balanced by a requirement that a request for revaluation must be seen to have come from the local authority or authorities in question. Does my right hon. Friend share my concern?

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend is right; I share his concerns. He has put his finger on the problem. If the amendment stated that an order may be made only where a billing authority has made the request, all my objections would disappear. It is as simple as that. It is a dangerous precedent if a Secretary of State can instigate a review without a local authority wanting it. That is why I cannot support the amendment.

David Taylor: I aim to be of assistance to the right hon. Gentleman. The amendment refers to "adjoining . . . authorities". It was pretty well known during the period of London government when the Conservative party was in power that particular favour was shown to what I believe are adjoining authorities, at one point at least, of Westminster and Wandsworth. Are we to allow for the possibility of that approach in future, with generosity and the distribution of largesse on the part of a Tory Government, should there ever be one in the first half of this new century?

Mr. Knight: In this debate I have left my political axe outside the Chamber. I would be against the amendment being put into the Bill even if we had a Conservative Government. It is our duty to build into legislation the checks and balances that prevent a Minister from any political party from abusing his position.

Sir Paul Beresford: Perhaps I can help my right hon. Friend with the intervention of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), which was geographically and factually wrong. In the distribution of council tax, the inner London area—Wandsworth and Westminster—regularly received the lowest or second lowest grants.

Mr. Knight: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for that intervention.

Mr. Binley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has undertaken a redistribution from struggling midland counties to northern counties that are in many respects better off in terms of local government grant, exactly as has been described?

Mr. Knight: Indeed—and the drafting of amendment No. 3 would allow the Deputy Prime Minister to pursue a regional policy. He could decide to order a revaluation in a whole region.

When considering whether we should allow a piecemeal approach, we should consider the wider issues of national planning. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) made a good point in saying that staff costs could be blown out of all proportion when a national revaluation was deferred. I accept that that would not be a consideration if amendment No. 3 were passed, because the staff costs would be much lower, but I do wonder why those carrying out the task must be employees of the state. Why not involve the private sector? Why can the service not be bought for the period during which it is required? That, however, is a debate for another day.

Another defect of the amendment is that it does not provide for an appeal process. If the Secretary of State is to instigate the review and if it will not rely on a trigger from a local authority, the local authority ought at least to have a voice. It should at least be able to ask not to be made to undertake a revaluation as a billing authority, and to list its reasons for not wishing to undertake the revaluation. The Secretary of State should then be obliged to consider those reasons.

Mr. Woolas: Far be it from me to be fair to the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), but I assume that he intended the order to be subject to parliamentary approval.

Sir Paul Beresford: That is right.

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend says, sotto voce, that that is right, but I am not reassured. That is not what I mean by an appeal process. We all know what would happen: a Secretary of State who made an order, perhaps for the wrong reasons, would simply whip members of his party to vote it through. We see that time and again. It is not an appeal process; it is what the late Lord Hailsham described as elective dictatorship, and I do not regard it as a satisfactory safeguard. If we are to accept the principle of amendment No. 3, we need a proper appeal process whereby the Secretary of State's decision can be challenged and he can be required to reveal why he has made the order. We have not yet reached amendment No. 4, but it at least requires the Secretary of State to "give reasons for his decision".

Amendment No. 3 does not, and that is yet another area in which it is deficient.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley did the House a service by allowing us to debate this issue, but the wording of his amendment renders it a wholly unsatisfactory vehicle, and I hope that he will withdraw it. Someone asked earlier why we should not refer it to the Lyons committee, but I should prefer it to be withdrawn completely, and I should like a rethink to take place.

Mr. Gummer: I too thank Mr. Speaker for ensuring that we were provided with the Local Government Finance Act 1992, on which the amendments rest. I hope that the House will never again have to debate without such information. I also hope that the cost of providing it, which must have been considerable, will be met not from the House of Commons appropriation but by the Minister, because it was incurred as a result of a change in the order of today's business. Governments should take seriously the cost of changes that are often made for not altogether wholesome reasons. I like to know that if people cause the cost, they pay the cost.

This is an important amendment and I came into the Chamber, what now seems like a long time ago, to support it—but the more I have heard the debate, the more I think that there are some key issues that need to be teased out. I hope that I can encourage the Minister to take the gravamen of the proposal seriously, even if he does not accept the format in which it is presented.

Mr. Greg Knight: I agree with my right hon. Friend that this is an important debate—so does he share my disgust that at this moment in our proceedings, there is not one Labour Back Bencher, apart from a Parliamentary Private Secretary, in the Chamber?

Mr. Gummer: I was not going to draw attention to that. It was so surprising that a matter of such importance to the future of local government had not attracted even one person with any interest in the subject from the Labour Benches, that I had almost forgotten how to say so in a polite manner. That is outrageous—unequalled, I would have thought. I cannot remember a local government debate of this nature in which the Government party has not had a single Back Bencher here. Perhaps they are all as confused as the one whom we heard from earlier—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The right hon. Gentleman is a seasoned speaker in this House, and I think that he would now like to come to the amendment before us.

Mr. Gummer: I quite agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you will have noticed, I was meaning to go on without mentioning the absence of Government Members, but I was led astray by my right hon. Friend. May I suggest, however, that the debate has been extremely valuable, and that you have missed a great treat by not having been in the Chair for most of it? At stake is an issue of huge importance, concerning the complex way in which the local government impost relates to the central Government grant.

The difficulty that my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) has addressed in his amendment is the difficulty that anybody has in understanding why the council tax in his particular locality is what it is. Council tax is subject to three differing pressures, one of which my hon. Friend has tried to address. The first, of course, is what the Government decide is a suitable sum for that local authority to have in grant. The second is what the local authority decides is a suitable sum to raise in council tax. The third is the incidence of that council tax as spread over the whole area.

My hon. Friend talked about the Government's determination in the Bill. I agree with that determination, and I only wish that the Government had agreed with me on the hustings in my constituency, when I explained so clearly why a revaluation would be entirely wrong at that time. I was told by my opponent, who belonged—and, I think, still does belong—to the Labour party, that a valuation was essential. As a country councillor, he was determined to explain to me that I did not understand the issue, and why we had to have a valuation. Now I understand that it was not essential, and that despite being a county councillor, he was wrong. I only hope that the Minister has written to him to explain how foolish he was to have accepted that doctrine from the Labour party during the election campaign.

Now there will not be a revaluation for the foreseeable future. However, in certain specific parts of the country there will be significant, untoward, out-of-kilter changes for houses that have been built relatively recently. That will cause real local problems, for which the Minister has no remedy—and my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley has been trying to produce a remedy for him.

Mr. Woolas: The right hon. Gentleman is of course a former Secretary of State and he knows what he is talking about. Does he agree that the valuation process, which has been postponed, is necessary if one is to have a property tax? Alternatively, does he agree with what I understand to be his party's policy, which is that no valuation is required?

2.45 pm

Mr. Gummer: One of the pleasures of being a Back Bencher is that one does not have to be too closely acquainted with the minutiae of the way in which a particular issue has been approached by whomsoever happens to be in charge of that area at a given time. [Laughter.] The Minister must therefore ask others whether I am in that sense in order or out of order; you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will of course ensure that I am in order in the parliamentary sense. I simply say that if one is to have a property tax, one must have a valuation system. That seems obvious, and in saying so I do not think that I am falling out with anyone. There might be a question as to when one introduces such a system. We did not say that we should never have one; we said, rightly, that we should not have one in those circumstances.

The Minister can say all sorts of things but the truth is that, as we all know, we were right about this issue at the election, he was wrong and he has now come to our opinion. We are now going to discuss what difficulties even our earlier, right decision throw up. I am merely suggesting, from what I consider a non-partisan position, that the Minister needs some mechanism. We have to ask ourselves whether the mechanism suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley is the right one. If it is not, we must get the Minister to take that part of the mechanism which is of value, and perhaps table an amendment himself in another place. That is the right way to proceed.

David Taylor: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is acceptable for a Back Bencher to be detached from the minutiae of the matter under discussion. Is he surprised to learn that just a moment or two ago, the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), a former leader of Wandsworth borough council, "corrected" my geography by saying that Wandsworth and Westminster are not adjacent. They are adjacent, as the House of Commons Library has just demonstrated for me. Nine Elms faces Pimlico across the river. I wanted to put that correction of the hon. Gentleman's false correction on the record.

Mr. Gummer: I do not think it right for me to deal with the geographical issue that the hon. Gentleman raises, but the essence of his point is entirely wrong. Having attacked the money that went to Westminster year in, year out when the Conservatives were in power, on taking office this Labour Government found that the figures were absolutely right, and that they had to stick by the truth of the then Government's position. The hon. Gentleman has forgotten what has happened in the past eight years and he ought to remember it.

As I said, if we are to have a property tax, we must have a valuation system. I am in favour of a property tax, having looked at every other system. I know that it would be wrong to discuss those systems now, but I must tell the Liberal Democrats that the worst system that I came across was local income tax. It was—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A little while ago, the right hon. Gentleman said that I had missed a lot of a very interesting debate. I have been following it very closely from outside the Chamber—as, of course, I always do with such debates—and I have noticed the number of times that Members have had to be called to order to ensure that they address the amendment. I am doing that yet again to the right hon. Gentleman, and I tell all Members that I want them to speak to the amendment; otherwise, I shall pull them up rather sharply.

Mr. Gummer: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I should have phrased my argument in the following, slightly different way. Because I find the alternative so impossible, it is very important to make this system work, which is why this amendment is so crucial. It would not be so crucial were it not for the fact that, if we do not make the council tax arrangements work effectively, we will not have a better alternative. So this debate is as important as I suggested to you that it was, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when you first took the Chair.

So the issue is: how do we approach this part of the mix that makes the council tax? The council tax is a property tax. Few countries have been able to handle taxation without some form of property tax. Ireland tried to do without one, but I suspect that it has been trying to change back—a difficult thing to do. The real problem was identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois). He rightly said that he represented the Thames Gateway, where the changes promised—if that word is not too generous—by the Deputy Prime Minister will make this problem especially difficult.

The difficulty is that perception and reality are often very far removed from each other when the system involves so many components working together. I do not know about the Minister's constituency—or yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker—but I am willing to bet that not many people in anyone's area would be able to explain the interpenetration of the various elements, year on year. Therefore, we need to make the system more transparent rather than less transparent.

Mr. Francois: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the great complexity of the system makes people wary about revaluation, especially after what happened in Wales? When we shifted from standard spending assessment to formula spending share as a mechanism to provide grant to local authorities, council tax rose by so much in the south-east that people believed that a revaluation in England would be, in a sense, bent. That is why they were so resistant to it in many parts of the south-east of England.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) might be tempted again from the straight and narrow. I hope that he will not be.

Mr. Gummer: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend has made his point, and I agree with it, but I shall not go down that route.

How do we make the process more transparent? One way is proposed in the amendment. Where it is obvious that the incidence of the council tax has ceased to reflect properly the nature of the area involved, there needs to be a way to remedy that by means of a local revaluation. That is the justification behind this proposal.

However, if it is a question of perception, whose perception matters? I disagree with my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) about that. He and I worked at the Department of the Environment in close harmony and, as far as I am concerned at least, with considerable pleasure. However, in this instance, I believe that he has thought too much about the central issue, and too little about the local issue. Because of that, in the end I decided that I could not support the amendment quite as I had hoped.

If there is a perception of unfairness of incidence in a locality, local people should be able to ask, through the local council, for a revaluation. Councils in East Dorset, Christchurch, Suffolk Coastal or Waveney could say, "We want a revaluation because we can't fairly deal with our population as a result of the huge change that has taken place. We need, therefore, to check out the incidence of the council tax, so as to be fair to the people who elect us."

In such circumstances, I believe that it should be necessary for the Secretary of State to allow a revaluation. He should not be able to say, "You can ask, but I'm not going to do it." He should be required to allow the revaluation, because many people outside the House may be surprised by the mechanisms available to the Secretary of State to put pressure on people. It is for that reason that I dissent about the amendment.

I cannot go into detail, for fear of straying out of order, but we have been talking about the Thames Gateway in particular. In that area, it might not be possible to build many of the houses intended because of the flood plain. What would happen if the Deputy Prime Minister insisted that the houses were built and the insurance industry refused to insure them? The valuation situation would then be very complex, but it would be localised, not nationalised. At the moment, the Secretary of State has outrageously bamboozled the insurance industry by ensuring that the life offices put pressure on those that insure houses by saying, "If you get uppity with the Secretary of State, we will be in trouble over pensions provision, so don't do it." We all know the institutional corruption that goes on—Governments use their power over one lot to make others not do something. I hope that the insurance industry will develop some toughness in that area.

If the houses are built in the Thames Gateway, their value will be crucially affected by whether they can be insured, and a local revaluation will be essential if there is to be fairness in the incidence of the tax. I hope that we do not reach that situation because, as an environmentalist, I do not want those houses to be built. I do not understand why we are trying to shove into the south-east of England houses that could, in today's world of communication, be spread more evenly over the nation. But then this is about the least environmental Government that we have had for a long time. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst does not help by holding up the one Bill that has been introduced that has been worth having. I hope that he will change his mind about that.

The local revaluation suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley would be essential if significant local changes occurred that needed to be taken into account. I note that even those who have opposed this particular formulation, who come from a local government background, have emphasised the need for such a change. It would therefore be foolish of the Government to avoid it.

This is an issue of transparency and perception. Therefore, one has to face up to the second difficulty that the amendment presents. It could be used for purposes totally other than those that were conceived. Some of those purposes might be reasonable, but would not be suitably covered by this amendment. Let us for a moment accept that it might be sensible to have an elite group of people who went round the country carrying out valuations, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggested, which might be cheaper. The people need not even be employed by the Valuation Office Agency, because they could be employed privately, or seconded, or paid for under some tender system.

[Mr. Gummer]

The trouble is that the amendment would give no guidance to the Secretary of State as to the basis on which that sequential activity should be performed. My hon. Friend, in explaining that, gave us to understand that that was not really his purpose for the amendment, although my right hon. Friend rightly identified it as a possible advantage. I would go further. One of the reasons I liked the amendment was because it would enable pilot schemes to be carried out in several places, so we would be able to see whether the perception of our constituents that a change in valuation would be unfair to them was true or not.

Indeed, one of the problems, Mr. Deputy Speaker—you represent a neighbouring constituency to mine—that we have all found in this debate, across party lines, is that people feared that whatever the valuation was, it would do them down. The only way to deal with such a fear may be to carry out a localised valuation in certain places that are sufficiently different so that one could discover whether revaluation had the effect in England that it had in Wales.

Of course the amendment would have an advantage. Unlike in Wales, where no ceiling was imposed and such things were not done in the same envelope, if a revaluation took place in an area, it would have to reach the same total that obtained before the reassessment realigned the weight on any property. The problem in Wales was that a lot more money came out at the other end. Of course, everyone knows that that is what the Government intended, which is why we opposed the revaluation in the first place.

3 pm

Such a system could be used for the valuable purpose that I propose, but only if regulations were laid down to ensure that it could not be misused. For example, a revaluation should be triggered only by the local authority, except if a pilot scheme was restricted to a certain number to ensure that it was used for the intended purpose. There is a disadvantage in the amendment, because we have not covered that issue and we should try to do so.

Mr. Greg Knight: That is an interesting argument. Is my right hon. Friend volunteering Suffolk for a pilot scheme?

Mr. Gummer: It would not be for me to volunteer my own county; it would be for the local authority to make those decisions. Indeed, just as I do not interfere in my local authority's decision making, I do not expect it to interfere in mine. That is why I felt strongly when the Government lent on chief constables in relation to the issue that we are not discussing now because the Government are ashamed of it. That is why we are debating the amendment and not that issue, but I will not continue down that line, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I may get into trouble.

I agree that localities would have to volunteer, but I suggest that, for the greater good, it may be necessary to give the Secretary of State a limited power to carry out a small number of pilot revaluations to discover whether the system was usable in the way that I propose.

I am worried about the amendment for a third reason. My hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley lost the House a little in explaining the amendment at the point at which he distinguished between the use of the valuation as means to share out locally the total bill and its use in the Government's hands as means to determine the grant. That is a complicated issue, and it is one of the very difficult issues that we face in trying to deal with our constituents. The amendment's transparency is insufficient to help my constituents to understand what is in any event a very detailed problem.

Hon. Members will remember that it has always been thought that there are three attributes that give one the right to read mediaeval philosophy. To understand the philosophy of the mediaeval schoolman, one must be able to understand the monetary compensatory amounts in the European Union's common agricultural policy, or the way in which grants under the previous rating system worked, or the present Government's grant-giving system. I am happy to say that I understand all three, but that has not given me a taste for mediaeval philosophy. That is merely an accident of history, but it leads me to believe that the amendment is deficient, because our constituents must be able to understand the legislation without also being enabled to read mediaeval philosophy. It seems to me that we must make the system easier for them.

The Minister will wind up the debate after having had the considerable benefit of hearing the wide range of views that Conservative Members have had to present owing to the total absence of Labour Members. He really cannot complain if I am slightly out of kilter with my Front-Bench colleagues, or that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire and my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley have different views. The Minister could have got us out of that problem by bringing some of his hon. Friends, who are known not always to agree with each other, into the Chamber to extend our understanding of how they get away with bigger grants than anyone on this side of the House—perhaps they are too ashamed to explain it.

Even though the Minister is bereft of support on the Labour Benches—[Interruption.] Of course, the hon. Member for Ipswich (Chris Mole) is sitting behind the Minister. The hon. Gentleman's tenacious support for Government policy, contrary to the interests of his constituents, has got him where he is, and will no doubt get him further very soon. That is why he has not been fighting for his local hospital, although I have. I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but that is one sentence that in your heart you will find it hard to attack me for. Hon. Members should understand that Mr. Deputy Speaker and I share the same hospital.

The Minister must understand that the real issue is his ability to meet people's needs. I happen to like him, and do not think that he has been too involved in some of the shenanigans that have been going on. I happen to think that they have almost entirely come about due to the Deputy Prime Minister, for whom shenanigans are a way of life.

I think that the Minister wants to make the system, such as it is, as effective as possible and that he wants to have the powers necessary for that. He ought to have limited powers to be able to use such a technique for what I call polling testing—to find out whether it works—because that is a useful thing in government. He should also have the duty to enable a local authority that wants a local revaluation to carry it out, but I do not want him to have the powers that amendment No. 3 would give him.

I am drawing to the end of my speech, but my difficulty now is knowing what to do. If the Minister says that he will take on board the points that we have made and look favourably on trying to finding a better-suited mechanism through which he could give himself the elbow room that he needs—given the Lyons inquiry and the like—but that would not require revaluation for a property tax for some time, perhaps along the lines of that which I humbly presented, which would not be too difficult to implement, I know exactly what I will do: I will ask my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley not to press the amendment to a Division. However, if the Minister says, "No, I certainly will not. What a load of old rubbish; we don't want that at all," my difficulty is that if I do not support the amendment, I will not have made the point that something must be done.

I am grateful for having the opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to explain the basis on which I have approached the matter. Despite all my caveats, if the amendment is pressed to a Division, I will have to vote for it so that the Minister understands that the issue cannot be escaped. Their lordships will understand that they should address the matter, albeit perhaps more elegantly than my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley had time to do—I put that as delicately as I can because I do not want to make him unhappy. By that time, perhaps their lordships will have proper copies of the 1992 Act so that they will know what to do.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I was in the Chamber at the beginning of this illuminating debate, but had to leave to consider a statutory instrument. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the amendment would cover all the properties whose values have risen during the course of the debate?

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman gets in touch with some property people, he will find that prices are rising and falling almost simultaneously. I declare an interest as a regular columnist for the Estates Gazette, which is one reason why I know a little bit about these matters. It is now more difficult to forecast property prices because they are going in different directions in different places and in different bands. His question is more complex than it appears, so I shall not answer it—and if I did, I suspect that you would stop me, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I believe that a change has to take place, but that it is impossible to give the powers in the amendment to the Government because in the distribution of grant and of national health service funds and in a range of other examples, they have shown that they make party political and not objective decisions. I do not know of a Government of any kind—Labour, Conservative or, looking back a long time, Liberal—who have behaved as the present Government have done. That is an extremely sad thing for our democracy, because it undermines the ability to support this place and the way in which our democratic system works. It is noticeable that, for example, the major criterion in determining how much money goes to the NHS is no longer age, but deprivation, which is much more difficult to fix but has to do with the problems affecting a particular area, which may have nothing to do with health. The result—surprise, surprise—is that the areas with some of the oldest populations in the country do not get as much as some of the areas where there are far fewer health problems. That happens because of the technique that has been introduced.

I cannot accept the amendment because I cannot trust the present Government. To be fair to the Minister, I do not take him in the same way, but like my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire, I do not believe that this House should trust any Government with any powers that it can avoid giving them. Governments exist to do as little as possible, not as much as possible, and the House must keep in its hands the powers of ensuring that Governments behave properly. Ultimately, that is why I am most unhappy about the amendment. Whether a Government are Tory or Labour—I am referring to likely Governments—they should not be trusted with the powers in the amendment, and the present Government should certainly not be trusted with anything that would enable them to manipulate the system for party political purposes. I do not want them to be tempted down a road that they are already further down than any previous Government.

If the Minister assures me that he will give the matter his consideration, make some changes and table an amendment, I shall seek to ensure that the amendment is not pressed to a vote, and if it is pressed I shall vote against it. If, on the other hand, he cannot do that, I shall hope that the amendment is pressed and vote in favour of it.

3.15 pm

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am delighted to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). To make the arid subject of local government finance cogent and amusing shows what considerable skill and experience he has.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) has done the House a huge service, because we have had an interesting and much needed debate this afternoon, but if he presses his amendment to a vote I shall probably not vote with him. My main reason for not supporting the amendment is that I believe that it is premature. The Government set up Sir Michael Lyons' inquiry to look into local government finance and it will be interesting to see what Sir Michael comes up with; only then, after careful consideration, should we decide what is to be done.

Local government finance has got into an almighty muddle. When council tax accounted for a relatively small proportion of income, people were not so worried, but now that it takes up so much greater a proportion of income—particularly for people on fixed incomes such as pensioners and other poor people—it is becoming a much greater problem. Any property tax should, as far as possible, reflect open market value. My hon. Friend's amendment is therefore on the right lines—although, as many of my hon. Friends have said this afternoon, it would have been much better and would more accurately have reflected my party's policy on the matter if it had allowed local authorities, not the Secretary of State, to make the decision.

I have considerable worries about the Secretary of State being able to make such an order. If the Minister is inclined to accept the amendment, will he tell us on what basis the Secretary of State would make an order obliging an individual authority or a group of authorities to undertake revaluations? The measure amends section 22 of Local Government Finance Act 1992, as amended by the Local Government Act 2003, and we are seeking again to amend that section.

On what basis would the Secretary of State make such an order? I can think of a number of reasons why he might, but I wish to probe the matter further. In an area where, when the council tax was originally introduced, property prices were not rising at anything like the present rate, it was envisaged that properties would be put into a band and, provided they were put into the correct band, all properties would increase in price relative to each other. However, in the past few years property prices, particularly in the south of England and the commuter belt of London, have increased very fast. That has led to a huge disparity not only within individual billing authorities, but between billing authorities.

As I mentioned in an intervention, new properties are immediately put on to the valuation list in their full market band, whereas older properties are not. That immediately leads to a distortion. One could see good reason for ordering a revaluation in an authority that had had fast rising prices, such as my own in Cotswold, or in another authority—perhaps that of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley)—where a large number of new properties had been built. Those are two good reasons for ordering a revaluation. A third reason might be that large numbers of properties had been extended. The moment a property is extended, it tends to be revalued and put in an upper band. Because of the distortion of stamp duty, many people are finding it cheaper to extend their property than to do what they would have done in the old days—sell a smaller property and buy a bigger one. That is happening to a lesser and lesser extent.

Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that another reason could be that property values have changed and there are two houses or more in the same turning with different bandings? Local authorities should have the right to alter that, so that it is fairer for everyone.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I entirely agree. I shall return to that, if my hon. Friend will allow me, a little later in my speech when I deal with the problem of appeals and the cost of appeals.

Mr. Chope: Is my hon. Friend sure that if a new house is built, it is valued at today's price rather than the 1991 price? If he is right about that, almost all new houses would be in bands G and H.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend raised that with me privately earlier. I should like to research the point further. I hesitate to contradict somebody as knowledgeable as my hon. Friend. He may well be right.

A fifth reason for ordering revaluations in a particular local authority is that a large number of properties are bought and sold. A property can be revalued if its original value is severely out of kilter with its price when it is bought and sold. In the south of England, for example, many more properties are bought and sold in an individual billing authority than in some of the more northern authorities.

Those are some of the reasons for revaluations. I should like the Minister to tell us why he would want to order an individual billing authority to undertake a revaluation. What about the distortion that would cause between one authority and its neighbouring authorities?

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) has mentioned that his constituency contains two billing authorities. My constituency also contains two billing authorities: Cotswold district council, where property prices tend to go up very quickly—the rate of growth is probably one of the highest in the United Kingdom—and Stroud district council, where property prices are not increasing so quickly. Under the amendment—this is why I am going to vote against it—the Secretary of State might order a revaluation for the Cotswold area, but not for the Stroud area. In those circumstances, what would happen to properties on the border? What would happen to people who live in Cotswold and who have low-paid jobs in Stroud? All sorts of distortions could emerge.

Mr. Francois: May I suggest another potential category—areas in which large numbers of houses have been demolished? I am sceptical about the Government's programme of demolishing houses, particularly in the midlands and the north of England, and I am not sure whether they are doing the right thing. Such demolitions could affect other properties in the area, in which case residents might want a revaluation.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend, who has a huge knowledge of the subject, must be clairvoyant, because he has read my mind and anticipated my next point.

A fifth reason to revalue an individual billing authority is because it contains either a large number of empty properties or, as my hon. Friend has said, a large number of properties that have been demolished. A large number of such properties tends to distort the lists and make them out of date, and my central theme this afternoon is that lists should be up to date because values should reflect the amount of tax paid.

A sixth reason why the Secretary of State might want to instruct billing authorities to carry out revaluations is because the area contains a large number of second homes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) knows, because he and I served on the Committee that considered the Local Government Act 2003, it is now possible for local authorities to exercise their discretion and charge council tax on second homes by abolishing up to 90 per cent. of the rebate, which means that people pay almost full council tax. That has happened in Cotswold, where people pay nearly full council tax on their second homes. If there is a large number of second homes in a local authority area, it can cause distortion, which is another reason why the Secretary of State might want to order a revaluation.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us how such revaluations will work. Indeed, I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley will have the opportunity to sum up amendment No. 3, so perhaps he, too, will tell us how such revaluations will work. I am worried about the timing of the Secretary of State making an order because the amendment does not deal with timing. From when would the Secretary of State make an order and for how long would the listing agency have to compile the lists? If the lists were very out of date in the six categories that I have mentioned, the task would be much greater than that in authorities in which the lists are up to date—[Interruption.] I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), who no doubt has an excellent new angle.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): With respect to my hon. Friend's fifth category—authorities in which there has been a great deal of demolition—it would not take very long to compile the list.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Indeed, it would not. Nevertheless, if demolitions had occurred, presumably new buildings would have been constructed, and they would need complete revaluation, which would be an onerous task.

Anne Main: If a peripatetic group of valuers were employed to save money, we would be short of staff if a rash of applications occurred.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Indeed. In her customary way, my hon. Friend has made a good point. The Valuation Office Agency is staffed on a regional basis. If there were a lot of revaluations in, for example, the north-west, and if the Government in their wisdom had redirected local authority staff towards the north-east, which they tend to do, we would find ourselves in a muddle.

Sir Paul Beresford: My hon. Friend will have heard my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) explain the use of the private sector, which I should have thought would interest him.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: That is an interesting point. I reiterate my declaration in the Register of Members' Interests that I am a fellow of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, and I think it an excellent idea to contract out some revaluation work. I seem to have unwittingly provided the very reason why it should happen—because then the Valuation Office Agency would not need such a huge permanent overhead. I am beginning to think that my hon. Friend's amendment might not be so bad after all. When there was a rash of revaluation, it would be a good idea for the private sector to do some of the work.

I want to move on to the next section of my speech—

Mr. Greg Knight: Before my hon. Friend moves on, can I take him back to an argument of his that I did not find very convincing? Where there has been demolition in an area that is in the course of being redeveloped, is not there a good case for not having a revaluation but waiting until it is fully redeveloped, because that will have a huge effect on property prices?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My right hon. Friend makes a partly good point. When I held my party's housing and inner-city brief, I found that large-scale redevelopments in areas such as Moss Side in Manchester tended to take place over several years. It is highly unlikely that the entire demolition in a redevelopment of any size would take place in one go—it would be phased over a number of years. The effectiveness of the revaluation in dealing with the problem that my right hon. Friend mentions would depend on the stage in that process at which it was ordered. Any big redevelopment of that kind would have areas that had been demolished and rebuilt, areas that had been demolished but not rebuilt, and areas still waiting to be demolished. The point at which the revaluation was ordered would be a matter of judgment.

Mr. Greg Knight: Does my hon. Friend accept that that does not necessarily have to be the case? In some developments, the whole area is cleared at once—for example, railway marshalling yards, where the land is cleared and then brought into use all in one go.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: That is entirely possible. Of course, in the bigger cities the scale becomes bigger. That would have to be considered carefully. I am sure that the Minister will tell us whether it is one of the factors that he would take into account in ordering a revaluation.

Mr. Binley: Does not this whole debate make the argument for introducing more flexibility into the whole system of revaluation, which is the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) is making in his amendment?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Yes, with one gigantic caveat—that it should not be ordered by the Secretary of State but be in the control and at the discretion of individual local authorities. Those of us who believe in localism and in local government per se must agree with the democratic system whereby we elect local councils such as that of my hon. Friend. I am aware of the excellent work that he has done, and continues to do, in Northampton. We elect such people to do this work on behalf of us, the people, and we should hold them accountable for the decisions that they make. If they make the right decisions, they will be re-elected. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will be re-elected for many years to come.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): In the light of my hon. Friend's professional and political experience, is it his view that large-scale demolition would force the value of local properties up or down?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I was about to come to that point. My hon. Friend must be clairvoyant, too, because he has read my mind and anticipated the next section of my speech.

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

The subject of the valuation base is very interesting, if dry. The whole business of local government finance is incredibly complicated. It involves about 200 different sections, including algorithms and all sorts of complicated mathematical formulae, one of which relates to the council tax. House prices are rising in almost all areas in the United Kingdom and that means that the valuation base would probably increase on revaluation. I suspect that that would happen because the general area would improve. Moss Side is a prime example of such improvement. Houses were demolished, new houses were built and green parks, new schools and new doctors' surgeries were created, thus improving the whole area to the extent that one of the most crime-ridden areas in Europe is now a pleasant place to live. The private sector has built houses in the area that sell for a great a deal of money. That proves what successful wholesale refurbishment of an area can do. I suspect that if an area were sensitively demolished and refurbished, the council tax base would increase.

3.30 pm

I want to make another important point about the increase in the council tax base. My hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley did not agree, but the complicated algorithms and formulae that are used to calculate the rate support grant settlement include a redistribution mechanism if the valuation tax base is higher than average. For example, areas such as the Cotswolds, where the council tax base is high, lose out on the rate support grant settlement because some of our council tax is redistributed. The Government redistribute from areas with high council tax bases to areas with lower council tax bases.

Anne Main: I am sure that my hon. Friend shares my concern that areas that are deemed wealthy contain areas of relative deprivation. They will be hit even worse by the measure.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is a clairvoyant.

Mr. Hoban: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I should like to answer my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Anne Main). I am flattered that so many colleagues wish to intervene on me. It shows that my speech is either very bad or raises more questions than it solves.

Mr. Swayne: The latter.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans made a good point. The core theme of my speech is that a property tax must reflect market value as closely as possible. If we allow them to get out of kilter, we create increasing unfairness in the system. One unfairness affects people on fixed incomes, who tend to be fixed in their houses. If their houses become relatively more valuable than other houses, the system is unfair to them, and especially to retired people. The third highest number of people aged over 85 in the country live in the Cotswolds, and the problem therefore worries me greatly. That is one reason for keeping the matter reviewed and up to date.

Mr. Hoban: My hon. Friend is making an excellent speech, but I echo the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) that it raises many questions. His explanation of the equalisation system suggests that local authorities whose rateable value is below average have a disincentive to go for revaluation, because if their council tax base increases they would lose the benefit of the transfers from south to north that penalise council tax payers in my constituency.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend has hit the bull's eye. That is what is wrong with the amendment. I believe that the Secretary of State will use the power for the wrong reasons and my hon. Friend outlines one of them. I should therefore like the power to be vested in local authorities because they know what is best for the area and whether they should order such a power. My hon. Friend raises a genuine, worrying possibility.

Mr. Swayne: My fear is that whether the power is ordered by the local authority or the Secretary of State, it may inadvertently have the same effect. The Secretary of State could order it to cause a transfer of resources, but even if the local authority ordered it for some other purpose, it could have the same effect. Local authorities would not wish to use such a power lightly.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Indeed, I made it earlier in an intervention. The Secretary of State could use the power for punitive reasons. For example, instead of council tax capping an authority, he could use the threat of the power to encourage it to keep its percentage increase of council tax down to a level that he deemed acceptable. Again, I would think that totally reprehensible, but one can imagine a certain Secretary of State—not the Minister for Local Government—who is very honourable, doing exactly what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. Bone: As I said earlier in the debate, I have a particular interest in this matter because Wellingborough has had the biggest increase in council tax since the council tax was introduced. My concern is that the proposal would be a backdoor way of increasing the amount that my constituents have to pay in council tax.

Sir Paul Beresford rose—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I will give way to my hon. Friend in a moment, although I think that I can answer what he is about to say—that a revaluation per se does not necessarily give rise to an increase in council tax, although it probably will do so for the very reasons that I mentioned. Even if it does not give rise to an increase in council tax immediately, the revenue support grant will be reduced to support the redistribution mechanism about which I have talked. I therefore have a lot of sympathy with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone). I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley wants to contradict me.

Sir Paul Beresford: I thank my hon. Friend for the opportunity to do so. I think that he fails to understand something that I have stressed time and again. The aim of a revaluation locally is a fairer distribution within the local area, but a national revaluation will make a difference to the way in which the grant is distributed, which was also a point that I made. Ability to pay should therefore be estimated on a basis of tax paid or income earned within billing areas, which has already been done by the Treasury.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend has huge knowledge of the way in which local government works and I am hesitant to contradict him. The way of the world, however, is that a revaluation will put considerable pressure on a local authority to increase council tax. To stick to the mechanism whereby council tax should not go up, if the revaluation causes an increase in the entire list the rate of council tax would have to go down. I cannot imagine many councils explaining to their council tax payers that they have put the rate of council tax down in order to keep the council tax the same. The way of the world is that the valuation would go up and the council tax rate would stay the same, so the actual amount payable would go up. I do not know whether my hon. Friend wants to come back on that point—he is shaking his head. It is not necessary. There we are. The whole purpose of this kind of debate is to get differences of opinion out in the open—parler, to speak, is what Parliament is all about. I am pleased to take part in this debate.

I have almost come to the end of my speech, but suffice it to say that when the Lyons' committee comes to report on this matter—next year, I gather, in tranches—I hope that the Government will take it very seriously. We have had some excellent debate this evening. There is a lot of merit in the principle proposed by my hon. Friend—that there should be an ability to have local revaluations, provided that it is under the democratic control of locally elected councillors. I hope that the Lyons' report will deal with that matter.

Before I conclude, I want to deal with the problem of appeals. At the moment, appeals only take place in the categories that I have mentioned. Were there either a local or national revaluation, however there would be a lot more appeals. That would increase the work of the Valuation Office Agency, and perhaps it would be useful to sub-contract that to the private sector, too. Appeals take time, cost money and cause a lot of angst to our constituents, so we should try to get valuation lists accurate. Where changes do not take place for individual streets and houses within individual streets, whatever revaluation takes place under my hon. Friend's proposal or any future Government proposal the number of individual differentials could be kept to a minimum and the number of appeals reduced.

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point about appeals and I should like to draw a brief analogy with the planning system. As resistance is hardening to many planning applications, particularly but not exclusively in the south-east, the Government are running out of planning inspectors to adjudicate, so it often takes more than a year to obtain a public inquiry as there are not enough planning inspectors to go round. That is becoming a real problem in the planning process, so does my hon. Friend agree that it could be an additional problem in the valuation system?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend, with his huge knowledge of such matters, is right. The Government are having to produce a special planning grant to try to encourage local authorities, such as mine, that are extremely short of staff due to high housing costs to employ planning officers. The same would apply for valuation officers in the listing authorities. Of course, as has rightly been suggested, the solution would be to employ the private sector to do the work. There would then be no need for a permanent overhead.

The amendment is premature. It contains many good intentions, as is always the case with proposals made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley. However, we should wait for Sir Michael Lyons to make his report and reconsider the amendment in due course.

Mr. Forth: This obviously essential debate has raised many subjects, and I should like to touch on a few of them in my brief contribution. I made a note that we have talked about local accountability and flexibility, the relative costs of different approaches, the impact of local developments, whether anomalies could be better corrected nationally or locally, the Valuation Office Agency and the role of the Secretary of State, to say nothing of appeals, which my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) has just mentioned. All are relevant and I shall touch on them as I go through my speech.

To set a context, we need to establish the provenance of the matter. That takes us back to the beginning of the debate, when Mr. Speaker very graciously and with enormous efficiency was able to produce the missing Act—if I may call it that: for we started the debate without the very Act on which the whole matter is based. Fortunately, we now have it and I want to ensure that the House understands that the amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) refers to an order under subsection (1A), which in turn refers to the Bill where subsection (1) of clause 1 refers to section 22B of the Local Government Finance Act 1992. That is where we got into immediate difficulty, as we were all wondering how on earth the debate could be properly conducted without the missing Act. It is fair to say that initially we were floundering in a mist, which is unusual for us as we are always clear-eyed and sharp of mind. On this occasion, however, we started at a disadvantage.

Mr. Speaker sorted all that. He waved his wand. He exuded and exerted his authority and the Act was quickly to hand.

Mr. Bone: I have a copy of the Act. It is a bundle of photocopied sheets and it looks as though there are about 1,000 pages to go through. Is not it a bit late to do that?

Mr. Forth: I shall help my hon. Friend. I am glad that he made that point, although I do not need to go through

[Mr. Forth]

1,000 pages—not yet anyway, unless I am tempted. I zeroed in with my laser-like focus on the very parts of the Act that form the foundation of the Bill from which the amendment flows. He will be able to see that direct connection, as I hope will everyone else in the Chamber.

In section 20, we find the genesis of the whole matter that we are discussing. It states:

"The Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall appoint a listing officer for each billing authority."

We can see immediately that the matters dealt with by the amendment flow from clause 20. Section 21 spells things out:

"The Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall . . . carry out . . . valuations of dwellings in England and Wales"

and

"furnish listing officers with such information obtained in carrying out the valuations or in the exercise of the powers conferred by section 27 below."

So we can begin to see how we are building up the approach, the philosophy and indeed the bureaucracy—to which we shall return later; it has of course been touched on already.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Does the 1992 Act require one commissioner for the whole country or individual commissioners for each separate authority? If there were more than one commissioner, they may have different interpretations of property values in their area. How can we be sure of achieving consistency?

3.45 pm

Mr. Forth: My perusal of the Act has not elicited that information, but I guess that, sadly, the reference is a general one. Section 21 states:

"Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall ... carry out valuations of dwellings in England and Wales".

We can infer a national approach from that provision, but section 22 states:

"In accordance with this Chapter, the listing officer for a billing authority shall compile, and then maintain, a list for the authority (to be called its valuation list)."

There is therefore a trickle-down from the national approach with which the commissioners are taxed to the local level, so we are getting into the nitty-gritty of the amendment and the Bill. The 1992 Act provides the infrastructure for the Bill and the amendment.

Mr. Francois: May I echo my right hon. Friend's concern about the fact that certain documents were not available earlier? The Bill refers to the Local Government Act 2003, copies of which were not available in the Chamber when we began our debate. On investigation, I discovered that it was available in the Vote Office. That is important, because the Bill repeals schedule 7 of that Act. Paragraph 52 (4) of the schedule states:

"In subsection (3) (instruments subject to negative resolution), in paragraph (a) (exceptions), after '11(3),' there is inserted '22B(3)(a),'."

I hope that that reassures my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Forth: I am glad that my hon. Friend mentioned section 22B of the Local Government Finance Act, as I have a copy of that provision in my hand. As always, he and I are working in concert. As was said in an intervention, section 22B says that the listing officer

"must take such steps as are reasonably practicable in the time available" to ensure that the list is accurately compiled. Such phraseology is worrying.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I raised this matter in an intervention. There has been much speculation in the press because, for the first time, listing officers may enter people's houses to take photographs. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is unacceptable? An Englishman's home should be his castle.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would not want the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) to be tempted down that road. The availability of the Act, too, is not quite as crucial as he has suggested. I am sure that hon. Members know where to find these things in the House of Commons.

Mr. Forth: I was simply referring to section 22B of the Local Government Finance Act, which I had in my hand. I thought that I was on safe territory, but these days, who knows?

My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) has identified a tension in the Bill. The listing officer can take such steps as are "reasonably practicable" to ensure accuracy. That is where the process that he described comes in. Indeed, it is where the heavy-booted tax inspectors come in.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is not the way in which the revaluation is undertaken in one billing authority, two billing authorities or nationwide relevant to the amendment? I favour a pilot scheme for revaluation in my own area, but I would not if I thought that regulation-ridden, form-filling, pen-pushing nincompoops were going around with cameras photographing my constituents' properties.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. My right hon. Friend knows all about his constituents' dwellings. Accuracy is important and there is a contradiction in section 22B. It refers to steps which are "reasonably practicable", goes on to talk about "the time available" and ends with a reference to accuracy. In many circumstances, the three requirements could well prove contradictory. The practicality is one thing and the timing another, but where does that leave the accuracy? Those contradictions have not been resolved, and even the amendment does not resolve them.

Labour as well as Conservative Members need to ask themselves to what extent they want to keep faith with the new mantra of localism. The practice has become popular among politicians of constantly reasserting how strongly they support the concept of local decision making, whether in schools, hospitals, local authorities or anywhere else. On the face of it, that is one of the attractions of the amendment. In some ways, it seems to move us in that direction by providing an opportunity for much more local decision making than has been available hitherto in this great valuation exercise. That in turn, however, poses a number of questions, some of which have already been touched on today.

The most fundamental of those questions is whether we believe that, in the whole business of valuation of properties to establish a tax base, a national approach is preferable to a local approach. I must admit that, having listened to the debate so far, I have not yet made up my mind. I can see both sides of the argument, which is rare for me. As many of my right hon. and hon. Friends pointed out, there must surely be a strong case for saying that, because this is potentially such a local matter, we must give priority to the local decision-making element that the amendment would allow. Many examples have been given, ranging from new build to demolition.

The new build case is clear. My expert friends have observed that, with new build, the valuation tends to be at current market rates, if I have understood them correctly. Some doubt has been raised about the effect of demolition, however. It could perhaps move us in either direction. While demolition in a blighted area that was then cleaned up and made into a community facility would undoubtedly enhance the area, I am sure we can all imagine other circumstances in which the effect would be the reverse.

Anne Main: I am glad that my right hon. Friend is exploring the anomalies. The Lyons report does not refer to assessment triggers such as whether a house is in a conservation area. In my constituency the small, modest two-bedroom cottages are in a conservation area, while the big five-bedroom houses are not.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has, typically, given a good example of problems that feature throughout the valuation exercise, and with which we must all grapple. That is part and parcel of the important debate about the extent to which we believe that local circumstances and variations should override any other consideration. Again, on the face of it the argument is appealing, but I have my worries. I shall say more in a moment about the malign political influence that has already been touched on.

Mr. Hoban: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Forth: I do not know whether my hon. Friend wants to talk about malign political influence, but I give way to him.

Mr. Hoban: Perhaps, in a way, I do want to talk about malign political influence. May I return to wholesale demolition and its effect on the charge base in an area? If it reduces the charge base, will not large equalisation payments be made to the local authority to enable it to provide services?

Mr. Forth: That worries me as well. Underlying much of the debate is the assumption that a beneficent Government, aware of the process described by my hon. Friend, would automatically compensate for it from central funds. I am not sure that we can make that assumption. Indeed, a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends have said that we must not make such assumptions about Governments, especially this Government. We have seen ample evidence of the Government's ability to move central funding so as adversely to affect the constituents of Conservative Members, so we have to be very careful about that.

Mr. Francois: There is another issue associated with demolition. With a relatively large-scale demolition, such as that of a big 1960s council estate, when modern properties are to be built, working with a housing association, the people who live on the estate first have to be moved out and found somewhere to live. In the jargon, that is called decanting. Then rebuilding begins, and gradually people start to move back into the new properties as they are built. That process can take several years, so at what point do we revalue? Presumably that will happen when the process is complete, so demolition could be going on for several years, and people would then have to wait for revaluation when the estate had been rebuilt, which could take a long time.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that suggestion, because he brings me to the timing of such activities, although I shall not myself get to that point quite yet. The "timeline" is, I think the modern phrase, and it is relevant.

Already we can see emerging a kaleidoscope of criteria on which the matter could be judged. There is the question, "How local do we get?" We have not explored that thoroughly yet, although it was touched on earlier. Are we talking about district authorities, counties or regional authorities? The amendment leaves all that open. We could have individual billing authorities, an undefined or, indeed, all billing authorities. Those are all options under the amendment. Who is to decide? I shall come to that rather later in my meanderings, but at this stage we shall leave it as an unanswered question.

"group of adjoining billing authorities",

Mr. Clifton-Brown: With large-scale demolitions, it is important to get some of the original tenants and owners back to the area to keep the community together. If they thought that their council tax would be increased as a result of a local revaluation, might that not be a disincentive for them to move in the first place?

Mr. Forth: Indeed it would, if people had that information available. However, the process by which that would come about—indeed, the very predictability of it—would depend on the factors that we are now debating with regard to the amendment, the Bill and the underpinning Act. The flow of the sort of information that my hon. Friend mentions would depend on who had the flexibility, and who made the decisions about the nature and timing of the revaluation. Until we can resolve such matters, the innocents will not have the information that they require. That should worry us all very much.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): When my right hon. Friend mentioned individual billing authorities or adjoining ones, he used the dread word "regional". Given the nature of so much guidance from the Government, would it be possible for a valuation officer to consider a group of adjoining authorities in such a way as to cross the magic Government office line, which the Government seem to reluctant to do?

Mr. Forth: One problem with the amendment is that it deliberately leaves that open, which gives rise to the danger that my hon. Friend points out. By using a phrase as vague as the amendment may leave too much flexibility, for the reasons that he describes. I shall come back to that thought later, because I do not want to get distracted. [Interruption.] Not half.

"a group of adjoining billing authorities",

Mr. Francois: I thank my right hon. Friend for his generosity in giving way again. Without wanting to get too bogged down in demolition, may I remind him that there is another important facet? To continue my example, if someone wants to knock down an old housing estate and redevelop it with a housing association, that often involves tenants voting for a transfer—say, from the council to the housing association. For the redevelopment to go ahead, the tenants have to vote for it positively. I have been involved in such cases.

In the real world, the tenants want to know what the additional costs will be—first, what will happen to their rent, and secondly and increasingly, what effect will moving into the new properties have on their council tax? That can affect how they vote in the ballot, and thus whether the whole redevelopment goes ahead. Does my right hon. Friend agree that having such information available could be important in allowing the redevelopment of some of the worst estates in the country?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is right and he displays yet again his intimate and profound knowledge of these matters, but I am not sure whether that takes us in the direction of localism or of national decision making. He poses a very fair question and I suspect that the answer could be found in either of the two options that I am just beginning to explore.

4 pm

We have touched on the tempting potential allure of local decision making in this context, but I am not sure that that necessarily determines the issue; I am worried about anomalies and relativities in a national context. If we are too quick to accept the local solution offered in the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley, there is a danger that even bigger distortions could be created. Once we allow too much local decision making in this crucial area of valuations and listings, we immediately lose control of the relativities that are so important to the whole process.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Forth: I shall give way first to my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). I do so because he claimed—he is of course correct—that he is one of only three people in the country who understand any of this. For that reason, we are honoured to have him with us today.

Mr. Gummer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the danger—if it exists—is less than it might otherwise be, given that the revaluation would have to be done within a fixed maximum and that the difference between different local authorities would therefore be maintained? The point that he makes would be much more powerful were it not for that fact. There may be reasons why problems remain—perhaps he would like to adduce them—but I am a rather keen on a bit of variety within those limitations.

Mr. Forth: I of course accept, hesitatingly, my right hon. Friend's guidance on this issue for the reason that I touched on, so perhaps it is now resolved more or less completely and we can move on.

Mr. Bone: At the start of this debate, I was considerably confused as to whether to support the amendment; thankfully, on listening to the speeches the situation is much clearer. My Wellingborough constituents are fearful of any revaluation, and the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) would allow for an earlier revaluation than they want, so, unfortunately, I cannot support it, because it would make revaluation easier, rather than more difficult.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend touches on one of the key issues, which I shall now consider, if I may; it will not distract me from my main argument.

Anne Main: My right hon. Friend touched on localism, so let us consider the very small picture. A large supermarket retailer has bought a considerable number of properties and a small industrial area in a blighted part of my constituency. This situation has been ongoing for several years and under a local system, local people would be pushing the council for a devaluation on the ground of blight. A very local system could lead to the sending of very mixed messages.

Mr. Forth: That illustrates well the inherent dangers. When we vote on the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley, we will have to weigh up the various factors and decide in which direction we want to go.

Mr. Scott: One problem is that, in areas such as the Thames Gateway, which takes in a number of different authorities, too much localism could lead to completely different revaluation results. A wider approach would need to be taken in such areas.

Mr. Forth: I think that that would depend on the trust that we place in the integrity of the valuation process, a point to which I shall return. First, I want to consider an issue that has been raised a number of times and which we need to discuss in some depth, so that we can establish which is preferable: a central bureaucracy that runs matters nationally; a much more localised approach; or, as we have speculated on throughout this debate, a staggered approach involving a small, compact, expert unit working sequentially, thus potentially saving money.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): My right hon. Friend is making a typically thoughtful contribution, but I do not want him to get away from the interesting point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone). Does my right hon. Friend think that this amendment would lead to revaluations taking place sooner? That is an important issue and I should be grateful for his views.

Mr. Forth: I want to deal with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), which highlighted what many of us see as an omission or lacuna in the amendment, as it still leaves the discretion with the Secretary of State. The initiation of the valuation process must be a local decision, but the amendment does not allow that. It goes halfway, and then stops. Although my hon. Friend's local people may be anxious for a revaluation in the cause of fairness—or not—they would have no say if the amendment were adopted. The local decision makers would not either, as the matter would rest with the Secretary of State.

As so often happens with this Government's legislation, the Secretary of State will decide everything. The Government pay lip service to local decision making but in the end, according to the Bill, matters will be "specified by order made by the Secretary of State".

I shall explore that later.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will my right hon. Friend spend a few minutes exploring the power that the Secretary of State would have if the amendment were agreed? He could use it as a threat against local authorities in all sorts of ways. I mentioned rate capping, but he could also use performance indicators to force revaluations on local authorities that did not want them.

Mr. Forth: One problem with the debate is that it has revealed so many difficulties that it has become more and more difficult to make progress. That is why I shall soon invite the Minister to guide us through and clarify matters. How do we balance local and national interests? What about costs, and appeals? Many hon. Members consider the appeals process very important, but it remains undefined.

All in all, this has been a useful debate, and we are only halfway through, with another amendment to consider and Third Reading still to come. We are all looking forward to that enormously, as it will allow us to expand our remarks. However, I judge that we are so anxious for the Minister to resolve our difficulties that I shall conclude my contribution.

Mr. Woolas: I am delighted to try and clarify the amendment's possible implications. This has been an interesting debate, with some good points made, but many hon. Members seem to have misunderstood what is involved in the valuation process. It is to that question that I shall try to address my remarks.

Various Opposition Members adopted a partisan approach, and one accused the Government of being responsible for a "corruption of power". I assure the House that the formula is not being manipulated. Interestingly, only one accusation of that sort was made, when the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) spoke about the allocation of health money and claimed that the pendulum had swung away from the problems of an elderly population and towards health issues. I point out that in areas where people have a lower life expectancy, in general that is due to the incidence of disease and illness. To me, that seems a perfectly reasonable criterion to govern the allocation of money. It certainly does not involve party-political bias.

Mr. Gummer: The Minister has not looked at what the deprivation index covers. The real problem is that the national health service should perhaps be an ill health prevention system, but it is not. It is a treatment system, and as long as that is what it is, the treatment needs to be provided where it is most needed, which is where there are most old people. Deprivation has several other elements that have nothing to do with health.

Mr. Woolas: I disagree, but I doubt that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will allow me to stray too far down that road—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the Minister's difficulty. Many issues have been raised this afternoon that were perhaps not spot on the amendment, but I trust that he will not be tempted down too many of those byways.

Mr. Woolas: I shall direct my remarks to the amendment and its implications. The assumption behind several contributions this afternoon has been, frankly speaking, wrong. It concerns the fear of potential political manipulation, and it assumes that the relative increase in property prices within an area and between areas has taken place only or mainly in areas with higher incomes. However, statistics published by independent bodies show that that is not the case. In layperson's terms, the Conservatives assume for the purposes of this debate that "oop north", we are all poor and live in terraced houses. I should point out to them that Cheshire is the second richest county in the country—and a very beautiful county it is.

The second mistake that has been made is to assume that those areas that have had relative increases in prices, where a revaluation would increase the tax yield, are all under the control of the Conservative party. That is not the case. The Conservatives make the same mistake as my party made in the 1980s, which is to assume that certain parts of the country are naturally aligned with one party and parts are aligned with another. If a revaluation were to increase the tax yield and therefore reduce the resource equalisation element—the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) covered that point—the implication is that that would take place entirely in non-Labour areas. One could not achieve that outcome even if one wanted to, and I shall explain why. I reject the allegation about the allocation under the formula and I reject the allegation, also made by some Opposition Members, that that would be used in a politically manipulative way.

The Government will ask the House not to support the amendment. I was a little confused when I saw the amendment, but I now have a much clearer understanding of what the hon. Gentleman is trying to achieve. He gave the example of a particular area in the country, but Madam Deputy Speaker ruled it out of order, so I shall not repeat it—but it is by a big river in the south-east of England. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that all the new properties that are built in that area will be revalued when they are first sold, and that therefore it is necessary to have a local valuation of the existing properties. However, the new properties will be valued and allocated to council tax bands, based on the values of the antecedent valuation date of 1991, the same date at which all properties in the country continue to be valued.

If there were to be a subsequent resale of those properties, they would be revalued only if they had been significantly improved, for example, by the addition of a swimming pool, but perhaps not by the addition of a patio, as some hon. Members have suggested. That is the policy that has been in place since 1991. Even then—this is the crucial point—the revaluation would still be based on the 1991 antecedent valuation date. That addresses the point that was drawn to our attention by the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown).

4.15 pm

As is so often the case, the devil is in the detail. I have some practical arguments about why the amendment would not work, as well as policy ones. As many hon. Members have said, at first sight, the amendment seems consistent with the policy of devolution, given the flexibility to carry out a revaluation limited to a single billing authority or a group of adjacent billing authorities if a such a revaluation is demanded locally. However, the detail shows the difficulty of the amendment's practical implications.

First, let us consider the implications for the Valuation Office Agency. Perhaps I can give the House some information that will be useful in considering the amendment. Following significant investment in modern technology, which essentially involves the computerisation of manual records, and the development of the automated valuation model, whereby a computer is given the details of different properties, it is true that the VOA could calibrate the system to cope with different valuation and revaluation dates for the billing authorities. Modern technology could allow what the hon. Member for Mole Valley suggests. However, let us consider for a moment the situation that could prevail in years to come.

As a result of the amendment, we could face a national taxation system based on multiple valuation dates and a host of different banding structures. Of course, we cannot revalue without rebanding. That is an essential point. If we assume that each valuation would involve a transitional scheme—the hon. Gentleman may want to address that point if he wishes to respond to the debate—we would be left with a hotch-potch of systems operating in different parts of the country and the confusion for the public would be too dire to contemplate.

Mr. Harper: In my constituency, which is adjacent to the border with Wales, the situation that the Minister describes already exists. There is a different system in Wales, where a revaluation has already taken place. Many of my constituents already face such confusion because there is a different system on each side of the River Wye. The systems on either side of the border differ under this Government.

Mr. Woolas: I appreciate that point. I thought of it myself when I was preparing for the debate last night. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the difference is caused by devolution, but the answer can be drawn out by considering what happened when the poll tax was introduced. The amendment would allow different valuations and bandings across boundaries in the same communities. In other words, the borders of Wales and England are well known and understood. Huge confusion was caused by the difference between one side of Narbonne avenue, which is in Lambeth, and the other side, which is in Wandsworth—I think that that was the boundary—and the danger of the amendment is that such boundaries would be drawn not just in communities and neighbourhoods, but along streets.

Mr. Binley: Is not the real confusion created by the different rates that are levied, rather than by the base on which the rate is levied? That will always be the case, so the Minister's argument does not work.

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman says that that will always be the case, but if he were to read the 1992 Act and, more importantly, the Hansard report of the debates on that legislation, he would understand that an essential part of resource equalisation—the notional effort made by banding to equalise the system—would not be possible, so the amendment would throw out the baby with the bathwater. There would thus be a confused situation with different banding systems operating in different billing authorities. If the hon. Gentleman stays with my argument, he will understand the position.

Sir Paul Beresford: Perhaps I should have explained a little more clearly that I thought that the power would be used in relatively isolated cases and that it would still be maintained by the Secretary of State, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) would perhaps deplore. However, local people would feel a difference if the revaluation were reflected in the assessment of ability to pay in the funding formula. If that were changed, the difficulty that the Minister cites would be offset.

Mr. Woolas: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point and assume that that is why the amendment provides for groups of billing authorities. If he will allow me to stick with my argument for a moment longer, I hope that he will understand why the amendment is not workable.

The hon. Gentleman argued that such small-scale revaluations could help with the costs of revaluation, which the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) also mentioned. Taken in isolation, he is, of course, right, but taken in aggregate, across all the many different revaluations that could ensue, I believe that he is mistaken. There is a widely accepted theory that economies come from scale. Under national revaluation, even with the automated valuation model, that is still the case. The VOA could gear up to deliver one national revaluation and would calibrate its software with one valuation date in mind in such an event before revaluing in one concentrated effort.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The fact that any revaluation creates winners and losers has not yet been mentioned. Those who are losers will call for transitional arrangements under section 79 of the Local Government Act 2003. Does the Minister agree that it is almost certain that such revaluations would trigger transitional arrangements?

Mr. Woolas: I mentioned briefly my assumption that a transitional relief scheme would be needed in such circumstances, as was the case when the poll tax was abolished and the council tax brought in. That was also the case with the business revaluation, which proved to be successful and did not cause the controversy of the Welsh revaluation.

Under local or local area revaluations, the VOA could be faced with a constant cycle of recalibrating, revaluing and publishing draft lists, and then providing compiled lists to individual billing authorities. That would inevitably lead to more costs and, in the long term, the use of more staff resources.

Let me turn to the impact that the amendment would have on the finance settlement and the grant distribution system. Imagine for a moment a scenario in which one billing authority was revalued. Let us say that in that case revaluation led to a reduction in its overall tax base because properties, on average, moved to lower bands—hon. Members have cited examples of circumstances in which that could happen. At the outset, that appears to be entirely desirable for the householders concerned.

The expectation would be that the grant distribution system would compensate the billing authority for its reduced tax base by shifting a larger proportion of the overall grant pot into that area. However, we encounter a problem at that point because the grant pot is of course finite. Without another authority revaluing and increasing its tax base at the same time, which would effectively rebalance the whole system, we would not have the extra funds that would be needed. Everyone else would thus get less, effectively on the say so of the authority concerned.

Without any compensation through the grant distribution system, the billing authority would be faced with two options: either cover the deficit through efficiency savings or service reductions; or increase its tax rate, which would effectively mean asking its council tax payers to pay the same amount of council tax overall as they did before the local revaluation ever happened. Any overall benefit from revaluation would therefore be cancelled out. On the other hand, a billing authority with an increasing tax base going through a similar revaluation would be handed a windfall increase in tax yield, which would be left unadjusted until the next three-year settlement period.

We have gone on record on many occasions saying that we accept the case for revaluation and that it is right to maintain a fair alignment between house prices and council tax bands. The amendment implies that it might be right to realign one subset of properties while leaving all the others unaligned, but how can it be fair that one person benefits from a reduction in band through a revaluation while their neighbour, who happens to be in a different authority that is not revalued, does not? As some speakers noted, we would be faced, I fear, with a flood of appeals as the public became increasingly concerned and confused by the ensuing unfairness.

The amendment appears to be based on an assumption about the factors influencing the housing market—an assumption that is fundamentally flawed. It is that influences on the market could—indeed, must—operate at a local level in isolation from national factors. Why else would we ever conceive that revaluation could be justified in one billing authority separately from all others? Micro-economic factors play their part, but to revalue only on the basis of such factors would destabilise what is, after all, a national tax system based on relative values across the whole housing market.

Mr. Binley: My major concern is the enforced growth imposed by the Government themselves. If the Government enforce growth, they should at least give the local authorities affected the ability to have a say in revaluation and its timing.

Mr. Woolas: I answered that point when I said that valuation was based on an antecedent valuation date of 1991.

There is a wider policy at stake. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal said that he was against growth areas, and other speakers complained of a problem because of increased house prices. The argument that revaluation is needed has arisen from the increase in the differential between earnings and house prices that is caused by the excess of demand over supply, which is precisely why growth areas have been proposed.

Mr. Gummer rose—

Sir Paul Beresford rose—

Mr. Woolas: I am prompting interventions, but we have more amendments to deal with and Third Reading to come. Perhaps right hon. and hon. Members can make their points then.

Mr. Gummer: The Minister did mention my speech.

Mr. Woolas: I give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Gummer: I rise to correct the Minister. I did not say that I am against growth; I said that I am against piling growth into the south-east of England instead of spreading it over the whole of the United Kingdom when modern techniques of transport and IT make that possible.

Mr. Woolas: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman said that. I muttered across the Chamber to the Liberal Democrat spokesman that I was not sure that local people in the right hon. Gentleman's constituency who wanted to buy a home in the area would necessarily agree with that point. Of course they are welcome to move to Oldham and Saddleworth, but I have to point out that house prices in some parts of my constituency are as high as, if not higher than, prices in his. It is not true that all housing growth areas are in the south-east, or that the relative increase in prices has occurred exclusively in the south-east, yet that was the assumption implicit in many of the speeches made by Opposition Members this afternoon. I am more than happy if they continue to make that assumption, because it does them electoral damage.

I conclude my remarks on the amendment by asking the House to reject it. I thank the hon. Member for Mole Valley for tabling it because it has allowed us have a clearer debate on the purposes of revaluation and the methods involved, but I hope that he understands that his proposal has the potential to create significant problems for local government finance and the operation of the council tax system.

Sir Paul Beresford: I thank the Minister and all Members for the support—mixed support. We have had a substantial discussion, much more so than I anticipated, and the spread of knowledge of local government finance has been incredible—from next to nothing to absolutely everything. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) pointed out, the subject is difficult for people to understand. Clarity is needed, and that was part of the inspiration behind the amendment. The difficulty, however, is that because of the wording of the Bill, the amendment had to be very tight. I could only touch on some of the consequential effects and answer them in a way that would enable the amendment to be carried forward. I shall study the amendment and the Minister's comments carefully, and we can return to the matter another day. For the moment, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

4.30 pm

David Howarth: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in clause 1, page 1, line 8, at end insert—

'(1B) The Secretary of State shall decide at least once in each calendar year whether to exercise the power granted by subsection (1A), and shall give reasons for his decision.

(1C) The reasons referred to in subsection (1B) shall include, but shall not be restricted to, the Secretary of State's assessment of the degree of divergence in relevant property values since the original valuations made under this Act or since any subsequent revaluation.'

The amendment is about giving reasons, and its origins lie in the different reasons that various people have for being in favour of the Bill. Our reasons are simple. Since we will replace council tax with a different tax system altogether—local income tax—we have no need of any revaluations, and therefore believe that any expenditure on revaluation would be wasted.

There is more dispute about the Government's reasons for introducing the Bill. Their stated reasons are to do with the expansion of the remit of the Lyons review, but even Sir Michael Lyons said that a delay of only one year would be justified by the extension of his remit to function rather than just finance. In any case, there is no obvious connection between Lyons and revaluation, since Lyons has been told that council tax is Government policy—the Minister repeated that in Committee—so I see no reason to stop work on a revaluation as council tax will continue, under the Government's policy, to be the central tax for local government purposes after the review.

The addition of structural change to the remit of Lyons and the announcement of a White Paper that includes structural change make no difference, as far as I can see. I welcome the announcement of a White Paper, which will increase the amount of policy direction given to the Lyons review. Since council tax is Government policy and will continue to be Government policy throughout the White Paper stage and the Lyons review stage, there is no reason for them to abandon revaluation.

The second possible reason for the Government's move is the accusation that there are political reasons that explain the Bill. Throughout its consideration hon. Members in all parts of the House have pointed out that the problem with revaluation is that the political costs almost always outweigh the technical merits of conducting one. That is true even of this revaluation. The New Policy Institute estimated that under the revaluation as proposed for 2007, the winners would outweigh the losers by 5.5 million to 3 million. The trouble with that is that in such exercises the winners tend not to be very grateful, as they think they have been overpaying for many years, whereas the losers are furious, so the political cost is always very great.

There is a rather less cynical reason contained in the New Policy Institute's analysis of the possible reasons for a revaluation, and that is a reason of fairness—the revaluation would tend to benefit better-off people in some areas of the country at the expense of worse-off people in other areas. That is not a simple north-south divide, as some people think, but a geographical change and a change in the distribution of wealth and income that would be adverse. The problem of the unpopularity and the unfairness of revaluations is confirmed by the history of revaluations that the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) partially recounted in his remarks on the previous amendment. He did not get to the last example, when the threat of revaluation caused the poll tax, which is perhaps the most impressive error ever committed in the history of local government finance.

A third possible reason to support the Bill is that property values have not diverged significantly. Until about 2001, property values diverged throughout the country, which was followed by a convergence, but in itself that is not enough to explain calling off revaluation, because the subsequent convergence has not yet outweighed the previous divergence. If we take property values in 1991 as a base and count that as an index of 100, London was at 557 in 2004, whereas the north-west was at 466.5. Although there has been convergence in property values since about 2001, it is not yet sufficient to outweigh the previous divergence.

As the Minister said several times in previous debates, in particular areas of the country convergence and divergence do not follow the regional pattern. Is that the reason why the Government have introduced the Bill? The problem is that the Government refuse to take that point. Before the Bill was introduced in the autumn, they had not commissioned a study of divergence or convergence in property values. There is a lack of clarity on why the Bill was introduced.

The amendment's purpose is not to decide the debate about what has happened in the past or to explain why the Government have introduced the Bill, but to put any future debate on the same issue on to a more rational and informed basis. The amendment states that the Government must give reasons for not only going ahead with a revaluation—if they decided to go ahead with a revaluation, one imagines that they would be keen to give the reasons why—but a decision to decline to go ahead with a revaluation. We believe that that would help Parliament and the public distinguish between technical reasons and other reasons for a decision not to go ahead with a revaluation.

The amendment also states that the reasons that the Government give must include a statement on divergence in property values, but it would not require them to state only their view on divergence in property values. The point is to obtain the Government's view of what the divergence has been and of what level of divergence would be intolerable, given the other possible factors.

We moved a similar, although not identical, amendment in Committee, where a number of reasons were given for opposing it. The Minister said that the amendment appeared to require an objective view on when divergence in property values is enough for a revaluation, but that was not its purpose. It was designed to seek not an objective view whether divergence has become too much, but the Government's view of when divergence has become too much.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman have any worries about the cost of that part of his amendment? If we are to have an annual statement by the Secretary of State giving reasons, and if, by implication, there will be an annual assessment of the degree of divergence, the exercise could be very costly.

David Howarth: I was about to come to that point.

The second objection mentioned in Committee was that the amendment implied that divergence is the only reason why a revaluation might or might not proceed, but that is not what we are saying. We are saying that divergence is one reason that must be dealt with in the debate, whether or not the Government think that it is their central reason.

The third point concerned cost, which the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) mentioned. It was said in Committee that there would be a cost in officials' time. However, the figures are generally available from the Land Registry and from the series maintained by the Halifax building society and by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. There would be no great cost in compiling the figures, but it would involve a good deal of effort from Ministers in constructing their reasons based on the information available to them. That is not an unreasonable burden for the political heads of Government Departments to bear in the interests of greater openness.

I do not want to detain the House any further. The amendment is a proposed addition to the Bill from a party that is generally friendly to it. It would increase transparency and allow us to have a better debate, were these questions to arise again, than we have had on this occasion.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The Liberal Democrats' amendment would require an annual decision to be made, with reasons, on whether a revaluation exercise should be undertaken, with an assessment of the divergence in property values. Such an undertaking would involve enormous cost and administrative time. Conservative Members oppose the amendment.

Mr. Woolas: As the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) said, the amendment is similar, although not identical, to the one that we debated in Committee. The Government's position remains the same. Let me emphasise that the Bill obliges the Secretary of State to come before the House at the time of a revaluation date and subject the order to debate and, no doubt, a vote. I assure the House that that will give it the opportunity to consider and challenge his reasons.

The amendment has been slightly reworded to make it clear that the duty on the Secretary of State to consider at least once each year whether to set a date for revaluation and to give reasons should include, but not be restricted to, an assessment of the degree of divergence in property values. Not least because it still refers to an assessment of the degree of divergence, I ask the House to oppose it if the hon. Gentleman wishes to press it to a vote.

Although we readily accept the argument for a revaluation of council tax to maintain a fair alignment between house prices and council tax bands, we can see no case for the regular publication of statements. When we debated the similar amendment in Committee, it received no support from the official Opposition. Indeed, the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) said that he was not sure that it would be terribly helpful and that it was probably unnecessary. I would go slightly further than that. The mere fact that there would have to be a statement at least once a year would undoubtedly stir up excitement and controversy among hon. Members, particularly Opposition Members, the press and the general public, and that would in turn lead to considerable uncertainty and anxiety for council tax payers.

Even more of a problem is the specific requirement for an assessment of the degree of divergence in property values. Whatever the hon. Gentleman may say, that would simply encourage the view that there must be some sort of objective "golden rule" that would lead, or even require, the Secretary of State—or anyone else—to determine whether a particular level of divergence justified a revaluation.

4.45 pm

I appreciate that the hon. Member for Cambridge said in Committee that the similar amendment that we considered there did not assume the existence of any such golden number. He also said that he and his party were not trying to get an objective view of the conditions for revaluation. However, publication of the sort of assessment that he envisages would inevitably encourage people to think that if, for example, X per cent. of houses in band Y had increased in price by more than Z per cent., there would be a case for revaluation more or less automatically. Furthermore, they would infer that, if the Government then decided for whatever reason not to proceed with revaluation, notwithstanding that evidence, they would somehow be flunking the issue. Conversely, it would be inferred that, if a specific level of divergence had not been established, an insufficient case would have been made for revaluation.

The Government reject the notions that a specific level of property price movement necessarily justifies revaluation and that divergence that falls short of that level of property price movement precludes any case for it.

David Howarth: The main point of the amendment is to encourage the Government to be consistent from one year to the next so that the reasons they give one year are not contradicted the following year. Those reasons do not have to constitute an objective rule but they should be consistent over time.

Mr. Woolas: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I believe that the provision to require the Secretary of State on the appropriate occasion to justify his or her decision or proposal to the House is sufficient. I stress that I studied the points that he made in Committee after that debate and that I understand them, but I believe that the amendment would inevitably lead people to conclude that there must be a golden rule.

Revaluation is not simply about reflecting divergence in prices across the property market. The case for revaluation is simply to ensure that property values are fairly reflected in council tax bandings and that values are up-to-date and can be sensibly handled by the Valuation Office Agency and other interested parties.

Above all, we are interested in fairness but it does not depend on passing some sort of arbitrary test on the level of divergence. Indeed, if the focus were to be too heavily weighted towards divergence as the overriding factor predicating a revaluation, according to the amendment, a virtual annual revaluation of all properties would have to take place in order to assess divergence.

I agree with the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) about the resources implications. The assessment would have to consider not only the national but the regional and local picture to reflect the fact that divergence can and does happen, and has an impact at the micro level—the billing authority level—as well as regionally and nationally.

I have no doubt that many individual householders would be tempted by the process to enter into some sort of annual debate about whether the Government should revalue that particular year according to whether they would win or lose—the hon. Gentleman mentioned winners and losers—by that specific set of figures. That would not offer any prospect of a sound basis on which to make the important decision of when to revalue.

The right way forward is for the Government, in the light of the Lyons inquiry and our response to that, to propose and justify a date for revaluation to Parliament, and for Parliament to consider the merits of the date and the justification by the process of debating the affirmative order for which the Bill provides. On that basis, I ask hon. Members to oppose the amendment if the hon. Gentleman pushes it to a Division.

Mr. Forth: The amendment has a superficial attraction. If one reads it quickly and not too deeply, it sounds rather good, especially to those of us who would love Secretaries of State to come to the House as frequently as possible to give an account of themselves. Goodness knows, some of them do it little enough. However, on reflection I am not sure whether the amendment would work in that way. On what basis would the Secretary of State report after having made the decision? How would the reasons that the Secretary of State would be obliged to give, under the amendment, be communicated to the House? You and I can bet, Mr Deputy Speaker, that it would not be through an oral statement, because these days we have the trendy new process, which was sold to us as an improvement, called the written ministerial statement. More and more ministerial statements are smuggled on to the Order Paper in written form, which means that nobody can question them. I can predict with absolute certainty that that will be the vehicle chosen by Secretaries of State to fulfil the requirements of the first part of the amendment.

One immediately runs into a difficulty. If I thought that there was any way of getting any Minister to come to the House, give a proper account of himself and be questioned, I would be all for it. I would not mind if the House spent almost all its time questioning Ministers on this and that—it would give us less time to pass increasingly silly Bills from the Government and elsewhere. I have no objection in principle to mechanisms whereby Ministers must come to the House and give reasons, but that is not what the amendment says. It leaves unspecified the way in which reasons would be given to the House for the decision taken once a year.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend refers to once a year, but does he accept that, if we read the amendment carefully, it will be possible for the review to be done in December of one year and in January the following year, thereby negating the whole purpose of it?

Mr. Forth: That would be possible. As my hon. Friend and I know, when one drafts such an amendment, one must try to think through all the possibilities.

David Howarth: That point is dealt with by using the term "calendar year". I do know what I am doing when I am drafting.

Mr. Forth: I am not sure that that answers my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), but we should not get bogged down as it is not the most important aspect that we should consider.

In relation to subsection (1C), we must confront the issue of cost, which the Minister raised. If we read the subsection quickly, it does not sound too bad, but its reference to "the Secretary of State's assessment of the degree of divergence in relevant property values since the original valuations made under this Act", gets us into difficult territory. If the exercise is to be meaningful, the information will have to be comprehensive and accurate, and one is immediately confronted with the problem of the mechanism and the cost of doing that because, otherwise, it would be extremely counter-productive. The Minister rightly pointed out that we are talking about national, regional and, I presume, local variations, all of which would have to be covered to make the provision of any use. That cannot be done without cost.

It is one thing to wave one's hand and say that the job can be done with existing staff, but I am not sure that that is the case. Under the amendment, a mandatory annual exercise would require an annual assessment of the degree of divergence in relevant property values—

David Howarth: Relevant.

Mr. Forth: I will help the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), who is speaking from a sedentary position, and get him into Hansard again, thereby making his long afternoon worthwhile. He seems to think that the word "relevant" solves the problem. I am not sure that it does. It raises a host of other questions as to what would be relevant. Perhaps he would like to tell us what is in his mind when he uses the word "relevant". He said that he was a superb drafter of amendments, so I shall give him the chance now to demonstrate that skill.

David Howarth: That would be a question for the Minister.

Mr. Forth: So the hon. Gentleman will now touchingly trust the Minister to interpret the words in his amendment. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what would be relevant.

Mr. Woolas: Were price divergence the criteria, the relevant property information would include every property, which, I presume, would involve a national valuation exercise every 12 months.

Mr. Forth: This might be a little moment in parliamentary history. We have had the hon. Member for Cambridge proposing an amendment to the House without knowing what his own words meant. He then told the House, through me, that he would trust the Minister to interpret the amendment, and the Minister immediately obliged us by telling us from the Dispatch Box what it meant. This is an exciting development in parliamentary procedure.

David Howarth: Now that the Minister has said what is in his mind he can be held to account for it, which he could not be previously.

Mr. Forth: This Minister has obliged us with his interpretation of the hon. Gentleman's amendment, but that will be relevant only for as long as this Minister is in post, which we all hope will not be terribly long. In any case, this Minister is exercising powers presumably delegated to him by his Secretary of State to give his interpretation, but we do not know whether the Secretary of State agrees with it. Until we can tease out from the Secretary of State whether the Minister's view is the departmental view, I am not sure that we are any further forward.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Minister cannot have views that are separate from those of the Secretary of State; the right hon. Gentleman suggests a constitutional enormity.

Mr. Forth: I am not sure that in this Government such constitutional certainty applies, but I shall not be tempted into that subject, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know you well enough to know that you would prevent me from doing any such thing.

Let us assume that we all now know what "relevant" means. The Minister has helped us. He said that in his view—and the hon. Member for Cambridge has told us that that is the only view that matters at this stage—for this purpose the relevant property values are every property in the kingdom. We now know the scale of the exercise with which we are confronted—to fulfil the requirements of the amendment, a gigantic bureaucratic exercise would have to be undertaken every year. Why? So that the Secretary of State could slip a little written ministerial statement on to the Order Paper giving the reasons for his decision on whether there should be a revaluation.

I am not sure that that takes us much further forward. All too often, that is the trouble with amendments that are supposed to add value. I am not talking merely about technical faults or drafting errors, which are entirely forgivable as we do not all have the resources behind us that the Government have. And, goodness knows, even when the Government try to draft a Bill these days, they end up having to make hundreds of amendments due to errors here and there. We are simply talking about the efforts of humble Back Benchers who try to improve Bills with amendments such as this one yet, sadly, on this occasion the amendment does not pass muster.

I cannot claim to have analysed the amendment in great depth. I merely glanced at it, but if I can identify such a degree of deficiency by that superficial approach, goodness knows what would happen if we had the time—alas, sadly, we do not—to look at it in any depth or at any length. This is but the briefest analysis.

When I read the amendment I wished I had tabled one of my own. It would have been more interesting, and probably more relevant, if instead of the Secretary of State initiating the process and carrying it through, some impartial body, detached from Government, could have been charged with that responsibility. We are in an era—are we not?—of quangos, NGOs and all the other acronyms that are supposed to give a view different from Government. I have doubts about that, as usually if bodies are Government-funded their view is not terribly different from the Government's. However, if we used that approach, we might at least be able to rely somewhat more on the process outlined in the amendment.

[Mr. Forth]

All in all, I am not terribly impressed with the amendment. I am not very taken with it, and if the hon. Member for Cambridge is rash enough to try to put it to a vote I suspect that he may find that he has embarrassingly little support.

David Howarth: I have heard no reasons of substance, as opposed to superficial analysis, to make me change my mind about the wisdom of the amendment. I shall, therefore, press it to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I ask the Serjeant at Arms to investigate the delay in the No Lobby.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Ian Cawsey and
Mr. Alan Campbell

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Heath: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to an announcement on the website of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister? It states that the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons has announced in Parliament that the statements on the provisional 2006-07 and 2007-08 settlements will be made on 5 December by the hon. Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas). I am confident that you made no such announcement today, and nor did any of your colleagues. What worries me is that the office of Deputy Speaker might be sullied by the squalid manoeuvrings of the ODPM. Is there anything that you can do to direct the Minister to change the website forthwith?

Mr. Woolas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have already had some confusion this afternoon, when the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) referred to the Deputy Speaker as the Deputy Prime Minister. It seems that a mistake has been made and I will correct it immediately. The website should of course refer to the Deputy Leader of the House, who made the announcement during business questions—hardly the secret slipping out of an announcement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for drawing the House's attention to this error. I had no idea that my influence stretched so far. At the end of a busy parliamentary week, perhaps we should content ourselves with the thought that to err is human, to forgive is divine.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is emphatically not the end of the parliamentary week because as you well know, important legislation will be before the House tomorrow. I am sure that all Members present will be present tomorrow for that important work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I perhaps slipped into the thought that it is drawing to the end of my parliamentary week. The House's arrangements are good enough to allow one Deputy Speaker not to be on duty on a Friday. I know that, as ever, the right hon. Gentleman will be assiduous, as will other Members.

Order for Third Reading read.

5.19 pm

Mr. Woolas: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I can assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that your influence reaches to the very heart of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

This is of course not the biggest Bill ever to come before this House, but its provisions are important to the future of local government in England. That importance derives from the time and space that they give us to allow Sir Michael Lyons to complete his inquiry into local government function and funding. The Bill also enables the Government and Parliament to consider his recommendations properly. We will be able to consult on them and debate them fully before we move forward with a reformed council tax system and the revaluation that follows from that.

We debated the Bill extensively on Second Reading—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but perhaps the hon. Member for Alyn and [Mr. Deputy Speaker]

Deeside (Mark Tami) could conduct his business arrangements outside the Chamber, if he is not taking part in the debate.

Mr. Woolas: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We also had some interesting exchanges in a short but nevertheless productive Committee stage. Sadly, however, the sensible debate in the House of the principles of revaluation and the relative merits of different timings—and indeed of local area revaluations, the subject of the amendment moved earlier by the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford)—has been in contrast in recent weeks to a stream of the most ridiculous misinformation and scaremongering promulgated through certain sections of the popular press.

It is sad, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have to inform you and the House that I am told by the Valuation Office Agency that those stories have given rise to serious concerns amongst agency staff. They are worried that, in going about their legal business and carrying out the duties given to them by the House—and by the Opposition when they were in power and introduced the Local Government Finance Act 1992—they may face verbal, and at worst physical, attack by members of the public. Perhaps not surprisingly, in the circumstances, those members of the public have themselves been fired up and worried by ridiculous stories about allegations of snooping and invasion of privacy.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Will the Minister give some examples of incidents of physical or threatened abuse?

Mr. Woolas: I took care to say that the stories have led VOA staff to fear such attacks, but I will give examples of intimidation in a moment. For example, my officials have received calls from worried householders, most recently an 84-year-old gentleman. He had read the confused and confusing stories and wanted to know why "inspectors" would be coming to his home, forcing their way in and taking photographs of his bedroom and personal belongings. One article said that those photographs would be given to burglars to help them target properties.

In all conscience, I cannot allow this situation to remain unchallenged. With your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to attempt to put the record straight once again, for the benefit of the House, of members of the public who take such misinformation to be true, and of VOA staff who are daily faced with the consequences of these grossly unfair and misleading reports.

Sir Paul Beresford: The Minister will accept that most hon. Members who understand this matter know that what he is saying is correct. Does he agree that the problem may have more to do with journalistic licence than with statements made by hon. Members?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Minister replies any further on this point, I must remind him that, although I understand what he is anxious to do, an amendment on this matter was ruled out of order. On Third Reading, we should concentrate on what is in the Bill, and not on what might have been in it.

Mr. Woolas: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that you will allow me to give the hon. Member for Mole Valley the assurance that he asked for. I deliberately said in my opening remarks that we had had a sensible and principled debate as the Bill made its way through the House.

The Bill does three things, and three things only. It effectively postpones the 2007 council tax revaluation exercise. Despite the confused messages coming from Opposition spokesmen and spokeswomen, we are postponing revaluation. We have made it clear that we do not believe that it will happen in the lifetime of this Parliament.

The Bill removes the requirement for subsequent revaluations to take place at intervals of no more than 10 years. Finally, it gives the Secretary of State power to set the date of revaluations by order, subject to affirmative resolution in the House. That is all that it does. There are no proposals for new powers for VOA staff. Indeed, the existing powers to carry out inspections have been in place since before the second world war and were affirmed in the Local Government Finance Act 1992. One of the reasons why those powers exist is to help the VOA to stop people avoiding paying their tax.

Sir Paul Beresford: Many of us feel that a property-based tax for local government purposes has some positive advantages, but one difficulty with the vague way in which the Minister approaches the issue—we do not know whether there will be a revaluation—is that it could make one suspect that he is sliding away from a property-based local government tax.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, because it gives me the opportunity to say again in the House that the Government's policy is to postpone, not to cancel, the revaluation. The property-based council tax is the basis of the review by Sir Michael Lyons and I referred again to the desirability of reforming the council tax system and the measures that go with it.

The important thing to recognise is that the staff and contractors of the Valuation Office Agency have no powers to forcibly inspect a property for council tax valuation purposes. The VOA does not forcibly enter people's homes—it does not have either the legal power or the desire to do so. For a member of the VOA to take photographs of the inside of a property would be extremely rare and it would only ever be done with the express permission of the householder. In fact, the VOA has clear guidance for its staff about on-site inspections. It expressly states that photographs can be taken only with the permission of the householder, and must not show people, details of security systems, or valuable possessions.

The basis on which property is valued for council tax purposes is the same now as it was when the council tax was introduced. The VOA seeks to assign a market value based on the variables that operate in the market. If one property has a scenic view and another overlooks a chemical plant, it is likely that the one with the scenic view will attract a higher relative market value than the one with the view of a chemical plant. There is nothing new or surprising about that. If one property has an attribute that leads to its market value being higher than its next-door neighbour, it is only fair that that should be reflected in its banding. This has always been the case and nothing has changed since 1992.

As I mentioned in Committee, the fact that the VOA is capturing property attributes in a database using codes does not indicate some sinister, new, Big Brother database. It is simply the most effective and efficient way of capturing data in a form that can be used by the valuation model to come up with a fair and justifiable valuation, on computers, rather than on paper. That process has previously been done manually by a valuation officer. I recall that estate agents had to be hired quickly to ensure that the council tax could be introduced to replace the unpopular poll tax. The only difference now is that the valuation officers have the benefit of modern technology to support them in their task.

I wish to use this opportunity to reassure hon. Members and members of the public—I hope that they have paid attention to the debate or will read the reports of it—that suggestions that people who are unable to pay their council tax will be sent to prison are not true. People who wilfully refuse to pay may be imprisoned under powers that have existed for many years, but that is entirely different from the position of someone who is unable to pay. Nobody has ever been jailed for being unable to pay, nor would they be.

Only last weekend, at the very time that winter fuel payments and £200 cheques for pensioners' council tax rebates were landing on the doormats of millions of pensioner households, there were stories touting a survey about the impact of council tax increases on the elderly. That survey was mentioned by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope)—incidentally, he was the Under-Secretary who introduced the poll tax in the late 1980s—and by its own admission, it excluded council tax benefits and rebates for the elderly. I should say in acknowledging the point made by the hon. Member for Mole Valley that the reports of that survey have led to yet more anxiety among the elderly.

The Government have already said that we will use our capping powers against councils with excessive council tax increases and budgets, as we did this year and last year. I give that reassurance to those who may be anxious about council tax.

Almost 2.5 million people aged 60 or over now receive council tax benefit, which provides a rebate of up to 100 per cent. of their bills. In addition, £100 was given to households with someone aged 70 or over in 2004–05, to help them with their council tax bills. For 2005–06, households with someone aged 65 or over are receiving £200, which is paid with the winter fuel payments unless they are already entitled to a 100 per cent. council tax rebate.

Mr. Bone: Will that payment continue in future years?

Mr. Woolas: We will have to wait and see. When we consider council tax bills, we must bear in mind the council tax benefit and rebate system to get a fair picture. We can then debate the policy on the basis of the facts, not false assumptions.

Finally, I do not understand why Conservative Members continue to undermine the council tax, when the Conservative party introduced it and when they have no alternative tax policy—yet they campaign to seek to undermine it every week. I hope that we can have a proper debate and dialogue based on the facts of the Bill and recognise that the council tax system has received support from both main parties since it was introduced. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.33 pm

Angela Watkinson: The Bill is very narrowly drawn, but it enables the Government to delay revaluation and to choose when it will take place in the future. It has aroused so[illegible]ery strong feelings in the debates this afternoon. This debate on Third Reading is the last opportunity for hon. Members to raise their concerns and put them on the record.

The Minister's first major decision after taking up his post was to put off the revaluation and refer the issue to the Lyons inquiry—much to the dismay of his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford). The Government have essentially ensured that the revaluation will not take place before the next general election. So this is not goodbye to revaluation but au revoir, and the British people are highly likely to face a revaluation that significantly increases their council tax bills sooner or later, unless they show their disapproval in the ballot box at the next general election.

Amendment No. 3 sought to introduce local revaluation, and we had a long and interesting debate that raised more questions than it answered about the great complexity of revaluation and how to make it fair.

As hon. Members know, the level of council tax is one of our constituents' main concerns, and it occupies much of our time in correspondence and advice surgeries. That makes council tax one of the most explosive political issues that the Government face. Bills have already increased by 26 per cent. since 1997. As one person said to me only today:

"I feel as though Dick Turpin raids my bank account every week".

It was noted on Report that the value of a property is not always a reliable indication of ability to pay. I am sure that the Minister and other hon. Members know of examples of people who are cash poor, yet live in valuable properties. Elderly people, such as surviving spouses, may remain in a family home that has risen in value over the decades, although they have a modest disposable income. However, four working adults might live in a more modest property, so the value of a property is not always a reliable indication of its residents' ability to pay their council tax.

The Bill will postpone the revaluation of properties for the purpose of council tax that was to have occurred on 1 April 2007, with council tax bills being based on the updated valuations that year. Conservative Members oppose the revaluation, not least in the light of the outcome in Wales. The revaluation in Wales was used as a tool to increase the overall tax take, so it was a stealth tax. If a typical house in England were moved up a band, it would become liable for an extra £257 a year on top of any other changes to the council tax bills. Of the 21 million homes in England, 7 million would be moved up a band, but only 1.5 million would move down a band. The Minister is looking puzzled, so I should explain that those figures have been extrapolated from the experience in Wales.

The Bill does not go far enough. It only postpones revaluation, rather than scrapping it altogether. Approximately £60 million of taxpayers' money has already been spent in preparation for revaluation—including on a new computer system—much of which will be wasted. It is ironic that an information technology project that the Government claim is excellent will not be used for its intended purpose. It is not clear whether the cost of the reduction of 1,020 staff by June 2006 is included in that £60 million figure. Perhaps the Minister will clarify that point later.

Even more alarming to council tax payers is the worrying fact that revaluation procedures will allow inspectors to enter people's homes. It is a great pity that the amendment on that matter was not selected for consideration on Report. I do not know whether you will indulge me, Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady is verging on criticism of the Chair. I do not advise her to pursue that line.

Angela Watkinson: That would be unthinkable, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but one or two hon. Members raised the subject on Report.

If the revaluation is not to proceed, why are the Government still collecting data on dwelling codes, as the Minister confirmed to my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) in Hansard yesterday? What use will those data be in five years' time?

Countless people make enormous sacrifices to buy a home of their own. It often leaves them with little disposable income, so they go without holidays and other forms of leisure activity so that they can afford their mortgage payments. Such people are by no means rich, but the Government see them as the milch cow of the nation.

Improvements and maintenance must be budgeted and saved for. If the implication is that improvements to, and the maintenance of, houses will put people in a higher council tax band in the future, will we see falling general standards of upkeep as people wish to avoid paying more council tax? Some of my constituents—ordinary law-abiding people—have already expressed their concern to me about the likelihood of someone knocking on their door and demanding access. That is a worrying element of the revaluation exercise.

Under this Government, an Englishman's home is no longer his castle. The Bill will allow the Government to impose a revaluation date through secondary legislation with little debate in Parliament, although that could change the entire funding of council tax. Such a change must be carefully thought through and prepared so that we have a properly balanced tax on property and services, not simply property.

5.39 pm

David Howarth: Last Thursday, in answer to a question that I put to him during business questions, the Leader of the House said that he thought that the idea of programming Report stage and Third Readings raised constitutional questions. I am not sure that I agree. A lack of strict programming of this afternoon's business might have made things much worse. During the debate on amendment No. 3, I was fascinated to see what it is like to attend a meeting of the 1922 committee, but the Bill survived that unfortunate experience.

The Minister of Communities and Local Government emphasised on Second Reading, and the Minister for Local Government repeated in Committee, that the context of the Bill was the revision of the remit of the Lyons review of local government to encompass function in addition to finance. That context has now changed and we are looking forward to a White Paper on local government which will take into account not only finance and function, but structure. I welcomed that announcement, especially as I called for a White Paper last Wednesday in Westminster Hall. I had no idea that the Government were so responsive to Opposition calls made in Westminster Hall debates. The Bill started out as a small part of a large picture and has now become a very small part of a very big picture. I hope to see a much more long-term constitutional approach to local government, rather than the short-term political approach that produced the Bill.

As we have said all along, the Bill has its uses. We stated our support for it on Second Reading and we shall continue that support on Third Reading. We support it largely because our proposed reform of local government finance would involve the cancelling of the next revaluation, for the obvious reason that a local income tax requires no property valuations of any sort. Whether the Bill is passed or not, council tax will remain a bad tax. As the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said, one of the great problems of council tax is its weak relationship to ability to pay, and revaluation does not affect that much. A group of people who are rarely mentioned in our debates are tenants, especially tenants of councils or local housing associations. It is often assumed that council tax is a type of wealth tax—that it is related to the wealth of the taxpayer. In fact, for a quarter of the population that is not so and any revaluation does not affect that.

Sir Paul Beresford: Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on what was said on Second Reading and consider the possibility of changing the way in which ability to pay is assessed, combining that with a broad-scale income assessment, and feeding it into the funding formula in place of the current banding system? The resulting tax would have the advantages in terms of collectability that council tax has because it is property based. I believe that that would blow the Liberals' suggestion out of the water.

David Howarth: The hon. Gentleman's proposal is a halfway house. It is technically possible—in fact, it would be part of a reform that would introduce a different sort of taxation; it would be part of the equalisation necessary for the introduction of a local income tax. However, it does not go far enough. Collectability was discussed in Committee, but a point that is often missed, although the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) made it, is that often the published statistics on collection assume that the tax is properly due as recorded, but if a lot of people claim falsely to be living as single people there is a lot of evasion going on that the statistics do not pick up.

Mr. Francois: I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. Gentleman, but I think he said a few minutes ago that there was very little discussion of housing association and council tenants during consideration of the Bill. May I correct him? On Report, some of us mentioned such people, not least in the context of housing redevelopment. Does he accept that some of those people at least get full or partial council tax benefit, which helps to ameliorate the effects of council tax on people in those categories?

David Howarth: What the hon. Gentleman says is, in part, true. Council tax benefit partly offsets the regressive nature of the tax, but the tax remains the most regressive major tax in the Government's taxation armoury, even after the use of council tax benefit.

Revaluation would probably make the council tax even more unpopular. That is presumably why the Bill allows revaluation to be called off. On the other hand, failure to revalue makes the council tax more unfair and more out of date. That sums up one of the reasons why we oppose council tax. It is simultaneously bad to revalue and bad not to revalue.

I am still puzzled by the Conservative party's position on the Bill. Conservative Members voted against Second Reading. The effect of voting against, if it had been taken up in all parts of the House, would have been to defeat the Bill. If the Bill had been defeated, the present law would remain. The present law mandates a revaluation in 2007. By contrast, when the Committee considered whether clause 1, which is really the only clause in the Bill, should stand part of the Bill, the official Opposition failed to divide the Committee. I shall be fascinated to see what they do tonight on Third Reading. I hope they discovered the error of their ways on Second Reading and have realised that others may have noticed that what they proposed was, in effect, to carry on with revaluation, which is the opposite of their announced policy.

I shall not detain the House further. We are happy to speed the Bill on its way to another place. It is a very small part of a major reform of local government finance, which we all wish to see, and we wish to see the Bill pass through the House tonight.

5.47 pm

Mr. Francois: I declare something of an interest in an historical sense at least, having served in local government in the mid-1990s. I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), and I listened carefully to what he said. I was slightly disturbed to hear earlier this afternoon that his hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), was not able to be with us as anticipated, because unfortunately she is not very well. The hon. Gentleman may not know that I was the Conservative candidate in Brent, East at the 1997 general election, when I fought against a chap called Mr. Ken Livingstone, who was then a Member of Parliament. I ran him fairly close—just another 16,000 little votes and I would have defeated him. Having some familiarity with the hon. Lady's constituency, I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would pass on my regards and, I am sure, those of all other hon. Members, and wish her a safe and healthy return to us next week.

It is a pleasure to speak shortly after my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson), who worked in local government in Essex earlier in her career. Her knowledge of these matters was clearly reflected in the quality of her contribution a few minutes ago.

The Bill has just two clauses. It is one of the shortest that I have debated in my time in the House, but it serves an important purpose in that it delays the revaluation of properties for council tax purposes in England. In a briefing note that was produced in October, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors pointed out that the proposed revaluation which was to be undertaken by the Revaluation Office Agency would have represented "the largest exercise of its kind in the world".

As such, the decision to delay it, which the Bill facilitates, represents one of the first major post-election climbdowns by the Government—although given recent events, I trust that it will by no means be the last.

It is a truism that no one likes paying taxes, but the level of council tax, even on the existing valuations, which will run for several more years at least, is one of the major features of my constituency mailbag. That is particularly true in the spring, when council tax demands go out, and in responses from pensioners, many of whom live on relatively fixed incomes and find that their council tax bill is their biggest single monthly outlay, particularly if they have paid off their mortgage. Many people experience considerable difficulty in meeting those bills, so at least they will not face the added burden of a revaluation in the short term.

As part of the debate on this Bill has related to the subject and process of billing, I want to make a few brief points on how changes in the billing system have affected public attitudes to the spending of funds by precepting authorities. The breaking-down of components on the overall council tax bill into individual line items, such as policing and fire and civil protection, has, I think, been a positive move on the whole. It certainly tends to concentrate constituents' minds on how money is actually spent on those particular services, once they are itemised.

For instance, when I was first elected to this House back in 2001, I think that some of those items were still effectively subsumed within the overall totals. However, it is interesting to note that now that those have been broken out, constituents have started to ask more specific questions about how such itemised money is being spent. I see that one or two Labour Members are nodding in assent to that proposition.

Policing precepts, for example, have generated quite a bit of correspondence from my constituents in the past few years. Indeed, one of the reasons why I am so opposed to the regionalisation of police forces in East Anglia is that Essex has a relatively low police precept compared with other East Anglian forces, so any regional merger would probably lead to a rounding-up of precepts, which could lead to proportionately higher increases in Essex on the policing precept and thus on the overall bottom-line level of council tax. I shall say nothing more about that subject this afternoon for fear of straying out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but suffice to say that people pay enough council tax in Essex as it is, without having to pay an even higher bottom-line figure to prop up unpopular reforms that have little or no public support.

I suspect that part of the Government's rationale behind backing away from short term revaluation has been the howl of protest that followed the change to the formula determining the level of grant paid to local authorities by Her Majesty's Treasury. Because between two thirds and three quarters of the eventual council tax is determined by that level of grant, however the individual properties within the local authority are banded, any changes to the formula clearly have important implications for the remaining element, which has to be raised directly by the local authority. That then falls across the council tax base, which we now know is not likely to be revalued in the short term.

I must challenge the Minister on a point that he raised on Report. Any alteration in the grant formula normally creates winners and losers, and the change, which took place a few years ago, from the standard spending assessment system to the revised formula spending share system certainly did that all right. The Minister contended on Report that there are very few specific examples where that has been a problem. I shall answer his point directly: most of the losers in the transfer of resources that took place in the switch from SSA to FSS were not exclusively, but overwhelmingly local authorities—both county and district councils—concentrated in the south-east of England; most of the gainers, although not exclusively, were urban and metropolitan authorities in the midlands and the north of England. There was effectively an important shift of resources from the south-east to the midlands and the north, which had important knock-on effects on the council tax bills subsequently levied on council tax payers.

In the year in which the switch took place, the county council precept in Essex went up by 16 per cent. in one hit, because millions and millions of pounds in grant were removed from Essex and given to Labour's friends in the midlands and the north.

Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the vast majority of deprived areas are in central London, the west midlands and the north? The resources were shifted to recognise the deprivation in those areas.

Mr. Francois: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for admitting that the switch took place. I am pleased that a Labour Back Bencher has been honest enough to put that on the record in the House of Commons.

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman would be fairer if he acknowledged that the level of grant to Essex has increased in line with inflation or above it in every year since 1997. He can hardly say, therefore, that the increase in council tax was the result of taking away funding. He says that the Government were accused of having an underlying political motivation. That implies that all the areas that lost out on some of the funding changes, relative to what they would have received, were controlled by his party, which is not the case.

Mr. Francois: The Minister is well aware of what happened, as am I and all Members of this House. The public reaction to the change was reflected in the subsequent local elections, when the Labour party was slaughtered in Essex. I confidently predict that it will get another hiding in May.

Sir Paul Beresford: Perhaps part of the answer is that even if the Minister is right that Essex got more in percentage terms, its proportion of the total sum available dropped, while many of the northern councils, especially in urban areas, received more money through the change to the SSA, particularly as many of the indices were subjective rather than objective and therefore able to be manipulated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps in the last few minutes of the debate we could return to the terms of the Third Reading motion.

Mr. Francois: I apologise for my hon. Friend tempting me to stray, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I would just say, in obeying your instruction, that he is absolutely right.

We heard several good speeches on Report. My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) made a thoughtful speech in which he raised the possibility of voluntary revaluation in certain limited geographical areas if residents wanted to be revalued for some pressing local reason. He did not give his argument a name, but I would characterise it as revaluation by consent.

During the debate on the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), we discussed whether, if we do eventually revalue at some point in the future, there would be any merit in running pilot revaluations in a few parts of the country to test the effects. I cannot imagine that many areas would rush forward to volunteer for that. Nevertheless, I suggest to the Minister that there might be some merit in doing it, not least to try to persuade people that the system is not bent. Whatever the Government were trying to do, a lot of the resistance arose because, given what had happened in Wales and with the grant shift, many people genuinely felt that the revaluation would not be fair. I think that the Minister would privately concede that. I make this as an entirely non-partisan suggestion.

Local government finance is the 21st century equivalent of the Schleswig-Holstein question. We have to come up with a grant formula that everyone can agree is equitable. Some people liked SSA and did not like FSS; some liked FSS and did not like SSA. It has been argued that some authorities needed more help with the process. I hope that the Lyons review will come up with an equitable formula, but if it is unable to do so, I hope and trust that an incoming Conservative Government will solve the problem.

NHS Dentistry (Durham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Roy.]

5.59 pm

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I am grateful to have obtained the Adjournment debate for which I asked because I am concerned about the present and future availability of national health service dental services in Durham.

Twenty dentists in Durham provide NHS care but some of them do so only for the under-18s and other exempt cases under a personal dental services contract. All practices in my City of Durham constituency have currently closed their lists to new NHS patients. I understand that the nearest open list is at Chester-le-Street community hospital.

Problems with the availability of NHS dental care in Durham are unfortunately not new. In response to previous representations from me and my predecessor, the primary care trust agreed to employ a salaried dentist directly. That appointment was made but that NHS list is also closed, albeit temporarily.

The PCT intended to take on another salaried dentist and confirmed that in a meeting with me in the summer. In the event, that did not happen for a variety of practical reasons and the PCT does not currently have the financial resources to support it. Discussions with dentists about expanding their NHS provision are currently being held up until further details of the new general dental services contact are known.

Durham, like many commuter towns, faces a problem of the demand for dental services being higher than the size of its population base would suggest was necessary because many people who work in the city but do not live there register with a dentist. The PCT argues that that makes planning for the correct amount of dental services difficult. It also has the effect of pricing local, low-income people out of dental care because many of those who come into the city for employment can afford to be private patients.

The problem of "privatisation" has been happening for some years, with several dentists "encouraging" or forcing their NHS patients to become private ones. Sometimes lists are completely closed to NHS patients.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am glad that the hon. Lady has secured such an important debate. When I listen to her speaking about Durham, I realise that her comments apply to Wellingborough, which suffers from exactly the same problem of dentists opting to go private. My constituents have to leave the constituency to find an NHS dentist.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We cannot widen the debate by intervention. The debate, which the hon. Lady has won, is about dentistry in Durham.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I have enormous sympathy for the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone).

As I said, several patients are forced to register as private patients. There was an unfortunate example in the summer, when a dentist gave two weeks' notice to his patients, did not inform the PCT, and told his patients that if they wished to re-register with him, they would have to do that on a private basis.

I would like the Minister of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), to make some comments about how we can encourage dentists to take their social responsibilities to provide NHS care more seriously, especially as they are trained and supported by the NHS. I know that that applies only to some dentists, but I would welcome her comments on that.

I can see that the Government have taken action to try to address the problem of a shortage of NHS dentists by employing more dentists, setting and recently achieving a target of 1,000 new dentists, and I know that there are 170 extra training places this year in dental schools—a 25 per cent. increase on 2004–05. I also understand that additional capital money is being made available, and discussions are taking place about a new dental school. But those measures, welcome though they are, are not delivering on the ground for the people in Durham.

In addition to the extra resources now being put into NHS dental services, I understand that the Government are placing a great deal of faith in the general dental services contract being introduced from April 2006, which they say is a large part of the solution to current problems. Feedback from the Durham and Chester-le-Street PCT, however, does not fill me with optimism. Already the PCT has received one letter of resignation giving the reason as the introduction of the new contact. The primary care development manager has stated that she has had many discussions with dentists over the past few months and she has yet to hear a positive view of the contract.

Orthodontists are also very unhappy with the proposals relating to them. Incidentally, Durham has only one orthodontist practice, and the waiting time for treatment is currently 20 months, which is also very unsatisfactory. Anecdotal evidence suggests that once dentists receive their contract values and activity levels from the Dental Practice Board, which I understand is happening soon, most will not wish to renegotiate their NHS contracts. The majority are unwilling to commit themselves without that information.

Obviously, I find this information very worrying. Faced with a potential sudden large reduction in the amount of dental capacity available on the NHS, the PCT will need to provide a direct PCT service, but currently the PCT does not have the capacity either in terms of dentists or surgeries to be able to re-provide that service.

Patients involved in a PCT consultation exercise also had some difficulties with the new contracts. They seemed to be concerned that dentists would no longer hold lists of registered patients as there would be no long-term responsibility for the quality of care provided. They were concerned that patients might not be able to receive continuity of care.

Patients also feel that the way that charges are structured in the new contract—with a fixed price for fillings, for example, no matter how many they have—would encourage people to wait until they require a large number of fillings before visiting the dentist? That would probably apply more to those on lower incomes, creating inequality in dental care. That sentiment was also reflected in consultations with the professionals.

The PCT and the British Dental Association acknowledge that the new charging system is simpler, and that there will be winners and losers in terms of cost—those requiring one-off, more intensive treatment are likely to be the winners, and those needing regular lower-level treatment are likely to be the losers. The British Dental Association maintains that we shall need to train yet more dentists and other dental team members. It notes that demand for dentists is outstripping supply, which is why dentists are closing their books.

According to the BDA, in 2005, 15 per cent. of general dental practitioners were not taking on new child patients, 37 per cent. were not taking on new exempt adults, and 15 per cent. were not taking on new paying adults—a significant rise since 2000. It is also concerned that additional funding might not reach front-line dental services when PCTs become responsible for commissioning from April 2006.

The BDA acknowledges that the value of the private market has grown rapidly over the past 10 years and that NHS care still outstrips private practice, but it suggests that the move towards private care is prompted by a lack of investment in NHS dentistry. Evidence shows that dentists do not typically earn more in private practice than in the NHS, but that they can earn similar amounts of money while being able to spend longer with patients.

I think that it is fair to say that reaction to the new general dental services and personal dental services contracts has been mixed. More than anything, dentists appear to want a break from the treadmill so that the link is broken between treatments provided and remuneration received. The view being expressed by the BDA, however, is that under the new contracts dentists will lose the flexibility to work at their own pace but will be unable to get off the treadmill. The basis of the new system is that the contractor will complete a number of units of dental activity, set by the local PCT, in return for a set monthly payment.

Dentists are also concerned because the new proposals do not encourage disease prevention or the maintenance of good oral hygiene, as preventive care does not specifically attract units of dental activity. They are also of the view that the new system has not been sufficiently piloted before being rolled out across the country. They note that although one or two aspects of the new GDS contract proposals have been tested in the PDS agreements, the UDA output system is, they contend, as yet entirely untested. The BDA maintains that the shortage of dentists is likely to continue for some time.

I raised those more general points about the contract and work force planning matters because I should like reassurance from the Minister about the likely impact of the new contracts in terms of improving access to NHS dental services in Durham. I should like her to comment on the steps that she might take to alleviate the current unacceptable problem in Durham—that no NHS facility is available to new patients. What support will be given to PCTs directly to employ dentists if the mixed economy of dental care does not deliver enough NHS capacity post-April 2006 and they need to employ salaried dentists to achieve NHS output?

I hope that the Minister will accept that my overriding concern is to ensure that the people of Durham have a first-class NHS dental service, which reflects the Government's commitment to the NHS.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) on securing the debate. The topic is not only important but timely. As we speak, general dental services dentists' individual contract values are being sent to them and details of the new system of charges for patients and the regulations governing the new GDS and personal dental services contracts will be released shortly. My hon. Friend pointed out that many dentists were waiting for some of that information before committing themselves. They will now be able to see exactly what the new contract means for them. I hope that that will address many of the issues that she raised.

My hon. Friend referred to the situation in Durham and I want to touch on some of the improvements that have been made there, bearing in mind that there are still some difficulties, as she pointed out. I want also to talk about how local commissioning will give all primary care trusts assistance in developing local dental services.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, there have been severe access problems. We have tried to address them through a variety of means, including domestic and international recruitment and the expansion of personal dental services. In Durham, the PCT took various steps to deal with the problems. It appointed two salaried dentists a year ago and expanded personal dental services. In Durham and Chester-le-Street, six of the 23 practices—about 26 per cent.—are in PDS, which is close to the national average of about 28 per cent.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Will the Minister give some further clarification about the two dentists directly employed by the PCT? Only one of them is employed in City of Durham. The PCT had intended to employ two salaried dentists in my constituency, but for the reasons I gave earlier it was unable to do so.

Ms Winterton: The PCT area may be wider than that of the constituency.

The PDS practices have a combined contract value of £1.78 million, which includes growth funding of £558,000. That is new money, and it has been made available by the Department of Health to my hon. Friend's local PCT. As she said, there are problems, but those practices were treating almost 24,000 patients at the end of October. The roll-out of the new dental contracts will provide an opportunity for the PCT to look at the PDS agreements and make sure that the units of dental activity agreed with the practice reflect significant recent growth. May I emphasise the fact that the PDS contracts are pilots from which lessons have been learned? In the next few months, we will sit down with dentists to look at levels of activity under PDS contracts to see whether there is room for growth in certain areas. The PDS pilots, combined with the new guidelines from the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, provide greater flexibility. For example, patients do not necessarily need to see their dentist every six months—the time between check-ups can be up to 24 months. The lesson of the PDS pilots is that there is flexibility and room for growth in certain areas. That is one of the benefits of the new system, and it gives PCTs local flexibility.

My hon. Friend's PCT received £65,000 from the £50 million that the Government made available to improve access last year. That sum funded 1,300 additional patient contracts across 10 local practices in the area. The PCT must await details of next year's budget before it makes further NHS dentistry commitments. However, I can assure my hon. Friend that those details will be released shortly, allowing the PCT and local dentists to look at the way in which local commissioning can be used for local investments. They can look at local priorities to ensure that dental services meet all local oral health needs.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): I have a slight interest in our debate, although it is becoming slighter and slighter as I continue my parliamentary career. I hope that we can apply a little lateral thinking. At the moment, we look at the number of patients who are seen, contacts and so on. However, we have a mixed dental service, and patients can be treated on the national health service or privately. Dentists can offer different treatments for the same disease, but most of those treatments are available only outside the NHS. It is important that dentists remain with the NHS, because patients should have a choice as to whether they receive treatment on the NHS or privately. A treadmill system has been introduced—I know that the Minister does not entirely agree—and I urge her to reconsider the proposals and provide flexibility so that more patients can approach more dentists for NHS treatment if they wish to receive it.

Ms Winterton: I contest the notion that this is another treadmill. It is important that, under the new system, dentists can continue to undertake a mix of private, public and NHS work. The new contracts will reflect the way in which they have previously worked. We expect dentists who have recently undertaken units of activity or interventions to make a reasonable commitment to the same level of activity with the same cohort of patients, although we accept that they may undertake a mixture of private and NHS work.

My hon. Friend is concerned about access problems caused by the fact that people outside the city are registered with local dentists. That has been the case for many years, and we have no plans to replace the system because doing so would require many people to find different dentists from those to whom they have become accustomed. It is true that the system is not based on residency, but changing it could affect continuity of care for existing patients.

My hon. Friend asked what would happen if dentists did not take up the new contract. The point of the changes that we are making is this: in the past, when a dentist has left the NHS the money has returned to the centre; now, the primary care trust will retain it locally. That money must be spent on NHS dentistry, which means that more dentists can be brought into the area if there is a shortage. It can be spent on salaried dental services if the PCT thinks that appropriate, although such services usually involve community dental acces centres and the like. PCTs can also commission additional services from existing dentists. The money will be there to meet local needs.

As my hon. Friend said, in the longer term we are reversing the closure of two dental schools. The British Dental Association has spoken of the need to increase the number of dentists, and there is such a need—although more dentists are registered, fewer of them work for the NHS.

My hon. Friend is right about what we hope to achieve with the new system. We have discussed with dentists the need to move away from the drill and fill treadmill and to introduce a much simpler charging system. I hope that that will result in a commitment to NHS dentistry. We want to rectify many of the problems that dentists say they have experienced with earlier contracts. Our recruitment of some 1,400 more dentists over the past year demonstrates that there are dentists out there who wish to work for the NHS, but we will continue the programme if some dentists do not want to join in our reforms.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Winterton: I will, although my hon. Friend made many points with which I want to deal.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I am grateful to the Minister. Will she say a little more about why she and her Department are so confident that the dentists will be happy with the contract? The consultation in Durham revealed that no dentists were in favour of it.

Ms Winterton: Over the past few months, the acting chief dental officer has met a number of dentists who have been awaiting further information about the contract values and the regulations that will accompany the contract. I think that there has been a certain amount of misinformation about exactly what is expected. For instance, dentists thought that they would no longer be able to have children only or exempt only lists.

The aim of the regulations that we have submitted for consultation is to ban an unacceptable practice that has been raised by many Members in the House. Dentists were saying "We will treat your children if you will register as a private patient." It will be perfectly possible in future for PCTs to say to dentists "Yes, you can have a children only list." PCTs should be able to look at what is happening locally and say whether it is acceptable. We have tried to tackle a position that we considered unacceptable. Dentists thought that none of them would be able to have those lists under the new contract, which was not the case.

One of the other issues that came up was a feeling that dentists would no longer be able to do some private work and some NHS work. Again, that is not the case. They will be able to mix the two. We must be clear that we are offering a contract under which if NHS dentists give a reasonable commitment to the NHS, they will be able to earn about £80,000 a year, and up to another £60,000 can go towards the expenses of their practice. That is guaranteed for three years, for something like 5 per cent. less activity. We are anxious to ensure that if there is room for expansion, the units of dental activity would cover it. I do not think that that is an unfair deal. Nor do I think that it is bad that we are simplifying the system of patient charges.

My hon. Friend suggested that preventive care might not be possible, but the new system of banded charges specifically allows for preventive oral health advice. That is clearly covered as part of the treatment provided, which is exactly what dentists have been asking us to do.

My hon. Friend asked about the current provision of orthodontic services in Durham, which I accept is not ideal. The strategic health authority is looking into the matter and there has been a big increase in the number of orthodontic treatments over the past few years, although there is no doubt that there are problems in some areas.

Today, the Department has issued guidance on commissioning specialist services, with particular reference to orthodontics. There is clear guidance on determining need, on targeting resources and on how to use the new contract arrangements both for general dentist practitioners and dentists with specialist orthodontic expertise. We hope that that will go some way towards relieving the problem.

I hope that my hon. Friend will be assured that we are moving forward very quickly. I accept the fact that some of her local dentists may have been anxious to know the details of the new contract and what their own contract values were, but I hope that in the coming period we will be able to show them exactly what the benefits are.

I reiterate that this is all about making the charging system simpler and taking dentists off the drill and fill treadmill. I think that it is a good deal in return for a good commitment to the NHS, and will ensure that dentists can do preventive work. That is built into the contract and the charging system. It is guaranteed for three years and it replaces the 400 current charges and the way in which dentists have been paid for those, with fixed monthly income.

I feel that that is a good deal and it goes alongside the increases in training that we have already started and the fact that we will increase dental schools. Altogether, I hope that dentists in my hon. Friend's constituency, while recognising that there are still concerns, will be able to benefit from the changes, and that patients in her area will be able to benefit as well. It is a good deal, it will be good for patients and I think that it will put an end to some of the problems that my hon. Friend has experienced in her constituency.

Points of Order

9.50 am

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you help me? Yesterday, at business questions, the Deputy Leader of the House stated that there would be no opportunity to debate the police restructuring proposals before Christmas, yet on Wednesday the Home Secretary, when challenged at a regional newspapers lunch by Ian Mean, the editor of The Citizen, said that the House would have three opportunities before the Christmas recess to debate those proposals. I have written to the Home Secretary but have not yet had a reply, and I gave his office notice that I would raise this point of order. Could you help me, Madam Deputy Speaker, in letting me know how I can progress the matter to make sure that the record is corrected?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): The hon. Gentleman will recall that Mr. Speaker suggested that the matter should be pursued through the usual channels, so I advise him to do just that.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker, and very much in that context. Are you aware of any contact between the Home Secretary and the Government Chief Whip, so that the Chief Whip can deliver what the Home Secretary has apparently promised us? It would be helpful to the House if we could be reassured that undertakings apparently given outside this place by the Home Secretary to provide debating time will be delivered as promised.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret to inform the right hon. Gentleman that I am unable to reassure him on that point.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Has it been brought to your attention that of the first 3,000 people who replied to the consultation undertaken by West Mercia police, 88 per cent. want the status quo on the area and strategic force—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Orders of the Day

Criminal Law (Amendment) (Protection of Property) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.52 am

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It gives me great pleasure to introduce the Bill. In doing so, I pay tribute to my illustrious predecessors, not least my hon. Friends the Members for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) and for Newark (Patrick Mercer), who set the scene for the measure. I also pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), who has joined me today to lend his support for my attempt to take the Bill to its next stage. He has done much work for his constituent, Tony Martin, whose case was probably the one that instigated our attempts. I pay tribute to my three colleagues.

I am delighted to tell the House that I enjoy the support of the whole Conservative parliamentary party, and there is much support for the measure in the country. It has indeed proved to be the people's choice. Seldom in one's parliamentary career does one have the opportunity to make a difference to people's lives and I feel that this is my moment—my parliamentary moment. Normally, I do not win on the lottery, either the national lottery or the lottery of life—

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): That is because the hon. Lady does not buy a ticket.

Miss McIntosh: I knew there must be a reason. However, I am delighted to have secured fifth place in the ballot for private Members' Bills.

I want to explain why we need a change in the law. The law is not clear and we need a deterrent to show burglars why they will meet more force and resistance than may have been the case hitherto. Undoubtedly, fear of crime, and of burglary in particular, is increasing and the violence used by burglars is increasing, too. Only this week, on 30 November, The Birmingham Post reported that a shop assistant had been shot twice in the face during a robbery in Birmingham and that he could lose his eye. The report stated that the father of two, Imran Shah, who is only 21 years old

"was serving in the 24-hour Hamza Food Store in Sparkbrook at 2 am . . . when two masked men swooped."

The time has come to redress the balance.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): My hon. Friend may remember that about three years ago in my store in Swansea I confronted a shoplifter who attacked me. Had I used force to retaliate and if he had fallen backwards and sustained head injuries, I might have found myself in court facing charges of using disproportionate force to protect myself. Is not the problem in such cases that when someone is confronted by a burglar the last thing that they should be thinking about is whether they will end up in court? They need to protect themselves, and the Bill will allow them to do that.

Miss McIntosh: I bow in admiration of the heroic efforts of my hon. Friend. He has illustrated the problem more graphically than most Members could do.

Chris Bryant: I am glad that the hon. Lady is bowing in admiration and praise to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). However, I think I am correct in saying that in the example he gave the shop was open and the hon. Lady, too, referred to an incident in a shop that was open. In neither case had trespass occurred, so her Bill would have been of no use whatever.

Miss McIntosh: I am tempted to ask whether we are boxer shorts or briefs today.

Two successive Metropolitan Police Commissioners, Sir John Stevens and Sir Ian Blair, have said that this change in the law is needed. Sir John Stevens said that "householders should be presumed to have acted legally, even if a burglar dies, unless there is contrary evidence".

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab) rose—

Chris Bryant rose—

Miss McIntosh: I want to make some progress.

Mr. Dismore: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Lady is not giving way at the moment.

Miss McIntosh: When we consider recent case law we can see that the reasonable force defence is not satisfactory. The case of Tony Martin captured public imagination. Most of us would prefer, if we were being burgled, to phone the police and receive, as we would expect, a prompt response. However, as we have just heard in points of order, we are faced with a restructuring of the police force and in areas such as North Yorkshire and Norfolk we shall undoubtedly lose our rural police forces, as officers will be asked to serve in urban areas on anti-terrorist or security duties and will have even less time to attend to burglaries. People such as Tony Martin will thus regrettably be faced with the prospect of having to take the law into their own hands.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing forward this excellent Bill. She rightly mentions the case of my constituent, Tony Martin, who was driven to desperation due to the lack of a police response. He should not have been charged with murder; I feel strongly that when burglars break into a house they should leave their rights outside, except in the most extreme circumstances. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Tony Martin case has sparked a huge national debate and that there is a large amount of public support for her measure? Why are the Government not listening to her and supporting her Bill?

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Perhaps we shall all get a surprise this morning and find that the Government are willing to support my reasonable proposals.

The Tony Martin case captured public imagination. Regrettably, however, a threshold was crossed and the burglar was fleeing the building, possibly not with stolen property—that could not be proved—and Tony Martin ceased to be acting in self-defence and was an aggressor. The modest provisions in my short three-clause Bill set out precisely where grossly disproportionate force would kick in.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Let me cite an example of something that happened to my family. My wife returned home one day to find burglars in the house. If she had set the dog on them, would she have been safe under the Bill? If she had done that and a burglar had been injured terribly, I am not sure whether she could have been charged under the current law.

Miss McIntosh: We would rely on the courts to decide what grossly disproportionate force would be.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss McIntosh: May I make some progress?

I wish to cite two recent cases that demonstrate how the criminal justice system is failing the victim—the home owner and the property owner. Persistent offenders can be released early and then go on to commit burglaries, which can lead to the death of innocent victims, as these cases show. Marian Bates was innocently going about her business as a jeweller in her shop in Nottingham. The persistent offender in that case was let out on licence. He was meant to be tagged and under the supervision of a security firm, but he released himself from the tag and went on, with tragic consequences, to commit a horrendous burglary during which he murdered Marian Bates. The case of John Monckton was equally tragic. It is a matter of fact that the main perpetrator in that case had been released after serving only seven years of his 12-year sentence for attempted murder.

The people of England feel badly let down by the Government not only because the police are not in a position to attend burglaries as quickly as would be liked, especially in rural areas, but because it is perceived that burglaries are on the increase. When burglaries do occur, they are virtually risk-free because there is little chance of a burglar being detected, prosecuted or convicted.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I fully support my hon. Friend's attempt to change the law on the use of reasonable force against people who are found in others' homes. Given the inadequacy of the law and the prevalence of burglary that she describes, may I draw her attention to the case of one of my constituents? He woke one early morning to find two people in his house and chased them off. When the case went to court, those people offered the defence that they had been in the house looking for their cat. Incredibly, the case fell because of lack of evidence that they had the intent to steal. Is it not absurd that they were able to offer that defence? Should not the law be changed further so that there is a presumption that if people enter premises with no reasonable excuse, they commit a crime?

Miss McIntosh: My hon. Friend makes a valid point and echoes the sentiments expressed by the former Metropolitan Police Commissioner, Sir John Stevens.

Against the background of an increase in violence, we need a recognition that the concept of reasonable force is simply not understood. When the Crown Prosecution Service guidelines were issued earlier this year, Sir Ian Blair said that for a person faced with an intruder in their home at 4 am, the concept of reasonable force is difficult to understand, yet the concept of grossly disproportionate force would be more obvious.

We are not asking for the Oklahoma law and we are not saying that anything goes. However, people should not be prosecuted for force that is less than excessive or grossly disproportionate. The Government used that test when they introduced a provision in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 to allow burglars to sue home owners or property owners for damages if they had been subjected to such force. I argue strongly that the same test should apply under criminal and civil law.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Constituents in Kettering are fully behind my hon. Friend's reasonable proposals because in Nottingham, as recent Home Office figures show, there is a rising fear of crime and a worryingly low burglary detection rate. Local people want extra protection against criminals.

Miss McIntosh: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

The Crown Prosecution Service guidelines do not go far enough. They refer to people doing what they

"honestly and instinctively believe is necessary in the heat of the moment", but that could cover a multitude of things, some of which could well lead to the death of an intruder. However, under the heading "Will you believe the intruder rather than me?", the guidelines say:

"We hope that everyone understands that the police have a duty to investigate incidents involving a death or injury."

It is still the case that an innocent victim will be subject to a police investigation and thus public attention.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that burglars are well aware of their rights before they commit a burglary? If the Bill is passed, it will send a strong message to all burglars. Does she have any evidence that some people might not have committed burglaries if the terms of the Bill had been in place?

Miss McIntosh: I hope that we can examine that matter in Committee. My hon. Friend is right that most burglaries that were examined in the context of the Bill were not opportunistic, but well thought out and designed for a specific purpose.

Let me move on to the definitions in the Bill. I paid tribute earlier to my hon. Friends the Members for North Thanet and for Newark. My Bill is different from their Bills, and especially the Bill that was introduced earlier this year by my hon. Friend the Member for

[Miss McIntosh]

Newark, because it would extend to all properties, both commercial properties and homes. It is interesting to note that the Bill enjoys the considerable support of members of the Federation of Small Businesses and members of the National Neighbourhood Watch Association. I was staggered to discover that Federation of Small Businesses statistics show that 58 per cent. of small firms are the victims of crime each year. I wanted to take account of excellent points made in the Standing Committee that considered the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Newark. It would be wrong to limit the Bill's provisions purely and simply to homes, so I want to extend it to all properties, including commercial properties, such as shops and retail premises.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Newark recognised, we want a threshold for when prosecutions should be brought. I thus argue that no prosecution should be brought against a person without the permission of the Attorney-General. In preparation for the Committee stage of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Newark, the flawed trawl of the Crown Prosecution Service found that there had been 26 cases in a 15-month period, of which 11 had been brought to prosecution. The measure in my Bill would dramatically limit future prosecutions.

Clause 1 would amend the Criminal Law Act 1967. Proposed new section 3(1C) says:

"'building or part of a building' shall have the same meaning as in section 9 of the Theft Act 1968"

The Bill thus covers all buildings, homes, commercial vehicles and vessels. It is worth considering the provisions of the Theft Act 1968 because it makes the good point that the offence of burglary is a serious crime that involves not only a threat to property, but a threat to the privacy of one's own home. That factor differentiates the offence from simple theft. Over time, the offence has been understood to cover a dwelling place and to encompass any building. Under the Theft Act, someone is guilty of burglary if "he enters any building or part of a building as a trespasser and with intent to commit any offence"

They are also guilty if, having entered the building or part of it, they steal or attempt to steal anything in the building or inflict grievous bodily harm on anyone in the building. The Act includes in those offences the offences of "stealing . . . of inflicting . . . grievous bodily harm or raping any woman . . . and of doing unlawful damage to the building or anything therein."

References to "a building" in the Act also apply to vehicles and vessels.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for defining the nature of the offence. It was suggested earlier that if someone entered premises such as a shop and committed an offence, those provisions would not apply. Is she aware that someone who enters and exceeds the term of their licence for entering premises becomes a trespasser ab initio and can be charged with burglary?

Miss McIntosh: The whole House has benefited from my hon. Friend's astute clarification which, I hope, will lead to even greater support for the Bill. I asked the Home Office for the level of burglary detection in each of the past eight years. Incredibly, it has fallen dramatically. When the Conservatives left government in 1997, 23 per cent. of burglaries were detected by the police in England and Wales. As of 2001–02, that rate had reduced to 12 per cent., and the detection rates for offences of burglary recorded by the police in England and Wales was only 13 per cent. in 2004. Right hon. and hon. Members will know that many people who report burglaries, particularly of vehicles, are simply given a police number. Those burglaries are not investigated or detected, so the offenders are never brought to book. Even more worryingly, only 3.6 per cent. of defendants were convicted of burglary in the courts in 2004–05. In the same year, only 1.6 per cent. of defendants were sentenced to immediate custody or given a custodial sentence for burglary.

What message are we as legislators giving victims and, indeed, potential burglars other than suggesting that burglary is completely risk-free? To receive a criminal sentence and be designated a criminal someone must be accused, and their crime must be detected, recorded and prosecuted. The figures show that that is simply not happening. In clause 2, I seek to extend the provisions of the Bill to Northern Ireland, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Newark, because when his Bill was in Committee he said that such measures should be relevant to Northern Ireland as well as to England and Wales. I would like the provisions of my Bill to extend to Scotland, as I am qualified as a Scottish advocate, albeit a non-practising one. I hope to pursue that proposal if I am fortunate enough to see my Bill proceed to Committee. Under proposed new subsection (1A), a property owner is not guilty of an offence unless they use "grossly disproportionate" force and unless the excessive nature of that force is apparent to them.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Can my hon. Friend confirm that the phrase "grossly disproportionate" originated in the Government's own amendment to civil law?

Miss McIntosh: My hon. Friend has been listening closely, as the Criminal Justice Act 2003 sets out the test for an offence to be grossly disproportionate. The Government had to revisit the issue in the light of the claim by Brendan Fearon against Tony Martin in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk. Brendan Fearon was granted legal aid, reportedly to claim compensation of £15,000 for the injuries that he received. I am delighted that in September 2003 the case was settled out of court when Brendan Fearon dropped his claim and Tony Martin therefore dropped his counter-claim. Such cases make a mockery of the law. I am arguing, with the support of my hon. Friends, that we need a consistent test. Burglars should not be able to sue us for damages that we may inflict on them when they intrude and trespass on our property and commit a criminal act so, under the Bill, there is a higher test of grossly proportionate force for the householder.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend has alighted on a very important point indeed. When Brendan Fearon sued Tony Martin for damages for the injuries that he sustained, that provoked outrage. Does my hon. Friend agree that any burglar who breaks into a property and commits a serious criminal offence should not be able to profit in a civil court?

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Brendan Fearon has not profited.

Miss McIntosh: Brendan Fearon would have profited if his civil action was successful. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk has clarified the point for us.

The arguments for the Bill are forceful. Burglary is virtually risk-free, and detection rates are at a 25-year low. Fewer than one in seven burglaries are cleared up by the police. Only three in 100 burglaries result in conviction. Public fear of crime in general and burglary in particular has increased, yet police in rural areas are severely stretched. My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), the shadow Home Secretary, said:

> "The term 'grossly disproportionate' was actually introduced by the present government in 2003 when it amended the civil law. I believe that it would be beneficial to amend the criminal law act in the same way, restoring the balance to the victim rather than the criminal. At a time when just three out of every one hundred burglaries results in a conviction, people need to be able to feel that they can protect their lives and property."

Dr. Palmer: rose—

Miss McIntosh: In conclusion, I am grateful for the wide support that the Bill has received.

Dr. Palmer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Lady to strangle debate by giving way only to Conservative Members?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is entirely the decision of the Member making the speech as to whether they choose to give way or not.

Miss McIntosh: I am mindful of the wide interest in the Bill, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I want to allow as many colleagues as possible to speak. I have been generous in giving way to Government Members.

I thank everyone who supports the Bill in every part of England, Wales and Northern Ireland. I thank the Federation of Small Businesses, the Security Institute, the National Neighbourhood Watch Association and the former burglar Bob Turney, who has lent his not insignificant expertise. I humbly submit that the Bill is very much needed. It would extend to both residential and commercial property owners the right to defend their lives, property and belongings without fear of prosecution. It would allow people to take action only where that was deemed not to be grossly disproportionate to the threat that they faced and, in such circumstances, they would not face criminal charges. It would bring criminal and civil law into line, restoring the balance in favour of the victim rather than the criminal, and it would increase protection for people throughout England, Wales and Northern Ireland, who expect the House to vote in favour of its provisions.

10.19 am

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): Initially, I shall ask some of the questions that the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) did not allow me to put during her own presentation. The first is that the crucial distinction made by her Bill by comparison with the current state of affairs is to replace the test of reasonableness with the test of gross disproportionality. She was asked by the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), who left the Chamber immediately afterwards, what would happen if his wife set the dog on an intruder. The hon. Lady responded—with respect to her—evasively, saying that that was a matter for the courts to decide. Is that not a classic example of the state of uncertainty, about which she and her hon. Friends complain, in the current situation?

At present, if the hon. Lady were to break into my house and I had to decide how far I could deter her, I would have to consider what would be deemed reasonable. Under her Bill, I would have to consider what was grossly disproportionate. It is possible to imagine situations where behaviour is unreasonable but not grossly disproportionate, or cases where it is grossly disproportionate but not unreasonable.

Let us take, for example, the case of the British tourist who, in one of the southern states of America, one dark night got lost. He went up the path to a remote house and wanted to ask the way. As he approached, the nervous householder, who I believe had been burgled several times, thought he was another intruder and shot the tourist dead. We could all agree that that was grossly disproportionate—[HON. MEMBERS: "Some of us would."] Unlike the hon. Lady, I shall be glad to give way if she wishes to intervene, but I hope she would agree that that was grossly disproportionate.

Could we also say that that was unreasonable? Looking at the case, at least through British eyes, we would say, yes, it was unreasonable. But suppose the householder had not shot the tourist dead, but merely wounded him. An American court, and, I submit, a British court might in that case have said, "Well, this is grossly disproportionate—using a firearm to attack somebody who has not yet done anything worse than walk up the drive—but is it unreasonable?" One could argue that with a history of burglaries, it is understandable if the householder feels nervous.

Here we have a case where the householder would be prosecuted under the hon. Lady's Bill, but not under the current law. Her Bill would replace one uncertainty with another uncertainty. That is being done not to resolve the uncertainty—if that was her intention she would merely adopt the formulation that the householder can do anything on his own premises—but to seek partisan advantage, by pretending to bring forward a different form of words which in practice would do nothing to reassure the householder that they would be able to operate. The householder would have exactly the same dilemma: to judge what a court might think of his or her behaviour—

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has just made a disgraceful statement and he knows it. For him to suggest that the Bill is being moved for partisan advantage rather than in response to public concern is about as sensible as Conservative Members trying to pretend that every Labour Member who opposes it is a burglar's friend.

Dr. Palmer: I am afraid I cannot share the hon. Gentleman's synthetic indignation. I note that not very many Opposition Members have bothered to turn up to take part in the debate. There are seven. Each of the Conservative Members present have pursued the issue in what seems to me a partisan spirit which is alien to what ordinary people in Britain want. What ordinary people want is a degree of certainty.

Mr. Paterson: Would the hon. Gentleman reflect that the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound) had a poll on the "Today" programme last Christmas and a measure like the Bill got overwhelming public support? His reply, which perhaps represents the view of the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) as well, was, "The people have spoken, the ". I am afraid the hon. Member for Ealing, North then used an unparliamentary word on the public airwaves.

Dr. Palmer: It is a common phrase that was used. It was used by a Conservative colleague of the hon. Gentleman on the website yesterday when he heard about the Labour gain in the constituency of Thurrock. Such partisan remarks are not unknown.

The fundamental question that we all have to answer is whether we have a degree of trust in the British jury system or not. If we examine a typical case, as evinced by several hon. Members who have spoken so far, we have great difficulty in imagining a British jury in the case described—the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who attempted to stop a shoplifter, or the hon. Member for Wellingborough, whose wife released a dog against an intruder—saying, "Yes, we are going to convict this person."

Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Palmer: With reluctance, but yes.

Mr. Flello: My hon. Friend is very kind. He mentioned the apprehension of, say, a shoplifter—someone who has gone into a premises and stolen something. The thief may have left the premises and may be on the street outside. He would no longer be covered by the Bill. Would the security guard giving chase have to stop and think, "I have moved from grossly disproportionate to reasonable force. Hang on a moment. Let me think back to the case law before I carry on apprehending this person."?

Dr. Palmer: I apologise to my hon. Friend for frivolously hesitating. He makes a good point.

If we are honest about it, in all these situations people are operating at the edge of law and are not sure where they stand. That is the problem which, to be fair, the hon. Lady's Bill purports to address, which the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) attempted to address, and which the Home Office guidance on the existing law attempted to address. It is a genuine difficulty. I share with the hon. Lady, though not, I think, with the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), the view that Tony Martin moved beyond the stage of preportionate response, even to the point of grossly disproportionate response.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend may have detected in the presentation by the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) of her Bill today that there has been quite a significant shift from the way the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) presented his Bill a year ago, when he made it clear that he did not think that Tony Martin was acting properly and lawfully, and that his Bill, as then drafted, would have made no difference to his case. The hon. Lady seems to be suggesting that he would be let off.

Dr. Palmer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am not aware of the details of the position of the hon. Member for Newark. If he wishes to intervene, he is welcome to do so.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): When I presented a similar Bill, I made no bones about my view that Mr. Tony Martin would be guilty of grossly disproportionate behaviour. My ears were fully open and, I trust, clean when I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) make precisely the same point.

Dr. Palmer: Fine. Whatever positions may or may not have been taken in the past, we, with the exception of the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) who represents Tony Martin and who is in a particularly difficult position, are approaching unanimity on that point. Unless someone wants to contradict me, the rest of us agree that Tony Martin exercised grossly disproportionate force.

Mr. Flello: Was it not also the case that the court found that Tony Martin had not used reasonable force and was therefore guilty under the existing legislation? In that case, what is the point of introducing the Bill?

Dr. Palmer: That is right. The Tony Martin case is useful because it illustrates one element of the grey area. We all agree that Tony Martin used excessive, grossly disproportionate force, and we disagree with a number of members of the general public, which is perhaps because the general public have not studied all the aspects of the case. For example, some members of the general public are not aware that the person who was shot was fleeing at the time, and they are not aware, as I understand it, that Mr. Martin left that person to die before calling the emergency services. Those elements clearly influenced the jury to convict Tony Martin. We must avoid going too far up the side alley of the Martin case, because as my hon. Friends have said, it was adequately covered by current legislation.

Conservative Members need to be careful, to use an outmoded metaphor, that they are not running with the fox and hunting with the hounds. The hon. Member for Vale of York and other Conservative Members cite the Tony Martin case as an example of strong public feeling, but if we agree that those elements of the public who sympathise with Tony Martin are mistaken, then it is not evidence to support her Bill or any other change in the law.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that Tony Martin's defending barrister, Anthony Scrivener, described the current arrangements as "simple and weighted overwhelmingly in favour of the householder"?

Dr. Palmer: I did not know that, but that is my understanding of the current law. However, we must be open about the point that some people are unsure whether that is the case. That is why it was particularly valuable when the Home Office issued a clarification last year—it is reasonable to say that the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark prompted the Home Office to issue that clarification. Many people who, until that point, had felt that the law needed to be changed, looked at the clarification and said, "In that case, the current law is probably about as good as it gets."

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons why misunderstandings have occurred and further clarification is required is the outrageous scaremongering by some Conservative Members on the past three occasions on which this Bill has been introduced?

Dr. Palmer: Yes; that returns me to my dialogue with the hon. Member for North Thanet. The issue has been exploited for partisan purposes, and it has also been whipped up by elements in the press. If one reads the Daily Express every day, and one reads only the Daily Express, it is very difficult to retain the will to live. [Laughter.] Every day, the front page contains a new catastrophe, a new sell-out, a new betrayal and a new threat to the existence of the British human race. Among the terrible catastrophes that the Daily Express describes is an alleged failure of the law to give due account to the position of the householder.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Gentleman has underestimated the absolute exasperation in the countryside at the thin level of policing and the impact of regular burglaries. In the Martin case, people concentrate on the grossly disproportionate use of force, but Tony Martin had been driven to total distraction and almost irrational behaviour because he had been burgled 10 times. The forces of law and order did not support him, because they were not there. Does the hon. Gentleman not see that the Bill would have a deterrent effect? If the criminal law were brought into line with the civil law, there would hopefully be less burglaries and less Tony Martins who have been driven to total distraction and irrational behaviour.

Dr. Palmer: Before I respond to the hon. Gentleman, will he clarify whether he feels that Tony Martin should not have been convicted?

Mr. Paterson: The use of force was grossly disproportionate. I am trying to get away from the physical action and into the state of mind of a man living in an isolated farmhouse in a rural area where the forces of law and order were unable to help him. Tony Martin had been burgled 10 times, and I repeat that he was driven to distraction and irrational behaviour. The hon. Gentleman must not underestimate the real fear on that front in rural areas. If the House were sensible enough to pass the Bill, which I wholeheartedly support, I hope that it would lead to less burglaries and people thinking twice before setting out to burgle a lonely farm such as Mr. Martin's.

Dr. Palmer: I will not correct the hon. Gentleman's grammar. [HON. MEMBERS: "Go on."] We all support the new literacy drive.

We all accept that the more isolated the property, the more people worry that they will not get an immediate response from the police. If we are honest, that worry will always exist, regardless of the level of policing. We will never have a policeman within immediate reach of every isolated farmhouse.

Mr. Flello: Does my hon. Friend agree that the way to make sure that the good people in rural areas are protected in the same way as the good people in more built-up areas is to ensure that we have proper and full policing in this country, which we have achieved thanks to the investment in policing under this Government? And does he agree that the greatest harm that we could do to people in rural communities would be to introduce the £35 billion of cuts suggested by the Conservative party?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. Members will concentrate their remarks on the Bill.

Dr. Palmer: I shall follow your instruction, Madam Deputy Speaker, and draw a veil over the matter.

Because I was asked directly about policing, it is probably in order to say that I agree that part of the solution that people want is a reasonable level of policing across the countryside. However, people are not unrealistic about that matter, and they do not expect a policemen to be within a couple of minutes of every isolated farmhouse, which is why we must accept that increased policing is not the whole solution. If we are treating the Bill seriously, it is probably not a complete answer to say that we should not worry because we have got more police, and I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) probably agrees with that point.

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab): The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) has mentioned the alleged deterrent effect of the Bill. Did my hon. Friend notice that when the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) introduced her Bill, she prayed in aid two tragic cases—that of Marian Bates, who was shot by a burglar, and that of the Monckton family? Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Vale of York provided no evidence that her Bill would have prevented either of those tragedies?

Dr. Palmer: Yes, I do agree. That is one of the fundamental difficulties about the Bill. Frankly, it is an example of gesture politics. If the Conservative party were in government, we would be sitting on the Opposition Benches saying that it is an example of the Government trying to be seen to do something. However, there is no evidence that it would make any concrete difference. I do not believe that a British jury would make this very fine distinction between unreasonable behaviour and grossly disproportionate behaviour. In a case such as that of Tony Martin, the jury would convict in either event. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley described his experience with a shoplifter. In a case such as that, the jury would acquit in either event. Indeed, I do not think that the Crown Prosecution Service would attempt to prosecute in such cases. As I understand it, it was not only the hon. Gentleman's immunity that protected him from prosecution.

[Dr. Palmer]

Mr. Paterson: It is most important that the hon. Gentleman address the question of deterrence. We will never have enough police to cover remote farmhouses in rural areas, so it is in the interests of the police and of the general public that before burglars set out they have a really hard think. Is it worth it? Is the risk higher? Surely if the Bill deters burglars, that is in all our interests, and the hon. Gentleman must agree that it will have a deterrent effect.

In response to the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson), my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York mentioned those violent cases merely as evidence that violence is increasing. My point is that there is a much broader public good to be gained from the Bill if burglars think twice and stay at home watching the telly, or preferably reading a book and doing something constructive.

Dr. Palmer: There are two tests of the Bill: first, whether it would have the effect that the hon. Gentleman hopes, and secondly, whether the incidence of mistaken injury done to innocent people would increase. It is reasonable for the House to consider both those issues. So far I have concentrated on whether it would have an effect.

Mr. Flello: On deterrence, does my hon. Friend agree that there is a possibility of the said burglar sitting at home and thinking, "Hang on a second. If I go burgling, I may get shot or stabbed—I had better arm myself."

Dr. Palmer: That is right. There is a real risk of an arms race. That takes us back to the argument, which is outside the scope of today's proceedings, about whether we should arm the police. It is traditionally argued that if we arm the police we are likely make it more probable that criminals will also be armed.

Mr. Paterson: That is irrelevant, because all the statistics show that violent crime is increasing. We all know that, regrettably, the vast majority of guns are held and used illegally.

Dr. Palmer: Despite the citing of several examples of violence, we are primarily discussing not violent crime but burglary. Under every form of measurement, the incidence of burglary has been falling since 1995. To make a non-partisan point, it started to fall under the last Conservative Government, because the sky-high rates of unemployment that had been reached were just beginning to come down, and it has been falling ever since. It is important that we do not give the public the false impression that they are more at risk of burglary than they were before, because everyone who has considered the issue seriously knows that that is not the case.

Mr. Khan: Is not the intervention by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) a classic example of leading people astray in a partisan way? Aggravated burglary—that is, where the burglar has a weapon—accounts for less than 1 per cent. of burglaries. Furthermore, the chance of someone being burgled is at its lowest point for 20 years.

Dr. Palmer: Yes, that is right. It is not a question of reported crime. It is generally accepted that burglary is usually reported, if only to get a crime number for insurance purposes. We are comparing like with like—police statistics with police statistics and the recorded crime survey with the equivalent survey. If we are having a serious discussion, we should accept that burglary is becoming less common. That is not only because of Government action, although that has a great deal to do with it, but because people are getting better at ordering their security—alarm systems and so on. It is also because some criminal gangs are diversifying into activities such as smuggling where the pay-off is higher and the risk is lower.

Mr. Khan rose—

Dr. Palmer: I shall give way to my hon. Friend once more, and then I should like to make some progress.

Mr. Khan: It is asserted that the figures are inaccurate because fewer crimes are reported. What about the British crime survey, which asks people about their actual experiences and so gives a more accurate picture of crime levels and trends across the country? Even according to that survey, the number of burglaries is the lowest for 20 years and aggravated burglaries represent less than 1 per cent. of all burglaries.

Dr. Palmer: I agree.

In order to make progress, perhaps hon. Members will accept for the sake of argument that the issue is not that the number of burglaries is going up—it has been going down for some time—but that people are still concerned about what they should do and what their legal position would be if a burglary were to occur.

I want to move on to the risk of injury to innocent persons. I gave the extreme example of the tourist in America who was shot dead. There are obviously many other possibilities that are much milder. In our densely populated cities, there is every chance that trespass, in the formal legal sense of the term, will happen many times a day in every city. We all have constituents who complain that youths whom they do not know have wandered into their garden. They are worried by it because they do not know what those youths, who have perhaps kicked a football over the wall or are just being insolent, have in mind. They feel uncertain and uneasy—and who can blame them? It is entirely reasonably that they should. The problem is that under the hon. Lady's Bill any response that was not seen as grossly disproportionate would become legal.

Let us consider what that means. For example, if a 14-year-old were to wander into the garden of a householder who had a history of being aggravated by local kids, and who then assaulted the child and bundled him off the premises, causing him bruising and minor injuries, would that be seen as grossly disproportionate? I am not sure that it would. Under the present law, it would certainly be seen as unreasonable, because it is unreasonable for someone to use force against a person who has merely strayed on to their property, unless they have first asked them to leave and taken all reasonable steps to get them to do so. Would it be grossly disproportionate? As a householder, I would have great difficulty in deciding whether it would be grossly disproportionate.

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree not only that it would be difficult to decide if a response was grossly disproportionate, but that there is an implication that it would be okay to be disproportionate?

Dr. Palmer: The hon. Lady makes a good point. If we changed the law in this way, we should be saying that it was okay to be disproportionate or unreasonable, so long as we were not grossly disproportionate. I would be very reluctant to anchor that principle in the law of Great Britain. The principle of reasonableness, which we apply to enormous swathes of the law, is very valuable. It has stood the test of time, and juries have traditionally interpreted it in a way that most of us would accept. If we were to move from the concept of what a reasonable person would do, and to adopt a concept of what a not-grossly-disproportionate person would do, I submit that we should be moving on to dangerous territory. We should be moving into the area of frontier law.

I hope that I am not misrepresenting the hon. Member for North Shropshire—he will correct me if I am—but I understood him to say that, because people in remote farmhouses, for example, cannot realistically expect the police to dash round at two minutes' notice, they need to take other measures to deter burglars and make them think twice before intruding on their property. I assume that such measures would include the possession of some kind of weapon with which the householder could defend themselves in the event of what they saw as a dangerous intruder entering their property. That would say to people across the countryside, "We encourage you to equip yourselves with weaponry, and, if you see someone who you believe to be an intruder, you can use those weapons on them so long as you are confident that a jury will not find that you have behaved in a grossly disproportionate manner." That would be dangerous in the extreme. I do not believe that the general public want it to be the norm in the British countryside for people to arm themselves in order to assault potential intruders. That is not where we want to go; it would lead to more trouble than we have at the moment.

Patrick Mercer: What the hon. Gentleman is saying makes a great deal of sense. There is nothing in the Bills introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York or myself that aims to aggravate the situations that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. That is precisely why we have included new subsection (1B).

Dr. Palmer: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, which was, as always, measured and restrained. None the less, as the hon. Member for Vale of York said in her introduction, the Bill would be significant in the sense that it would send a message to householders. There are two possible messages that we could send. One is that nothing much has changed; we might have changed the wording a bit, but basically people are still in the same legal grey area as before, in that they will not know whether they are going to be prosecuted or not. I suggest that, if we send that message, people will be quite fed up with us. They will say that we just mess about and do not change anything.

The other message that we could send is that people can take additional measures to arm or protect themselves against intruders. That is what people would understand by the Bill if it were passed. All the clarification in the world would not make a difference to that conclusion, and the result would leave the peace and quiet of the British countryside in a much worse position than it is today. There is a tradition in the British countryside, as I am sure the hon. Member for North Shropshire will confirm, that if someone gets lost or needs help, or if the weather turns unpleasant, they can go to a stranger's house and ask for assistance. People might be a little wary if they were to do that in central Nottingham—"Who is this stranger knocking on my door? What does he want?"—but the tradition still exists in the countryside. It would be a great pity if we were to tilt the balance away from that because of the increasingly rare cases of violent burglary. We must not put that balance at risk by starting what my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South referred to as a sort of arms race. We should not encourage householders to buy knives, to set traps, or to build barbed wire or electric fences in order to fight off intruders by themselves.

We all appreciate that people who choose to live in a remote area might be worried about the time that it can take for the police to respond when they are called. However, the measure proposed by the hon. Member for Vale of York would make no difference to the probability of conviction. It would instead risk sending a message that would be counterproductive to law in order in Britain. That is the fundamental risk that the Bill creates.

If the Bill had been presented in a non-partisan way, I would merely have thought it a mistake. As it stands, however, it seems to me to be a mistake that has been made for political reasons. This subject deserves more serious treatment than it has so far received.

10.57 am

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): Some extremely interesting points have been raised so far. Before I start to make my points, as best I can, I would like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), who introduced the issue in the first place. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for

[Patrick Mercer]

Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who has added tremendously to the Bill that I tried, unsuccessfully, to introduce at the beginning of this year.

The Bill before us today contains a number of provisions that are considerably better than those in my Bill, particularly proposed new subsection (1C), which clears up the misapprehensions—which I was partly responsible for broadcasting—about the difference between these provisions and those in the Theft Act 1968. I also want to pay tribute to the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon)—who, sadly, is unable to be present today—for the points that she made in Committee on the parts of my Bill that pertained to Northern Ireland.

I think that I am unique in that I am the only person in the Chamber today who knows and has spoken on many occasions to Mr. Brendon Fearon. Let me remind the court—I mean the House—of the Tony Martin case. When it came to light, it enlivened the whole of my constituency. The two boys who went to try to burgle Tony Martin's farm both came from the crime-ridden estate of Hawtonville, in the north of my constituency. One of them, Brendon Fearon, survives today, despite having sustained gunshot wounds to his left buttock. The other, Fred Barras is, in my view quite wrongly, in his grave.

There is no doubt in my mind that Fred Barras was a criminal and that he should have been deterred. Nor is there any doubt in my mind that his victim could have used a number of methods to stop him burgling his farm. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind, however, that both young men were assaulted in a grossly disproportionate way, and one of them was murdered but should today be alive and—if I can be forgiven the phrase—kicking.

The fact remains that the individual who convinced me of the rectitude of what I tried to do unsuccessfully earlier this year was Mr. Brendon Fearon. He has a long criminal record and he continues to offend. When it became clear to that excellent organ, the Newark Advertiser, that I was going to introduce my Bill, it went to interview Brendon Fearon. It knew quite well that he was certain to be found at the magistrates court, which is exactly where it found him. It put the case to him by saying, "If our Member of Parliament manages to introduce this Bill, what effect would it have on you as a persistent offender?" A number of Labour Members, from a sedentary position, have referred to the fact that if Conservative Members thought that criminals would be deterred, we were living in cloud cuckoo land. Mr. Brendon Fearon said that if the Bill were introduced, it would deter him, and would stop him committing the crimes of which he has been convicted on many occasions.

When I introduced the Bill, it seemed that I had the support of the Prime Minister. I will not bore the House by going through the Prime Minister's precise words, but he changed his tune after a little while. It also seemed that I had—hardly, on mature reflection—the support of the brand spanking new Metropolitan Police Commissioner, Sir Ian Blair. He also changed his tune after a matter of hours.

Janet Anderson: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Sir Ian subsequently retracted the comments that he made on the "Today programme" and gave his support to the Association of Chief Police Officers' position?

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. I do not know whether she heard Sir Ian Blair's words on the radio in January this year, but, unfortunately for him, it was his first day in post, and I have no doubt that he had not had time properly to be briefed on the Government's line. The fact remained, however, that in the early hours of that day, he said, although I paraphrase him, that grossly disproportionate was a reasonable test. Later in the day, he changed that, and the hon. Lady will remember that the Prime Minister had to express his confidence in him on his very first day in post.

Dr. Palmer: When the hon. Gentleman says that it was Sir Ian Blair's first day in post and he did not know the Government's line, is he suggesting that Sir Ian is a sheep who automatically follows the Government's line?

Patrick Mercer: I would not dream of suggesting anything about such an eminent police officer. He seemed to change his tune very quickly, however, between appearing on the "Today" programme, on which his comments were unequivocal, and the ACPO briefing, which followed a few hours afterwards and which I am sure the hon. Gentleman will remember.

With the support of a convicted criminal, a persistent offender, the outgoing Metropolitan Police Commissioner, Sir John Stevens, the incoming Metropolitan Police Commissioner, the apparent support of the Prime Minister and the overwhelming support of the public, I thought I had a compelling case when the Bill came before Parliament earlier this year. Sadly, that proved to be incorrect. Much to my regret, the Bill was hijacked by politicians and turned into a party political issue, and I genuinely regret its proximity to the general election. We were robbed of a useful measure that would deter burglars, help and assist policemen, support householders and, most importantly, shift the balance from householders feeling that the law was against them to burglars and other intruders knowing that the law was against them. At the same time, we might achieve a lessening of the possibility of bloody affray either in shops or houses. I hoped that the Bill's deterrent effect would stop confrontation, lessen the fear of householders and increase the fear of burglars. Clearly, I failed.

Proposed new subsection (1B) states:

"No prosecution shall be brought against a person subject to subsection (1A) without the leave of the Attorney General."

A few moments ago, the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) skirted over my point when I intervened on him—whether that was intentional, or whether he had not had time to look at the Bill, I am not sure. Many of his good points, however, are addressed by that provision. The point is that the arbiter of whether people are taken to court is not some policeman or the Crown Prosecution Service but the Attorney-General, who must decide what is grossly disproportionate as opposed to reasonable or unreasonable.

Dr. Palmer: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman appreciates the importance of including the Attorney-General in the decision-making process, and I look forward to his supporting our Racial and Religious Hatred Bill on similar grounds. I also agree with his earlier point that it is a great pity that this issue has become so politicised. Will he tell us whether his party urged him to introduce his Bill just before the general election?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that we will spend more time on the current Bill than on the previous one.

Patrick Mercer: I take your point, Madam Deputy Speaker, and if I have strayed from the letter of the Bill before us, I am in error, and I apologise.

The hon. Member for Broxtowe, of course, comes from crime-locked Nottinghamshire, as I do, and he makes some very good points. I hope that he knows me well enough now, however, to understand that I will always try to put the good of my constituents before any petty party political advantage. I hope that I have made a reasonably compelling case that this subject is close to my heart. Perhaps the subject did not originate in Newark, but it has a strong bearing on my constituents, not because it is a mainly rural constituency such as the Vale of York, but because it has a combination, as the hon. Member for Broxtowe knows, of inner-city and rural problems, which are exacerbated by the lowness of numbers of the excellent Nottinghamshire constabulary.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): There are more now than under the Conservative Government.

Patrick Mercer: In response to the Minister's comment from a sedentary position, no, there are not.

The importance of the Attorney-General being the arbiter is highlighted by the case of Charlie Mayall.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Gentleman's justification in relation to lack of certainty is that the Attorney-General would be the arbiter of what is grossly disproportionate. If so—and that is the logic, as I understand it—why did he and his colleagues find it so offensive for the Attorney-General to be the arbiter of incitement to religious hatred? In that case, he argued that people would not know how far they could go. Similarly, in this case, a householder would not know how far he or she could go.

Patrick Mercer: The hon. Gentleman tempts me, but I have already been cautioned about straying off the point of this Bill. If he wants to speak to me afterwards, I will be delighted to take that up.

Under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, the Government introduced the phraseology of gross disproportionality—that is Government wording in civil law. All that my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York is trying to do now is to bring criminal law in line with that designed by the Government under civil law.

The Minister has asked who Charlie Mayall is. Charlie Mayall lives in a crime-ridden area of Newark called York drive. He resisted an armed break-in by a number of hoodlums some months ago. When he struck one of them, who then made off, the police arrested him immediately. They believed at the time that they could secure a prosecution against him because he had acted unreasonably.

As a result, Mr. Mayall appeared in court on three occasions, was dragged to and from Newark police station on many different occasions, lost his job, was subjected to all sorts of personal pressures and lost earnings. Only after seven months of that process was he told by the police that the case had collapsed through lack of evidence and that there was no case to answer. How often, in such cases, do the jury and judge eventually say, "This is nonsense, there is no case to answer and you have acted perfectly reasonably"? The fact remains that the individuals involved are treated as criminals. They are put under the most enormous pressure yet are ultimately not found guilty.

Mr. Flello: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that, if this Bill were enacted, police should arrest someone in similar circumstances, or should they not investigate the case, automatically thinking, "It is obviously not grossly disproportionate"?

Patrick Mercer: I have no doubt that the police will make an arrest on those occasions and that they will feel much clearer in their own minds that the arbiter will quickly decide whether the individual should be taken to court. The best scenario is that, as a result of this measure, the likes of Charlie Mayall will not be put through months of pressure and indignity.

Mr. Flello rose—

Patrick Mercer: I will not give way again if the hon. Gentleman does not mind.

The Bill makes a huge amount of sense. I believe that it has the support of criminals, police officers and, most important, the public. I hope that Labour Members will not view this as a party political issue but will try to view it as something that we are going to do for the good of all our constituents. I commend the actions of my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York and the articulate and extremely convincing way in which she presented the Bill today, and I commend those Labour Members who speak from the heart, and who feel the rights and wrongs of this case as passionately as I do. I hope today that we can agree in the House that the Bill should become legislation and that, if it does so, it will be for the good of all concerned.

11.13 am

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on coming so high in the ballot and on introducing the Bill, although I regret to say that I shall not support it today. May I also express my commiserations to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound), who unfortunately is not in his place to hear this debate—he has the high office of Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister with responsibility for police and law and order. This is all his fault in a way. I think that he should be here to listen to the debate.

[Mr. Andrew Dismore]

It all goes back, as has been mentioned, to the "Today" programme listeners' poll at the end of 2003—

Rob Marris: Rigged.

Mr. Dismore: I will mention something about that later. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North was somewhat hoist by his own petard as a result of that. He was rescued by the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), who picked up the issue later. I suspect that "Today" listeners were probably exercising disproportionate force on my hon. Friend, bearing in mind the number of times he appears on the programme, to try to teach him the error of his ways and persuade him that he should be a little less of a media junkie and a little more restrained about some things.

Mr. Khan: What are my hon. Friend's views on Her Majesty's official Opposition having what listeners of a radio programme think as the main platform of their home affairs policy?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. I shall say a little more about the populist approach, or otherwise, of the Opposition a little later.

This is the third Bill that has come before the House on the issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North chickened out, rightly, after the poll came out. It was interesting to hear how he wriggled on the "Today" programme afterwards to get out of the difficulty. He was got out of the hole by the hon. Member for North Thanet, who introduced his own Bill, the Criminal Justice (Justifiable Conduct) Bill, in 2004.

In the last Session of the previous Parliament, that was followed by the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), the Criminal Law (Amendment) (Household Protection) Bill. He is right in saying that that Bill got a Second Reading but that was only because the Opposition decided to exercise their whip on a Friday, which I regard as a real breach of parliamentary practice. It is a private Members' day and should not be subject to party political whipping.

Mr. Khan: As a new boy who has been here only six months, I am slightly confused because we do not have Whips on our side on a Friday. Will my hon. Friend explain what he means by his last comment about Opposition Members being whipped into line the last time such a Bill was before us?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) will not stray too far in replying to that intervention.

Mr. Dismore: Of course. Basically, the convention is that Fridays are a private Members' day. The Whips should keep out of the business and we should, as private Members, progress with the business. Occasionally, rather peculiar results occur as a consequence. If a party whips on a Friday—not individual Members whipping but a party whipping—that is a gross disrespect to the House and private Members.

Dr. Palmer: My hon. Friend will have noticed that the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) did not respond directly to my question about whether he was asked by his party to introduce his Bill. Has my hon. Friend speculated whether the same may be the case with this Bill?

Mr. Dismore: One can but speculate. My hon. Friend is right. We see on a Friday the same Bill coming back time after time. Earlier this Session, we again had a Bill on reform of pensions, for example. A Bill on food labelling has been brought back time after time by different Opposition Members. One wonders sometimes where they get their ideas from—let us put it as neutrally as that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can now get back to discussing the Bill that is before the House.

Mr. Dismore rose—

Mr. Gale: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dismore: Of course.

Mr. Gale: As the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues are so determined to try to turn a cross-party issue into a partisan issue, perhaps he will tell me on behalf of his colleagues which of his parliamentary colleagues he condemns—the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) or the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), neither of whom sits on the Opposition Benches?

Mr. Dismore: I would simply say that on a Friday there is a free vote. Hon. Members are entitled to have their own views. I disagree with the position of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) on this issue, as I have on a number of other private Members' Bills and Government Bills.

One of the consequences of whipping on the previous occasion was that I was not able to make my speech on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Vale of York for giving me the opportunity to explain my views on the issue. I shall be as brief as I can, concomitant with my duty to the House, and to the public, to ensure that the Bill is properly scrutinised on Second Reading. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is not in his place at the moment but I am sure he would expect nothing less of me, bearing in mind his views on the importance of parliamentary scrutiny, particularly of private Members' Bills.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Bill is a popular measure. How many of his constituents has he spoken to about it, and does not he believe that they would want it to pass?

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman is not alone in raising the popular sentiment behind the Bill, which I shall of course deal with a little later in my introductory remarks.

Mr. Khan: Will my hon. Friend comment on the Bill's compatibility with the European convention on human rights? I am, of course, aware that he chairs the Joint Committee on Human Rights.

Mr. Dismore: Of course I shall. I have taken a particular interest in that, and although the Committee has yet to review the Bill, it issued a report on the Bill previously proposed by the hon. Member for Newark and there is very little difference in the human rights implications

Dr. Palmer: In answer to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), may I say that I conducted a survey of my constituents, some 2,100 of whom get e-mails from me on current issues? I asked about their views on the Bill. I was undecided at that stage and asked whether they would be interested in a reformulation of the law. I was really quite surprised that the majority of responses said that that would be mistaken and that they wanted a reaffirmation of the current position.

Mr. Dismore: I am sure that my hon. Friend's constituents are intelligent people who took the opportunity to read the background explanation of the present position that he doubtless offered them. Part of our problem with the current law is that people do not understand where they stand.

What difference is there between today's Bill and that previously proposed by the hon. Member for Newark? The short title is different, and I shall say something about that later. There is a definition of "building" in clause 1(2), the Bill extends, through clause 2, to Northern Ireland, and there is a technical amendment to clause 3(2). There has been no attempt, however, other than in the definition of "building", to address any of the criticisms advanced on the previous Bill on Second Reading or in Committee. I am extremely surprised that that opportunity has not been taken as it means that I shall have to remind the House of some shortcomings, which may make my speech a little longer than it might otherwise have been.

We all recognise the legitimate concern of a householder who has to defend himself or herself and his or her property against intruders. That is clearly a dreadful prospect for anyone to face, particularly when they are isolated or vulnerable or if they live in remote areas where help may not be close at hand. Whatever our differences over the Bill, we all recognise that those concerns are real and should be dealt with seriously and sympathetically. We all have a right to expect that our families should feel safe and secure in their own homes.

Mr. Khan: Bearing in mind the seriousness with which most of us take this Bill, will my hon. Friend confirm that the parliamentary colleagues to whom he has spoken reaffirm and support wholeheartedly the right of householders, shopkeepers and others to defend themselves, their families and their properties with reasonable force?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The issue between us is whether people should be able to defend their property reasonably and within the law or to make a disproportionate response.

Being burgled is a frightening experience, and householders who react instinctively and attack intruders will be prosecuted under the existing law only if they use very excessive force. Only in the most extreme circumstances are householders prosecuted for violence against burglars. The Director of Public Prosecutions made it clear on 12 January that prosecution would be considered only in those extreme circumstances. The law also takes account of the fact that a person under attack or being robbed may be frightened or confused. When they find an intruder at 3 o'clock in the morning, a person cannot be expected to judge to a nicety the level of force that might be required to defend themselves against the threat posed. The law quite simply asks that the person should act instinctively and honestly. We must be clear about that: the law, and every part of the criminal justice system, must, and do, support the right to self-defence.

Janet Anderson Is my hon. Friend aware of the press release issued by the Crown Prosecution Service in January, which makes that plain by saying:

"Indeed we routinely refuse to prosecute those reacting in the heat of the moment to finding intruders within their homes. So householders who have killed burglars in this situation have not been prosecuted. Householders who have shot burglars have not been prosecuted. Householders who have stabbed burglars have not been prosecuted. Householders who have struck burglars on the head, fracturing their skulls, have not been prosecuted"?

One wonders what exactly Conservative Members would like householders to be allowed to do.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that and may refer later to some other points in that CPS memorandum. She is absolutely right: does the hon. Member for Vale of York want householders to have the right to hang, draw and quarter intruders, for example; or a gentleman in his castle to be able to pour boiling oil on them from the battlements? It is difficult to see what else householders should be permitted to do under the law.

We should not underestimate the emotional impact of burglary. In the British crime survey 2004–05, 86 per cent. of respondents were emotionally affected by burglary, and if there was forced entry, too, the figure was 89 per cent. The responses experienced include: anger, at 56 per cent. for all burglaries and 63 per cent. for burglary with entry; annoyance, at 46 per cent. and 51 per cent. for burglary with entry; shock, for 36 per cent. at burglary and 42 per cent. at burglary with entry; and a loss of confidence or feeling of vulnerability, for 27 per cent. and 30 per cent. That illustrates how serious the offence of burglary is, and we need to take it seriously in the House.

That said, I do not think that the Bill is an appropriate response. Much has been made by the Conservative party of the support that it claims the public have for the

[Mr. Dismore]

Bill. That raises the question of what the public actually know about the existing law. The Bill's proponents pray in aid various opinion polls, particularly that on the "Today" programme. Last time we debated this subject, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North—the recipient, to put it neutrally, of the "Today" poll—made it clear that it was not an honest poll. He said that it was not "the honest listeners of Radio 4—as far as I can gather, they were all on the slopes at Chamonix at the time".

The poll, he said, was in fact rigged by "a group of website gun fanatics, headed by an organisation called Cybershooters, who orchestrated a campaign against me."—[Official Report, 4 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1109.]

One must question whether the "Today" programme was the victim of practices that one can compare only with the way in which people vote in "Big Brother", or similar television programmes, such as the dancing one on Saturday nights at present.

It is interesting that the Conservative party is prepared to claim public support for how it has approached the Bill, but when it came to the recent Bill on terrorism, on which 76 per cent. of the public back the police on the 90-day minimum, 72 per cent. supported 90-day detention and 77 per cent. said the police should have the powers that they said they needed, the Conservatives, for purely opportunistic reasons, voted against the wishes of the public. How on earth have they the bottle to come here today claiming the support of the public—with no opinion polls to speak of behind them—given the very clear message from the public on that previous Bill? That smacks, at the very least, of double standards, and I shall not use the unparliamentary term hypocrisy.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend as surprised as I am that we have been asked today to take seriously the views of a convicted criminal, a thief and a burglar, Brendon Fearon, yet on the 90-day terrorism issue we were asked to ignore the views of the police?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Conservative party prays it in aid that the police back the Bill, when in fact the police do not. The police certainly back the position advanced on a maximum detention period of 90 days, yet the Conservative party was not prepared to support them on that.

Mr. Khan: Will my hon. Friend confirm that he will be accurately reporting the views of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis rather than giving an inaccurate summary of what the commissioner said in an interview?

Mr. Dismore: I certainly will refer to the comments of the commissioner, Sir Ian Blair, because I think that he has been misrepresented. During a long interview on the "Today" programme, on one's first day in the job, and given the range of issues relating to policing in London, it is perhaps easy to give an off-the-cuff answer without having had the opportunity properly to consider the response of both the police in London and the Association of Chief Police Officers to the issue in question. To an extent, perhaps Sir Ian was ambushed on his first day in the job.

Dr. Palmer: Does my hon. Friend not feel that, on reflection, he is being a bit harsh on the Opposition? He claims that Opposition Members are aggressively pushing the Bill, but there are no Opposition Back Benchers in the Chamber.

Mr. Gale: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) makes an important point. I am pleased that the hon. Member for North Thanet is in the Chamber. I have much respect for him. I know that he takes an interest in this matter, given his private Member's Bill. It is interesting that the only two Opposition Members in the Chamber, apart from the Opposition Whip, are those who have promoted Bills on this issue. No other Opposition Back Benchers are present. The only Liberal Democrat Member in the Chamber is the one on the Lib-Dem Front Bench, the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson). Yet there are quite a number of Labour Back Benchers in their places, who are ready to give their views on the Bill.

Janet Anderson: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), the promoter of the Bill, has not even bothered to stay in her place to listen to the debate?

Mr. Dismore: I think that it is disgraceful that the hon. Lady is not present to listen to the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can now conduct the debate on the Bill rather than commenting on who is or is not present in the Chamber.

Mr. Dismore: Earlier on, Opposition Members were talking about the incidence of burglary. We must examine the true facts and figures. Burglary peaked in the mid-1990s. According to the British crime survey, domestic burglary from 1995 to 2004–05 reduced by 57 per cent. In 2003–04 to 2004–05, British crime survey and police statistics showed that domestic burglary was down by 20 per cent., and that non-domestic burglary was down by 14 per cent.

The risk of being a victim of burglary has halved since 1995. On average, the chance of a burglary on a particular property is at its lowest for 20 years. On average, a property is likely to be burgled once every 50 years. In my constituency, in July, there were 45 fewer residential burglaries than in the previous year, and there were 48 per cent. more detections. That picks up the point made earlier about detection rates.

We need to challenge some of the perceptions about the likely victims of burglary. We have heard a great deal about rural people and so forth. The people most likely to be victims of burglary are those aged between 16 and 24. Those least likely to be victims are pensioners. The people most likely to be burgled are those with household incomes of below £5,000. Those least likely have incomes of more than £30,000. The most likely victims are those in private rented property, closely followed by social renters. The least likely are owner-occupiers. The most likely are those who are unemployed or economically inactive. The most likely are those who live in flats and not detached houses. The most likely are those who live in urban areas, who are twice as likely to be a victim as those who live in rural areas, particularly people living on council estates. It is probably self-evident that those with high levels of home security are the least likely to be burgled as opposed to those who have no measures of home security. That starts to correct some of the perceptions.

We need to consider also the number of offences in which violence was used in a burglary. In all burglaries, that was about 9 per cent. The prospect of being a victim of violence when a burglary is committed is very low. To an extent, Opposition Members have run a scare story to try to pretend that we are living in a crime-ridden country. In fact, the incidence of burglary is low, and the chance of being a victim of violence during a burglary is extremely low.

Mr. Ian Austin: One of my concerns about the Bill is that burglars, far from being deterred from breaking into people's houses, may arrive at the view that home owners are more likely to be arming themselves with guns and all the rest of it to defend themselves should they be burgled, and that they should arm themselves too. So if the Bill were to come into force, we may end up with an arms race and with more people being shot by burglars.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend has amazing perception. He has raised the series of points that I intended to make.

Mr. Khan: I appreciate how my hon. Friend is allowing those of us who are concerned about the victims of crime to intervene on him.

Does my hon. Friend not think it bizarre and irrational that the Opposition appear willing to give the victims of crime in the home greater rights than the victims of crime in the streets? For example, is it not illogical and irrational that the victim of a rape in a park will be allowed to use only reasonable force to defend herself whereas the victim of a burglary in a house would be able to use grossly disproportionate force?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I hope to address that issue at greater length when I come to analyse the Bill. To go into more detail, rape can be part of a burglary. A woman who is raped in her own home can use excessive force whereas a woman who is raped in a park cannot do so. That cannot be a sensible way forward.

To deal with the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin), I think that the Bill defeats its own object. Presumably the object is to make householders feel safer in their own homes and to deter burglaries. I think that the hon. Member for Newark said that the purpose of the Bill was to erode the confidence of burglars. I am concerned that the Bill will encourage people to have a go rather than to call the police. Unfortunately, bearing in mind the profile of burglars, these offenders tend to be younger men. We know that from the crime survey. I have gone through the profile of people who are likely to be the victims of burglary, and I think that the householder is the person who is most likely to come off worst if there is such a confrontation. We have heard examples of that.

The best advice that a householder can be given is to call the police rather than to get stuck in with a burglar. I am concerned that, as a result of the Bill, householders, instead of just losing their jewellery and television, which is serious enough, will end up losing their lives. People will be encouraged to try to defend themselves, but they are likely to come off worst, especially if they are half asleep. Of course, the burglar will be wide awake and will have his senses fully about him.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Gentleman is going down a ludicrous route. Is he seriously suggesting that a burglar will stand by while someone reaches for his telephone to call the police? Has he ever had his home burgled? Has he ever had his home violated? Does he begin to understand the offence that he is causing this morning?

Mr. Dismore: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman thinks that I am causing offence. I disagree with him on the issue, but for perfectly logical reasons. He has a view of the Bill and I have a very different view. The hon. Gentleman's Bill would introduce the Oklahoma law, which would allow a householder to use whatever force he wanted to use against the burglar. There would be no arguments about disproportionate force or any other force. I shall talk about the Oklahoma law and its consequences shortly.

The best advice should be always to phone the police. Best advice also is, generally speaking, not to mix it with the burglar if that can possibly be avoided.

Janet Anderson: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) might be suggesting that people should not try to phone the police in these circumstances?

Mr. Dismore: I think that that can be the only inference, given what the hon. Gentleman is saying.

Mr. Khan: I am concerned by the contributions of Opposition Members. Given the choice of having a panic button installed in one's home with a burglar alarm or purchasing a gun with a 10-year licence and having a safe in which to keep it, which option would my hon. Friend advise his constituents to take?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the need for hardening or protecting one's home against intruders. I shall refer to that later.

My hon. Friend is right. Presumably someone who has a firearm will keep it under lock and key, as is required by firearms legislation. Is the hon. Member for North Thanet suggesting that someone should go down the stairs in his home, unlock the case, get the gun out and load it while the burglar stands by waiting to be shot, or is he suggesting that the firearm should be kept under the pillow in complete breach of firearms legislation?

Mr. Gale: We know that the hon. Gentleman is here to filibuster and likely to speak for a long time, so the idea of not intervening is nonsense. For the record, he knows perfectly well that no Conservative Member has mentioned firearms at all.

Mr. Dismore: I am not sure that that is right. We will have to check Hansard, because I think that firearms have come up several times. I take great exception to the suggestion that I am filibustering. As the hon. Gentleman would expect, I have a lot to say about the Bill, but if I was filibustering, it would be in breach of the rules and you, Madam Deputy Speaker, would call me to order.

Mr. Ian Austin: My hon. Friend was asked whether he had been burgled. I can tell the House that I have been burgled three times and I well understand the shock and fury caused when one's home is invaded and one's private property is gone through. I, too, take great exception to being described, as we were earlier, as the burglar's friend. I do not recall referring to the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) as the terrorist's friend during the terrorism debate. Should he not withdraw the offensive remark that he made earlier?

Mr. Dismore: I do not think that I can add to my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Gale: The record will show that what I actually said was that it was as ludicrous to describe this Bill as partisan as it would be to describe every Labour Member as the burglar's friend—precisely the reverse of what the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin) suggested.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest that the "Erskine May" maxim of good temper and moderation in parliamentary language be used for the remainder of the debate?

Mr. Dismore: That is my intention and I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Thanet for clarifying his position. I am sure that he is correct.

Mr. Flello: We were discussing the possibility of someone removing a firearm from a locked case and using it. Is my hon. Friend aware of the case in which armed robbers threatened a pub landlord and barmaid with extreme violence and the barmaid escaped, fetched her employer's shotgun and shot one of the intruders? She was not prosecuted under the current law.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a good point. That case is more exceptional in that the barmaid was able to get the gun than in the fact that she was not prosecuted.

The other way in which the Bill defeats its own object is that it encourages the setting of traps where people lie in wait for a burglar. Perhaps that is what the hon. Member for North Thanet has in mind in talking about how burglars should be confronted. There have been cases where people have been repeatedly burgled and it is a problem, but the answer is not the Bill and certainly not to set traps.

I want to return to the risk of the escalation of violence if the burglar thinks that the householder is likely to have a firearm, knife, sword or other such weapon. In the last debate on this, there was a discussion of the merits of cricket bats and baseball equipment and I was pleased to note that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North equipped himself with a cricket bat in good British tradition. The fact remains that, if householders are likely to have weapons of defence—there is nothing in the Bill to prevent it—burglars are more likely to be tooled up too and there will be an escalation of violence, or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North put it, an arms race between the burglar and the householder.

The other risk is that burglars may go for softer targets. They may think it too risky to choose households where people are armed with swords or knives. They will be less likely to confront the firearm-owning toff but more likely to invade the home of the old lady living alone. The Bill would have a disproportionate effect: the lord in his castle armed with his shotgun would mean that the burglar would be more likely to carry firearms, while the old lady in the Burnt Oak estate in my constituency would be at more risk of being severely beaten by an intruder. She would not be in a position to defend herself, not because of the law, under this Bill or the previous one, but because she is frail and the burglar has switched his modus operandi because he is frightened of attacking wealthier homes, which, as the figures I gave earlier show, are less likely targets anyway.

Mr. Flello: Does my hon. Friend accept that many burglars commit burglaries to fuel a drug habit? If a burglar is high on an illegal substance, the last thing they will do is sit down and analyse whether there is a deterrent, be it a baseball bat or whatever. They will commit the crime to fuel the drug habit. The Opposition's argument that the measure will be a deterrent is nonsense.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes the point clearly. If someone is under the influence of drugs or alcohol, the mental faculties and the ability to discriminate between right and wrong are inevitably impaired. We all know the phrase "Dutch courage". In those circumstances, the deterrent effect of the Bill would inevitably be significantly reduced.

The Bill sits uneasily with the existing offence of aggravated burglary under section 10 of the Theft Act 1968. A person is guilty of aggravated burglary if he commits a burglary and at the time has with him any firearm or imitation firearm, any weapon of offence or any explosive. "Firearm" in those circumstances includes an airgun, air pistol or imitation firearm. "Weapon of offence" means any article made or adapted for use for causing injury to or incapacitating a person. If a burglar commits an offence while tooled up for violence, he is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life. The reason given by the criminal law revision committee for the creation of this offence is that burglary when in possession of the articles mentioned is so serious that it should be punishable with imprisonment for life.

The Bill would lead to more offences under section 10 of the Theft Act because more burglars will go around more heavily armed. There will be a significant ramping up of the risk to householders from burglary.

Mr. Khan: Will my hon. Friend comment on the practice of Wandsworth police, particularly in Tooting, who spend much time advising residents about locks on their windows and installing panic buttons and explaining to the elderly how to prevent burglary? That has led to crime figures, especially burglary, going down. Surely that is the advice we should give local residents, rather than telling them how to defend themselves with cricket or baseball bats.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. It is more important that people get adequate crime prevention advice. Protecting one's property against burglary is one of the best ways of defeating it.

For another reason why the Bill defeats its own object one simply has to look at the Bill's long title. It is called the Criminal Law (Amendment) (Protection of Property) Bill. It is not the Protection of Householders Bill, as I think the previous Bill was entitled, or the Protection of Victims Bill. That gives it away. The Bill is about property, not about people, which is one of its most serious weaknesses. The Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Newark was specifically aimed at trying to help the domestic householder, whereas this Bill is aimed at protecting property.

Mr. Ian Austin: On the question of property, will my hon. Friend give me his assessment of the position? As I understand it, one would be covered by the Bill if someone broke into one's house to steal a television, but if someone was trying to steal a car parked outside the house, one would not be covered. It seems to me that there are also grey areas in the Bill's definition of property.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right that the Bill is riddled with anomalies. If it has the fortune—or, rather, the misfortune—to pass its Second Reading today, those anomalies would have to be explored in great detail in Committee. If the Bill were passed in its present terms, it would create significant anomalies in the law and leave victims or those who face crime in the impossible position of not knowing where they stood. I hope to say a little more about that later when I debate the detail.

Dr. Palmer: I apologise for having had to leave the Chamber temporarily. I want to check a point with my hon. Friend about the definition of "building" in the Bill. If one family were in a caravan and another in a tent on a campsite, the family in the caravan would be allowed to use the unreasonable force provision, but the family in the tent would not, because buildings cover caravans and not tents. Is that not another anomaly?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and he presages some of the remarks that I shall make later in my speech.

The problem of the Bill being a protection of property measure also sits uneasily with the existing offence, which has developed over the years, of burglary in respect of a dwelling—it is set out fully in the eighth edition of the seminal work "The Law of Theft" by Professor Sir John Smith—for which a much more serious penalty is imposed.

Mr. Ian Austin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. On my understanding of the Bill, if one were out shopping and someone tried to steal something while one was in a covered shopping mall, using greater force would be justified because it is a building, but it would not be justified if one were in the high street. People would be covered in an indoor market, but not in an outside market—yet another anomaly on which I would be grateful if my hon. Friend would comment.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is no doubt that a shopping mall or department store, such as those in Oxford street, or at Brent Cross in my constituency, counts as buildings. Someone walking in the concourse area, even if not actually in a shop, would be covered by the provisions, but if they were in an outdoor market in my constituency, they would not. I believe that that is an anomaly.

Mr. Khan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so generously. He has already explained that the powers are not limited to houses or homes, but to any building. Does he agree that the person who uses force does not have to be the owner or even a legitimate resident and that the person using unreasonable force could himself be a trespasser?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right about that and I intend to expand on the point in a few moments.

I was making a point about burglary in respect of a dwelling. The law already recognises a distinction whereby burglary from a dwelling is a more serious offence. Those who commit such offences are subject to much more serious penalties under the law. It is regrettable that the original formulation proposed by the hon. Member for Newark has not been maintained in the present Bill, which attempts to stretch it way beyond what was initially intended—perhaps beyond what was intended by the people who voted in the listeners' poll on the "Today" programme. That is a problem not helped by the additional anomalies in the Bill.

Reference was made earlier to the Oklahoma law, which it is important to look further into, particularly in respect of what happened as a consequence of that law. It provides an object lesson in what might happen here if the Bill were to find favour with the House.

Mr. Flello: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing so many interventions, which is welcome on the Government Benches. Before he moves on to discuss the Oklahoma law, will he say whether he believes that the Bill could provide an incentive to in-store security guards to be much more aggressive in stopping potential thieves before they leave the premises? It could lead to a disproportionate, but obviously not a grossly disproportionate, response by security guards in apprehending offenders before they pass through the door of the shops and go into the street outside.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an entirely correct and very good point. Currently, if a shoplifter tries to leave the premises—technically, they are committing a burglary under theft legislation—the security guard can use reasonable force to detain them. In other words, if the shoplifter is trying to escape, the guard can grab hold of them and detain them, pending the arrival of the police. Under this Bill, if the shoplifter tried to escape there would be nothing to prevent them from being beaten half unconscious, simply because they had tried to walk out with stolen goods. Of course, the problem is even greater for people who leave the shop by mistake, having picked up an item and forgotten to pay for it. Such people may appear to be shoplifters, but in fact they have made a genuine mistake. By the time the mistake comes to light, however, they could be lying on the floor in a pool of blood.

Mr. Flello: So one could almost say that this Bill is a licence for the beating of grannies who have accidentally put something in their pocket.

Mr. Dismore: Elderly and confused people in the early stages of Alzheimer's sometimes making such mistakes is a well-known phenomenon. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: they could face physical violence from security guards who may go a little over the top, knowing that, under this Bill, they would not be prosecuted.

Mr. Khan rose—

Mr. Dismore: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan).

Mr. Khan: The delay in my rising is the consequence of my just having come to terms with the implications of this draconian and absurd Bill. Will my hon. Friend confirm that in discussing the Oklahoma law, he will talk about the number of people who have been shot dead as a result of it? Will he further confirm that it is referred to locally as the "Make my day" law?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right: the Oklahoma law has nothing to do with the musical of the same name; it has been named after Mr. Clint Eastwood's famous line—"Make my day, punk"—from the motion picture "Dirty Harry". Under the "Make my day" law, in effect, anyone who dares to enter someone else's property can be shot dead; any force is permitted. It goes further than the Bill before us today, but in the direction that the hon. Member for North Thanet wanted to go with his Bill, had it made progress.

Although we are not debating the Oklahoma Bill today, we can draw some conclusions from its effect on crime rates, particularly those for burglary, and decide whether it achieve its claimed objective. Given that it contains even tougher measures than those in the Bill before us, if it did not work in Oklahoma, one can only assume that this Bill would make no difference whatsoever to the incidence of burglary. Between the Oklahoma law's introduction in 1987 and 2000, there was a 48.5 per cent. fall in burglaries. Very good, but that is almost exactly the same as the decline in burglary in the United States as a whole, where the law was not nationwide. So in fact, the law made practically no difference whatsoever to that decline. Even more interestingly, under existing provisions allowing homeowners to defend themselves, UK burglary figures have fallen even further, over a shorter period, than those for Oklahoma or for the US in general.

Mr. Ian Austin: Will my hon. Friend reflect on the appalling situation whereby home owners in the US are being attacked and shot with their own weapons? In some instances, the burglar has broken in and the home owner has produced their gun, only for the burglar to grab it and shoot the home owner. I should also correct my hon. Friend's earlier point: I believe that Clint Eastwood actually said, "Go ahead, punk, make my day."

Mr. Dismore: In fact, I think that the film was "Sudden Impact", rather than "Dirty Harry". However, we have the right actor, even if I named the wrong movie and got the quote wrong; the Oklahoma law is certainly known as the "Make my day" law. Perhaps we can move out of the movie theatre, so that I can draw my introductory remarks to a close and turn to the Bill's detail.

The Bill in effect changes the law of self-defence in relation to burglary. The current law of self-defence is set out in section 3(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967:

"A person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime, or in effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of offenders or suspected offenders or of persons unlawfully at large."

That is a very general definition. For a little more detail, one must go to the bible of criminal law, "Archbold"s Criminal Pleadings, Evidence and Practice". I consulted the 2005 edition, which states that the provisions of section 3

"cover the great majority of cases of self-defence and defence of others, and many cases of defence of property"— which is what we are talking about—

"for in these cases the person who uses lawful force will be doing so for the purpose of preventing crime."

"Archbold" notes that section 3 reflects the common law.

The common law was well set out by the eminent Law Lord, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, in the Privy Council case of Palmer v. the Crown in 1971. Lord Morris said that "the defence of self-defence is one which can be and will be readily understood by any jury. It is a straightforward conception. It involves no abstruse legal thought . . . Only common sense is needed for its understanding. It is both good law and good sense that a man who is attacked may defend himself. It is both good law and good sense that he may only do, but may only do, what is reasonably necessary. But everything will depend upon the particular facts and circumstances. Of these a jury can decide".

Mr. Khan: I am glad that my hon. Friend mentioned the common law defence. He will be aware that "Archbold" also suggests that section 3 would not cover all cases of defence of the person, noting that if a person was attacked by someone who was insane, so as not to be responsible in law for his acts, the common law defence would apply and kick in. Is not one of the problems with the Bill, introduced by Her Majesty's official Opposition, that there would be a difference between the statutory defence and the common law defence? If the Bill was passed, there would be a differential law that was less generous to an insane person than statutory law.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a good point and I can add nothing to it. I was not planning to raise that issue so I am grateful to him for doing so.

Lord Morris went on to say:

"If there is some relatively minor attack it would not be common sense to permit some action of retaliation which was wholly out of proportion to the necessities of the situation."

That is what the Bill would create: a situation in which a relatively minor attack could be met by something completely out of proportion. Lord Morris continued:

"If the attack is all over and no sort of peril remains then the employment of force may be by way of revenge or punishment or by way of paying off an old score . . . There may no longer be any link with a necessity of defence."

That position is not covered by the Bill, but many people may think that it was and they could be criminalised. Under the present law, they may hold back.

Dr. Palmer: Does not that illustrate the point I made earlier? Although we have to accept that members of the public feel that the current law has grey areas, the Bill would only move us to a new grey area, with new dangers and a different set of circumstances under which people could be prosecuted. We could make the situation worse.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. There would still be a grey area because we would still be arguing about what was or was not excessive force, but there would be a further grey area, perhaps tinged with red blood, in that the issues with which we would be dealing would be the consequences of much greater violence.

Lord Morris also said:

"If there has been an attack so that defence is reasonably necessary, it will be recognised that a person defending himself cannot weigh to a nicety the exact measure of his defensive action. If the jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought necessary, that would be the most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken."

In other words, the current law is rooted in common sense. My concern is that what we are being asked to agree to goes way beyond that. It is not common sense. It would make things far worse.

Janet Anderson: Conservative Members have made great play of the fact that the Bill would act as a deterrent, yet the only evidence they have been able to produce was given by one convicted burglar.

Mr. Khan: Who was shot in the buttocks.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson) makes the point clearly and my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting also makes the point that the burglar in question was not exactly an objective observer of the situation, as he was a victim, having been shot in the buttocks. His view of what may or may not be appropriate could be rather different from that of a burglar who has yet to experience a response from a householder.

Mr. Khan: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend has moved off Palmer, but my intervention is about the Palmer point. My hon. Friend quotes Lord Morris and refers implicitly to the subjective and objective test. Does he agree that the test of whether force used in self-defence is reasonable is largely objective? However, the last sentence of the quote from Lord Morris emphasises that there are subjective elements that would depend on a defendant's specific circumstances. That means that the safeguards that we all want are in the law at present, so the Bill is clearly redundant.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. He is right that when we consider self-defence, we have a mixed objective and subjective test. There is a slightly different test in the civil law, and I hope to refer to that shortly because the simple alignment of civil and criminal law is prayed in aid by those who support the Bill. However, the measure set out in the Bill is an objective test, so we are all over the place. Are we considering the mind of the person who commits an attack on the alleged criminal, the general reasonableness test, or a mixture of the two? The whole position will be very different depending on the circumstances in which an attack takes place.

Mr. Khan: Does my hon. Friend agree that if those who support the Bill are serious about getting it on to the statute book, it is disappointing that such matters have not been clarified since the last time that the House considered such a measure?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. A series of criticisms were made on Second Reading of the previous version of the Bill that was promoted by the hon. Member for Newark. I am surprised that the opportunity was not taken in the intervening period to get some of the tackle in order and produce a Bill that at least addressed some of those problems, which might have found more favour in the House today.

Mr. Flello: Does my hon. Friend agree that the existing legislation works and is sound, but is not widely understood by the public? I am sad that the promoter of the Bill, the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), is not in the Chamber and is thus unable to hear what are hopefully my pearls of wisdom. Does my hon. Friend thus agree that Opposition Members would have done better to direct their energies at making the public more aware of the existing legislation and how it can be used to protect the householder and property owner?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. The Bill has effectively suggested to people that they have a weaker right to defend themselves than they actually do. It is confusing the position to such an extent that people do not know where they stand. If Opposition Members had been acting responsibly, they would have given out copies of the CPS leaflet in their constituencies. I distributed a large number of those leaflets so that people would know where they stood if they faced such a situation. It would have been rather more constructive if Opposition Members had explained what the policies of the CPS were and what the law was, instead of trying to frighten people into thinking on the one hand that they cannot defend themselves, and on the other that the country is rife with burglary.

Janet Anderson: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is yet another example of Her Majesty's official Opposition ignoring the advice of the police? We know that the Association of Chief Police Officers does not think that the Bill is necessary, so Opposition Members are behaving in the same way in which they did when they ignored the advice of the police about the Terrorism Bill and refused to support the Government.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I made that point a little earlier, but perhaps she was not in the Chamber at that stage. The Opposition have operated somrthing of a double standard—I put that neutrally, bearing in mind Madam Deputy Speaker's earlier constraints on the use of emotive language in the debate.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend explained the sensible and mature way in which he behaved as an MP by ensuring that his constituents were aware of the CPS guidance. Is he talking about the joint public statement of the CPS and ACPO that was issued earlier this year? He has not yet referred to guidance in his speech, so as I prepare for my speech, will he confirm whether he will do so?

Mr. Dismore: I hope to deal with that shortly, because it is important that we understand where the law stands.

I was talking about the black letter law expounded by Lord Morris, who was explaining the common law in the case of Palmer. Basically, it is a common sense test, and who can object to that? Many other myths have developed. In paragraph 19.42 in the section on offences against the person in "Archbold", the old rule that a man who is attacked must retreat as far as he can has disappeared. Whether the accused retreated is only one factor for the jury to consider when determining whether force was reasonably necessary. Moreover, the same paragraph states that there is no rule of law that a man must wait until he is struck before striking in self-defence. If another person strikes at him he is entitled to make his blow first if it is reasonably necessary to do so in self-defence. The existing law therefore goes further than most people think.

Moreover, if the defence of self-defence is offered, the burden of disproving it is on the prosecution, not on the defendant facing trial. "Archbold" says that where such a defence is offered, the burden of negativing it rests on the prosecution. If, on consideration of all the evidence, the jury is convinced of the innocence of the prisoner—"Archbold" uses old terminology because it is citing an old case—or is left in doubt as to whether he was acting in necessary self-defence it should acquit. In the Crown v. Abraham the Court of Appeal said that a judge should deal with the issue by telling the jury that someone who acts reasonably in self-defence commits no unlawful act. Just as it is for the Crown to show that the plea of not guilty is not acceptable, so the Crown must convince the jury beyond reasonable doubt that self-defence has no basis in the present case. There are therefore many safeguards in the existing law.

We must also look at the charging standard text used by the CPS, which was published on 26 November 2004 and tells CPS staff how they should approach such cases. Prosecutors must consider all assaults in the context in which they were allegedly committed. Particular care must be taken in dealing with cases of assault where the allegation is made by a "victim" who, at the time, was engaged in criminal activity himself. An example relevant to today's debate is a burglar who claims to have been assaulted by the occupier of the premises concerned. Prosecutors are reminded that it is lawful to use reasonable force in the following circumstances—self-defence; to defend another person; to defend property; to prevent crime; and to lawfully arrest someone. Where the use of force in such circumstances is reasonable the assailant—the person about whom we are concerned—has an absolute defence, and charges relating to the assault should not be brought. Paragraph 5 of the CPS charging standard text therefore sets out the position in black and white.

The advice to prosecutors continues:

"In assessing the reasonableness of the force two questions should be asked: was the force used justified in all the circumstances? . . . and was the first force used excessive"?

The courts have shown that both questions are to be answered on the basis of the facts, as the accused—the householder—honestly believed them to be. To return to my exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, the test is a subjective one. The issue of whether a reasonable person would regard the force used as reasonable or excessive is the subsequent question, not the primary question.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend gave figures for the decreasing number of burglaries in the past 20 years. Last year, there were 943,000 burglaries, which is the lowest figure for 20 years. There have been approximately 10 million burglaries in the past 15 years, but there have been only seven cases in which a householder has been prosecuted for defending himself against an intruder. Does that not confirm that the CPS is applying the guidance that he cited correctly?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is basically right, and I hope that we can analyse some cases in more detail later. Many of the cases that have been prayed in aid by the Opposition predate the guidance in the CPS charging standard text, which was published in November 2004. They certainly predate the joint statement by the CPS and ACPO, which was first published in January 2005 and subsequently produced as a leaflet.

I am not aware, and I will happily give way to any hon. Member in the Chamber from any quarter who has information to the contrary, of a single case that has been prosecuted against a householder defending himself since those new guidelines and the joint statement were published.

Janet Anderson: I am sure my hon. Friend is aware that the leaflet to which he referred, the joint statement from the CPS and ACPO, makes it clear that householders do not have to wait to be attacked before they can take action. It states:

"... if you are in your own home and in fear for yourself or others. In those circumstances the law does not require you to wait to be attacked before using defensive force yourself."

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. The statement was welcome, as it clarified the law. As I said, I was able to obtain a number of copies—several thousand—which I distributed door to door, to people who had raised crime issues with me in my constituency. Letting people know where they stood was a far more constructive way to approach the debate than the Opposition's attempt to change the law.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend may wish to point out, for the record, that it is clear from the Library research paper and from other research that I have done that there are no current cases where a householder is being prosecuted.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. That is exactly the case. The guidance from the Crown Prosecution Service and the statement from ACPO and the CPS have made the position much clearer and people now know where they stand.

Mr. Flello: I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) has just left his place. I had hoped to get the intervention in while he was still in the Chamber. I would be interested to hear my hon. Friend's comments on my previous intervention on the hon. Member for Newark, when I referred to the case that was cited. The individual in question was arrested and would still be arrested under the proposal in the Bill. The second intervention, which I sadly was not permitted, was intended to highlight the fact that the CPS guidance to which my hon. Friend refers would address that issue and would not allow that to happen under the current law dealing with reasonable force.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes the point clearly. It would be helpful to the House if we looked at what the ACPO and CPS statement says. It accepts at the beginning:

"It is a rare and frightening prospect to be confronted by an intruder in your own home."

By issuing the statement, the two bodies are responding to public concern about householders defending themselves. It goes on to state quite clearly:

"Anyone can use reasonable force to protect themselves or others ... You are not expected to make fine judgements over the level of force you use in the heat of the moment. So long as you only do what you honestly and instinctively believe is necessary in the heat of the moment, that would be the strongest evidence of you acting lawfully and in self-defence. This is still the case if you use something to hand as a weapon.

As a general rule, the more extreme the circumstances and the fear felt, the more force you can lawfully use in self-defence."

It goes on to say, as we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen, that "the law does not require you to wait to be attacked before using defensive force yourself."

Dr. Palmer: One point that has not been explored in detail yet is that the Bill states that even grossly disproportionate force can be used if the person using that force was not aware that it was grossly disproportionate. Does that not open an enormous grey area, which is not present in the current law? In the current law there is the test of reasonableness that juries interpret in a reasonable way. Under the Bill, if I can persuade the jury that I was not aware that it was grossly disproportionate to stab somebody who had just walked on to my garden, I would be required to be acquitted. Is that not a very large grey area?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point which is to do with what the law calls mens rea. To be honest and fair to the promoter of the Bill, I am not entirely sure that my hon. Friend has construed the Bill accurately in that respect, but I hope to come to the issue in due course.

Before that intervention, I was referring to the joint statement by the CPS and ACPO, which deals with what happens if an intruder dies. It makes it clear that if a householder acts in reasonable self-defence and an intruder dies, then the householder will still have acted lawfully. However, it goes on to caution that if, having knocked someone unconscious, a householder decides to hurt or kill an intruder in order to punish them, or if a householder knows about an intended intruder and sets a trap to hurt or kill them, that householder would be acting with excessive and gratuitous force. In such cases, the householder would be prosecuted under the existing law. Even if the Bill were passed, a householder in those circumstances would still be prosecuted. Where is the additional advantage to the public from that change?

One of the concerns that has been expressed today is about what happens if the police turn up and believe the intruder rather than the householder. The statement makes it clear that "The police weight all the facts when investigating an incident. This includes the fact that the intruder caused the situation to arise in the first place."

However, it also makes the fair point that investigations are necessary, because

"On occasions people pretend a burglary has taken place to cover up other crimes such as a fight between drug dealers."

Importantly, the police and the CPS have said that they are determined that when cases are investigated,

"they must be investigated and reviewed as swiftly and as sympathetically as possible ... An experienced investigator will oversee the case ... and the case will be prioritised to ensure ... a quick decision."

The statement concludes:

"It is a fact that very few householders have ever been prosecuted for actions resulting from the use of force against intruders."

On the day before that statement was issued, the Director of Public Prosecutions, Mr. Ken Macdonald QC, who is in a sense the chief prosecutor in the country, made his position clear:

"The law is on the side of householders ... It is only in the most extreme circumstances that householders are prosecuted for violence against burglars ... the law understands that when people are under attack in their own homes they cannot judge precisely the level of their response ... So long as they do no more than they honestly and instinctively feel is necessary in the heat of the moment, that will be the strongest evidence that the householder has acted lawfully. Indeed we routinely refuse to prosecute those reacting in the heat of the moment ... So householders who have killed burglars ... have not been prosecuted. Householders who have shot burglars have not been prosecuted. Householders who have stabbed burglars have not been prosecuted. Householders who have struck burglars on the head, fracturing their skulls, have not been not prosecuted."

Mr. Macdonald goes on to say that the CPS has been able to find only a handful cases in which prosecutions have resulted from domestic household burglaries.

Mr. Flello: Is my hon. Friend surprised to hear that in informal conversations with serving police officers at a level far junior to that which he has just quoted, those officers all expressed the view that cases in which a householder takes reasonable steps in confronting a burglar never even reach the point at which charges are laid, unless the householder in question brags that they were lying in wait? Police officers use their common sense when they see that people have behaved reasonably.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. That is the common sense required by the Crown v. Palmer and the dictum of Lord Morris, when he set out the law more than 30 years ago. The present position was best summed up by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), who replied to the debate on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark:

"There are three levels to the provision: first, we have the law," which I have described as the black letter law,

"which the Government believe is perfectly adequate"— most Labour Members share that view—

"to allow householders to take whatever steps are necessary to defend themselves and their families . . . secondly, the leaflet explains that law in simple, straightforward terms to the general public . . . thirdly, we have the guidance against which the police and the CPS weigh each case."—[Official Report, 4 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1132.]

That belt and braces approach has borne fruit, which is why we have seen no prosecutions whatsoever since those changes were introduced more than a year ago.

Mr. Khan: There is another safeguard in the event that a case slips through the net and is prosecuted—the common sense of the jury who will consider all the circumstances. My hon. Friend will be aware from his experience in a previous life that juries are very sensible. I am sure that the jury would acquit in a case where a householder had used force that was reasonable.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. Juries have common sense. Most of the few cases that did reach trial resulted in the acquittal of those involved, and I believe that those that did not reach trial would have resulted in convictions under the proposed law.

Why change the law? There is no support to speak of from those involved professionally, who actually have to deal with the problem—although I know that the Conservatives like to ignore professional advice, as we saw in relation to terrorism. My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) mentioned police on the beat, and we could cite more senior police.

Perhaps however we should start with the example of an extremely eminent QC who is a Member of this House—the Leader of the Opposition, for a few more days. When he was Home Secretary, he said:

"Specifically on the law on self-defence, I am satisfied that the individual should always be able to defend himself, his family and his property, as long as he only uses force that is both reasonable and necessary. I am not currently persuaded that there is a need to change the law."—[Official Report, 14 December 1993; Vol. 234, c. 533W.]

Mr. Khan: Until now I have been with my hon. Friend, but my basic rule has always been that if the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) believes that something is right, I believe that it is wrong.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. We must wait and see what attitude is taken by the forthcoming Leader of the Opposition. The candidate in question may well believe in consensus politics and working together, and will decide that the existing law is satisfactory. That might assuage my hon. Friend's concerns.

Dan Norris (Wansdyke) (Lab): It is not for me to defend the Leader of the Opposition, but several of his colleagues are here to put the case for the Bill, whereas only one Liberal Democrat Member has been present all morning.

Mr. Dismore: That has been remarked upon before.

The hon. Member for North Thanet challenged me to say why I do not agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead and my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall about the Bill. Perhaps I could ask him why he does not agree with the Leader of the Opposition, who made his position absolutely clear.

Mr. Gale: My right hon. and learned Friend expressed a point of view in 1993, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, but changed his view in the light of subsequent experience. That is why he and the Conservative party supported the Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Newark.

Mr. Dismore: I am pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman confirm a U-turn on the part of the Conservative party, although it may have been in the wrong direction, as was reflected in the local elections earlier in the year. Perhaps that provides my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting with the reassurance that he no longer runs the risk of finding himself in the same Division Lobby as the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe.

Mr. Khan: That allays the minor concern that I had, and I can now confidently, positively and happily support my hon. Friend's stance.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for clarifying his position.

The position of the Association of Chief Police Officers has not changed since the hon. Member for Newark introduced his Bill. When the leaflet that I mentioned was launched, Chris Fox, the then ACPO chair, said:

"We want everyone to clearly understand that they can use force to protect themselves or others. The force used should be reasonable force."

Sir Ian Blair, the Metropolitan police commissioner, gave his support to the ACPO position after the problems that he had had on the "Today" programme on his first day. The Metropolitan police have since indicated that that remains their position. We already know that the Director of Public Prosecutions is of the same view.

Mr. Anthony Scrivener QC, who was Tony Martin's barrister, has said on several occasions that he believes that the law is right. On 14 December 2004r, he said in the Eastern Daily Press:

"The law is simple and weighted overwhelmingly in favour of the householder."

On 15 December 2004, The Times quoted him as saying:

"Even if the suggested test of grossly disproportionate force had been used it is likely that the jury would still have convicted."

He went on to say:

"The law is quite right to favour the use of force against them"— the intruders—

"in such a situation, as it already does".

Mr. Khan: One of the reasons why weight should be given to Mr. Scrivener's comments is that he was the leading counsel for Mr. Martin. Is not another reason why his comments have gravitas the fact that he is a former chairman of the Bar Council?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. My only difference with Mr. Scrivener was when he decided to take Lady Porter's shilling and to defend her in the House of Lords. We parted company at that point; up till then, I had had a lot of respect for him. That slightly took the edge off my admiration for him in terms of the briefs that he took, although obviously it did not detract from his advice in this particular case.

Mr. Khan: I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises the cab rank rule. I am sure that he understands that Mr. Scrivener's decision to take that case was based on that rule rather than on any personal views he may have had.

Mr. Dismore: I am sure that is so, but perhaps some cabs are more expensive than others—let us put it that way.

I should now like to examine the Bill in detail, because the problems really start to emerge when we try to construe the consequences of the provisions in their present form.

Mr. Flello: Before my hon. Friend moves on from quoting notable individuals, will he tell me his reaction to the point that it is okay for the Leader of the Opposition to have changed his view, but not, it would seem, for the incoming chief constable to have done so?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend has made a good point. I suspect that Sir Ian Blair was caught unawares during a long interview on the "Today" programme, that he took the earliest opportunity to correct the impression that he may have given, and that he then fell in line with ACPO. Unfortunately, it seems to have taken the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe more than a decade to change his position. One can draw whatever conclusions one wishes from that.

Clause 1(2) would introduce a new subsection (1A) to the Criminal Law Act 1967. The very first words in that proposed new subsection create problems. They are:

"Where a person uses force".

What is meant by "person" in these circumstances? It could be anybody. The provision is not confined to a householder, as it was in the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark. It is not confined to a legal resident, or even to a security guard. "A person" could be anyone at all. It could be a squatter taking action against the lawful owner of the property who had come to try to remove his possessions or repossess the property. Under the Bill, a squatter would be entitled to use disproportionate force, so long as it was not excessive, against the legal owner of the property. Is that how the alleged party of law and order believes the Bill should be interpreted?

Dr. Palmer: Could not the person be another criminal, seeking to steal the same property, attempting to deter his rival from getting there first? Would not he be entitled to use disproportionate force in those circumstances?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We might see some further examples as the debate progresses.

What would happen when the police turned up and found the body on the carpet, Agatha Christie-style, and drew their chalk line round it? What would happen then? The attacker/householder might say that the victim was a burglar, an intruder, or a trespasser. How could the police check that, especially if both parties had a criminal history, as my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe suggested? For example, both might be drug dealers. Such a possibility was highlighted in the ACPO leaflet, which stated that the police had to investigate such cases because things were not always as they seemed.

Alternatively, to give a more innocent example, let us suppose that there was a dispute between two neighbours. We have all had to deal with those in our constituency surgeries. Let us suppose that two neighbours have fallen out and one is found dead on the kitchen floor of the other. The householder says, "Well, he may be my neighbour, but he was coming to pinch my belongings." The neighbour might have come round to argue about the ball going over the fence or the noisy stereo, but we have no way of knowing that, and disproportionate force would have been used. The risk of revenge and pursuit attacks is created by the Bill.

The Bill states that a person can pray in aid the defence provided by the Bill if they are in a building, but also refers to protection of personal property. One of my problems with the Bill is that the person might forget that the law changes the moment they leave the front door. Different rules apply if someone chases a burglar down the street as opposed to when the burglar is inside the property.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): My hon. Friend is much more skilled and learned in these matters than

[Jim Dowd]

I, but as I read the Bill, it would apply to any building or part of a building. As I understand it, therefore, the law would change when a person went through the front door but was still on someone's property, let alone on a public highway.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. When we come to consider the Bill in more detail, we will need to spend some time on the definition of "building", because it creates a series of additional anomalies beyond the obvious one that my hon. Friend has rightly and quickly spotted.

Mr. Khan: The problem with the lack of definition is compounded by the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd). The Bill refers not only to a person in the property that he occupies or owns, but to any person in any building or part of a building. What happens, for example, to a person who happens to exit a property on an estate? If, in exiting the front door, that person is still within the building, let us compare and contrast that with the position for someone who exits a terraced property on to the street. Does not my hon. Friend agree that the position is absurd?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I hope that we shall receive a proper explanation of the definition of "building", which is rather vague in the Bill.

Mr. Flello: Would it not be possible to have a bizarre, cartoon-like nonsense with someone running from building to building, and it is okay to use disproportionate force when they are in a building, but not okay when they are not. The perpetrator might do everything to avoid running into a building so that he cannot have disproportionate force inflicted on him. He will run for the nearest piece of open ground rather than being trapped in any building.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend's suggestion is not as far-fetched as it might seem. When I was a Westminster councillor, my council ward had large blocks of flats that were joined together by walkways. One of the problems experienced by the police was people running from one building along the walkways, which were open and therefore not part of the building, into the next building. They ran round and round the maze of the estate in that way to avoid the police. My hon. Friend is right that if the police or a householder grabbed them in a flat or in the corridor, they could use excessive force, but if they grabbed them on the walkway, they could only use reasonable force. How can that be common sense? That is the consequence of the Bill as drafted, however.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend has given examples of crime statistics, showing that our constituents in urban areas are more likely to be victims of crime than those in rural areas. Is not the lack of definition and clarity in relation to "building" another example of the arrogance of Conservative Members who wish to pass a Bill that would only assist, in a limited way, parts of certain constituencies?

Mr. Dismore: I think that my hon. Friend is a little harsh in talking of arrogance; I think that it is probably ignorance of how the other half lives, given the rarefied circles in which Conservative Members might mix. I mentioned earlier that, according to the burglary figures, the most likely victims of burglaries are those living on council estates on modest incomes, rather than the lord in his castle or the detached householder in the country. Conservative Members seem to have overlooked the statistics in favour of a good headline, however.

Dr. Palmer: To be fair, the Bill does attempt to clarify the meaning of "building or part of a building"

by referring to section 9 of the Theft Act 1968, under which any inhabited vehicle or vessel is covered. Case law has established that a large freezer standing in a farmyard counts as a building. Does the proposed law not bring us into the realm of the ridiculous, where a struggle will vary in its terms depending on whether one has stumbled into a yard or a freezer, got into a car or whatever?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We must look at section 9 of the Theft Act later when we consider the question of building in a little more detail. We have seen examples of a number of anomalies so far but we are only scratching the surface. When we start to examine what the Theft Act says and wider case law, beyond the example that my hon. Friend provides, we will see how ridiculous the consequences of the Bill may be.

Mr. Flello: If my understanding is correct, a thief running from a building who is desperate not to run into another building will not use a getaway car. He will use a getaway pushbike; otherwise, he could be in a building under the Theft Act and subject to a more disproportionate action.

Mr. Dismore: I think that my hon. Friend is wrong in that respect because—my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe may have been highlighting the problem—when one examines all the definitions of "vehicle", one realises that it may not actually mean a vehicle. It is a little more confusing than that, as will become apparent when I look at the definition of "building" later in my remarks.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend seemed to suggest that Conservative Members think that they are creating something that meets the needs of those in rural communities. I used to live on a farm in Stanleytown in the Rhondda. On one occasion, I saw people at the other end of the barn, which was at the end of a field. If one were going to investigate that, which many farmers might want to do, one would not want three different sets of laws to be governing what use of force one could use. Therefore, the Bill fails to meet the needs not just of people living in cities, but people living in rural areas.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. The problem with the Bill is that it creates so many anomalies that people will not know where they stand. At the moment, the law is clear. It is common sense, but under this Bill common sense goes out of the window.

Mr. Flello: If my understanding is correct, members of the general public who are not able to have such eminent and knowledgeable friends on their side at the time of a burglary would not know that they could not use disproportionate force, so where is the clarification that the Bill seeks to introduce?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend answers his own question. There is no clarification; it makes things far worse.

Before that round of interventions, I was construing the term "person" in clause 1(2), which introduces new subsection (1A). The next question I pose is: what if the householder—I will use the broad meaning of the word "householder"—attacks someone by mistake? What if it turns out that the person they attack is not a burglar but a neighbour returning a lawnmower late at night, or a genuine gasman—not the artificer who has come to nick the money out of the teapot—who has come to read the meter?

At the moment, if there is a mistake of fact, the reasonableness, or otherwise, of the mistake is a factor to be taken into account when determining whether the mistake was or may have been a genuine one. Thus, where a defendant was neither under threat nor actual attack but honestly believed that he was, the jury should be directed to consider whether the degree of force used was commensurate with the degree of risk that he believed to be created by the attack. What that means, if that basic principle of law will still apply, is that the gasman or the neighbour returning a lawnmower could be half beaten to death, but it would be all right for the assailant homeowner to say, "I made a big mistake. I'm very sorry and mortified, but that's life and I'm not being prosecuted." That would not be much consolation to the gasman or neighbour lying in a pool of blood. The Bill effectively encourages that level of violence. At the moment, if a mistake like that were made, the gasman or neighbour might get a punch in the mouth or be pushed over, receiving lesser injuries than might be likely if the Bill were enacted when the householder could use excessive force.

Mr. Flello: We are looking at a vigilante Bill in all but name.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. Some of the language used, the circumstances described and the arguments being prayed in aid of the Bill by the Opposition parties have made that pretty clear. We are looking at the introduction of vigilante law, and law, at that, that is unclear and uncertain and would result in people who believe they are doing the right thing facing prosecution when, at present, they would not.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend gave the example of a householder making an innocent mistake in the absence of mens rea. Is not it another problem that the Bill will lack the risk jurisprudence and case law we already have under section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967? The new subsection (1A)(b), which talks about what to the householder, compounds that error? Before, a subjective element was required, and that is missing here.

"ought to have been apparent"

Mr. Dismore: I am not sure I entirely agree. If section 3 of the 1967 Act were to be amended, the new subsection (1A)(b) would, as I read, it provide an objective rather than a subjective test, in that it suggests something "ought" to have been apparent to the person using force, rather than relying on what that person believed.

Chris Bryant: I think I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) rather than my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) on that point. However, the point surely is that in using the terms "proportionate" or "disproportionate", we do not ascertain what the response would be proportionate or disproportionate to. Is it proportionate or disproportionate to the amount of fear felt by an individual, or to the actual force used, or to the force that might possibly have been used? Surely that is a problem in the Bill.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is correct, and I hope to explore that issue later. The problem is that there is no common law interpretation of those terms, and nor is there any guidance in the Bill. Nor, for that matter, was there any guidance in the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which introduced the test into civil law, and which has been prayed in aid by the Opposition as they have made their proposals today.

Jim Dowd: To pursue the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), if there is no legal definition of "disproportionate", is there any legal definition of "grossly"? If we have no definition of "disproportionate", what is "grossly disproportionate"?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to raise that. I was construing the phrase "grossly disproportionate" jointly, but one can consider it disjunctively as well, which creates two questions. As far as I am aware, there is no guidance in the common law, and there is certainly none in the Bill or any other statute, on the definition of either term. Of course, it is bizarre to say that people should use disproportionate force, never mind grossly disproportionate force. The Bill would endorse people doing something disproportionate either to their fear or to the level of the attack they experienced, and that seems, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South said, to be a licence for vigilantism.

Mr. Khan: Are there not additional problems with "grossly disproportionate"? The concept is completely alien to the European convention on jurisprudence, which refers to proportionality and disproportionality, not "grossly disproportionate". Secondly, there is the reference to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 in that context. "Grossly disproportionate" applies in the civil context, where the burden of proof is quite clearly different from that in criminal law.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I hope to explore the difference between civil and criminal law later in my remarks. An important issue has been raised by the Opposition when they say, "We are only aligning criminal law with civil law." In fact, they are not. Weird and strange anomalies are created. The differences between the criminal and civil law systems must be explained if we are to ensure that the House has all the facts and arguments before it before deciding whether to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Clause 1 introduces new subsection (1A) to section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 by referring to the definition of "person". There follows the issue of phraseology.

Jim Dowd: The proposed new subsection reads:

"Where a person uses force"

Will my hon. Friend enlighten us about what would happen if someone set a dog upon a supposed intruder? The dog would be using the force, but the person would have some control over the dog—or would they be held not to have that control?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend raises an interesting series of questions by his intervention. In general terms, I think that the dog would be seen as a weapon, if it had been deliberately set on the burglar by the owner. There would then be the argument about whether the dog was, for example, a chihuahua, or a bull mastiff or a pitbull terrier. The answer might be different in those cases.

The position becomes even more complicated. Let us suppose that the dog of its own volition decides to sink its teeth into the burglar's trousers, without it being set upon the burglar by the owner who uses the force. There is nothing in the Bill that amends any of the laws relating to dangerous dogs legislation, which was controversial before I became a Member of this place. The Animals Act 1971 applies to the issue of whether the dog was acting lawfully or unlawfully. My hon. Friend has raised some interesting questions, which go way beyond the Bill that is before us.

Dr. Palmer: If no living creature is involved but the person has set an automatic defence, I think that my hon. Friend would agree that that is an indirect use of force by the person who set the mechanism in place. If that person had reason to fear serious assault—let us say by terrorists—but the mechanism went off to injure someone who had committed a quite harmless trespass, does my hon. Friend think that under the wording of the Bill it could be claimed that although the setting off of the mechanism was clearly grossly disproportionate, given that the intruder had been blown up, for example, it could not be held reasonably to be a parallel? The person would not have been there at the time. An automatic mechanism had been set for a real threat, although it had gone off for some minor occurrence.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. The law in relation to setting a trap, as it stands, is clear. We should not do it. That is not to say that we cannot take steps physically to harden a property against intruders. Any physical hardening, in so far as it may cause injury, should be apparent. It should not be a trap. The law goes the other way, perhaps, in that it encourages people to have window locks, burglar alarms and so forth. A burglar alarm is a trap but there were the man-traps that we see in Victorian films, catching the poacher. Such traps clearly would be a trap and would be illegal. If I am wrong about that, what happens where the man-trap is in the grounds of a property rather than inside the building? We end up with a completely different set of circumstances.

If the man-trap is in the grounds of the castle, it would be caught by the existing law of reasonable force and clearly would not be protected. If it is inside the building, I suspect that it would probably be protected because the response is a trap and it is not for the purposes of the Bill. An interesting question has been raised and it is one that may have to be explored in more detail in Committee, should the Bill go that far.

Mr. Flello: My hon. Friend has raised some further thoughts in my mind. What if someone had set a device designed to give a mild electric shock to an intruder at a level where no harm would be expected but the intruder had a heart condition and the shock was sufficient to trigger a heart attack? Under the vigilante Bill as it stands such a system would not be disproportionate. What if something designed to stop an intruder accessing the roof was mounted on the outside of a building but fell into the grounds or the street? It would have gone from being something within a building to something outside a building. Where would that stand under the vigilante Bill?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. Properties are often protected by barbed wire, razor wire or the new material called cactus, which is very effective. There is also the old-fashioned use of broken bottles stuck in concrete on top of a wall. Those are not traps because they are obvious. There may be civil remedies if someone is injured by them, but they are certainly not traps.

Mr. Gale: They are illegal.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman says that they are illegal. That may be the case, but the issue that we are starting to address is what we mean by "trespasser". I shall go on to consider that because it is important that I make some progress.

Mr. Gale: As a matter of interest, hon. Members were given counselling by security force personnel because of terrorist threats to Members. We were warned that we had to be very careful about how we protected our homes. I fear that the concept that your home is your castle is not true.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. In my property, I have employed security measures such as window locks, deadlocks and burglar alarms that are unlikely to harm anyone. That is the best way to go, as I hope to explain later.

Mr. Khan: The intervention of the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) is useful, because it appears that the current position is that the use of barbed wire or glass is proportionate if a lad kicks his ball over a wall and is injured. If that is the case, will my hon. Friend comment on what might happen to youngsters going over a wall to get their ball back if a householder was allowed to use disproportionate and excessive means to protect his or her property?

Mr. Dismore: The child might be injured but the householder would not be protected by the Bill because the ball would presumably be in the yard or garden. The householder might not draw the distinction that a QC would between the house itself and its immediate surroundings. People might think that they are protected by the Bill in using disproportionate force in dealing with a lad trespassing while chasing a ball, but find themselves in the dock because the Bill would not protect them. That is the sort of problem that arises when there is a duplicity of standards in respect of the law of self-defence.

Let us consider what we mean by "entered as a trespasser", which is the phrase used in the third line of what would become new subsection (1A) of the Criminal Law Act 1967. I happen to have with me a copy of the eighth edition of Professor Sir John Smith's "Law of Theft", which, if we follow its advice, produces some interesting anomalies in respect of the Bill.

Let us first consider the definition of "enters". The common law rule was that the insertion of any part of the body, however small, was a sufficient entry. If a burglar pushed through a window pane and the forepart of his finger was observed to be inside the building, that was enough. The Theft Act gives no express guidance and it seems to have been assumed in Parliament that the common law rules apply. Under common law, if an instrument is inserted into the building for the purpose of committing the offence, it counts as an entry, even though no part of the body was introduced into the building. Someone who just pokes a finger through the window could be met by disproportionate force when the mad householder with an axe comes along and chops it off. That is disproportionate for sure, but is it excessive? We do not know, but I believe that the House does not really expect or wish to see that happening.

We know that the common law still applies, because Professor Smith, one of this country's leading experts in criminal law, explains it in his book. He goes through a whole series of anomalies that can occur, but he goes on to say at the end of the section that deals with "peculiar effects" that the "best course" is probably to assume "the continued existence" of the "common law rules". He provides some very strange examples. One of the most interesting is the case of transvestites who hooked dresses worth £600 through the letter boxes of shops and pleaded guilty to burglary. Well, if that is committing a burglary and if the essence of burglary is trespass, I dread to think what might have happened if the householder had got hold of them while they were hooking things through his letter box.

Now that we have looked into the question of entering, we have to understand exactly what is meant by trespassing. A trespasser is a legal concept that is rooted in the civil law rather than the criminal law. The basic rule in civil law is that entry with the consent of the occupier cannot be trespass, but obviously the opposite is the case. "Mistake" by the person who enters the property is no defence if, for example, the person accused of being a trespasser and therefore at risk under the Bill were to enter the house next door, mistaking it for his own, on a very dark night. That would still be regarded as an intentional entry in trespass law, even if the person doing the entering had made an honest and reasonable mistake. To revert to my earlier example of the neighbour returning the lawnmower, one wonders whether the full force of excessive force is appropriate in those circumstances.

I can provide an even better example than that. Let us suppose that the person allegedly committing the trespass were separated from his wife and he wrongly supposed that he had the right to enter the matrimonial home of which he was still technically the owner-occupier as he was still paying towards the cost of the home. He thought that he had the right to go in, even though he may not have had that right in law, and enters with the intent of removing some of the belongings. In fact, even in law, he may be a trespasser, but he is not actually a burglar because he can rely on some of the defences that apply in the law of trespass. My concern in that case is that he is potentially a trespasser for the purposes of the Bill, but he is not a burglar for the purposes of the Theft Act 1968. He could be beaten up by whoever happens to be inside the property—by his wife's new partner, for example—and if he were subjected to excessive force, it would be covered by the Bill even though in law he was not really a burglar at all.

Mr. Khan: Is there not a problem with the words "entered as a trespasser"? Earlier, an Opposition Member, who is no longer in his place, referred to an example, in which "but for the law" he would have been a hero for retaliating against someone who came into his shop to commit an act of theft. As my hon. Friend knows, the reality is that if someone commits a criminal act on a property, the licence is revoked and he then becomes a trespasser. If someone enters a shop as an innocent purchaser of an item without the intention of breaking the law, but subsequently decides to commit a criminal act thereby becoming a trespasser, he or she did not enter the shop or property as a trespasser, which is the threshold required for the provisions to apply. Is not that the problem?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a very interesting point, which relates to the Theft Act. If someone decides to commit a theft at a particular stage, they become a trespasser from the moment they entered the building and could theoretically face the charge of burglary; in practice, they are usually charged with theft. Technically, if they were to jump over the counter and raid the till, I suspect that it would be classed as burglary.

Chris Bryant: Let us consider the example given earlier of an estranged husband returning to the matrimonial home, which he still half owns. He might not be entering as a trespasser and may have no intention of committing a burglary of any kind. None the less, in an altercation he might end up offering violence against his wife, and at that point it might be necessary for her to offer violence in return. Of course, this Bill would not protect her in any sense.

Mr. Dismore: To be fair, I am not sure that that is accurate. In that situation, the husband would probably be committing the offence of burglary anyway, because burglary is not just thieving: rape and grievous bodily harm, for example, can constitute burglary. People often think that burglary is just stealing; it is not. It can include other offences linked to breaking into a property. The problem is that the Bill refers not to burglary but simply to people trespassing on buildings. The definitions of trespass in civil law and in criminal law are different, as are the definitions of the motive of the person entering the building. The situation is very confusing indeed, and part of the problem is that the Bill is unclear on the circumstances to which it would apply.

As has been demonstrated in a number of different examples given today, under the Bill, the person defending themselves could be completely unclear as to which test applies: the reasonable force test or the excessive, disproportionate force test. They would not know where they stood, and the creation of such confusion would put them in a very difficult position. There is a very real risk that they might naturally assume that they could use disproportionate force in circumstances where they in fact could not. The consequence could be entirely the opposite of that intended. People could end up appearing in the dock to defend themselves who currently would not need to, because as it stands they would be using reasonable, rather than disproportionate, force. If someone used the latter in circumstances where they were entitled to use only the former, they would rightly be charged with a criminal offence. That could happen under the Bill, simply because it has led them up the garden path.

Mr. Flello: Under this vigilante Bill, burglars could decide to stop committing burglaries and start mugging instead, because the prize is the same but the chances of being beaten up are reduced. In other words, it could push burglars out into the parks to mug people. Moreover, under this very woolly vigilante Bill, somebody threatened with being mugged in the park might rush to the nearest house and hammer on the door to get in, only for the person behind the door to think, "Somebody is trespassing on my premises; I can now use disproportionate force against them." What are my hon. Friend's thoughts on that?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend offers yet another example of how this Bill creates many anomalies. Creating two different laws of self-defence for two different sets of circumstances is dangerous and would lead to serious problems.

Mr. Khan: At the beginning of his excellent speech, my hon. Friend said that the Bill's title, which refers to the "Protection of Property", gave the game away. Will he confirm, in the light of the intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello), that under this Bill those who live in gated developments or castles, and who drive everywhere, would enjoy better protection than those of us who walk or commute, and who live in communities? Nor, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) said, would the Bill protect those living in rural areas.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right: the Bill is disproportionate and unfair.

In an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South mentioned the displacement of crime from burglary to street robbery. Well, that may happen anyway if we are able to bear down on the incidence of burglary; indeed, there has been a rise in street crime as a consequence of the fact that burglary has become a more difficult crime to commit. The problem with the Bill is that it may drive people further into that type of criminal behaviour.

I mentioned previously the problem of displacement from properties where the householder may be thought to have weapons to defend himself to the home of a little old lady who could not defend herself. The Bill would inevitably lead to such displacement, and my hon. Friend is right to say that there will also be displacement from burglary to street robbery, perhaps as an alternative way of funding a drug habit. Obviously, we have to deal with street crime, too, but the Bill does not provide the same protection for victims of street robbery as it does for the lord in his castle.

Dr. Palmer: We all admire my hon. Friend's ability to retain the thread of his remarks despite our interventions. I want to take him back to an intervention that he did not fully deal with: my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) pointed out that under the Bill the situation would be different for someone who entered as a trespasser and for an opportunist who went into a shop and then decided to commit a burglary. A householder would not necessarily know which of those two things had occurred, so the exemption in subsection (1A)(b)

"this was or ought to have been apparent to the person" relates only to the degree of force. If a householder came across someone who had appeared in the building unlawfully but did not know whether they originally intended to trespass, the householder would not know whether they could use disproportionate force.

Mr. Dismore: That is one of the problems. My hon. Friend switched from a shop owner to a householder halfway through his analogy, but I think it would be interesting if we stayed with the shop owner. If somebody enters a shop and tries to steal goods or raid the till, they retrospectively become a trespasser for the purposes of the Theft Act, so technically would fall to be dealt with under the Bill. The problem is that the shop owner may not know that. I suspect that most shop owners do not know the law of trespass well enough to draw that distinction. Yet again, we would be in the difficult position where different rules applied in different circumstances, with a complete lack of clarity for the victim about the extent to which they are entitled to defend themselves—whether the high test in the Bill or the common-sense test in the existing law of self-defence.

A further problem with trespass relates to invitees—for example, friends who visit the house, other tenants in a house of multiple occupation, squatters, a neighbour borrowing a lawnmower or a neighbour in a dispute. They might not enter a particular place as trespassers but they could all become trespassers for the reasons that I have outlined. That creates a serious situation, because most people would not know where the line was drawn, or that the status of someone who had entered the building could change. The arguments that we have been having during the debate about trespass show that the law of trespass is not as fully understood as it should be even by those who might have read "Archbold's Criminal Pleadings" or "Clerk and Lindsell on Torts"—

Mr. Flello: Bedtime reading.

Mr. Dismore: Only if one is an insomniac. If one wants to know the law, one would have to read those books, but I suspect that most shop owners would not have them on their shelves.

Jim Dowd: Unless they owned a bookshop.

Mr. Dismore: Even most bookshops would not have those books unless they were law bookshops, and there are not many of those about. Of course, whether the shop staff had actually read the books is another question altogether.

The law of trespass gives rise to serious problems, especially in cases where people gain entry by deception. We have all heard about burglary by artifice—the dodgy gas or electricity man whose object is not to read the meter but to rob the teapot. In those circumstances, even if the dodgy gas man was invited in because the householder did not think that he was a trespasser, in law he would be. To pick up the second point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe when he switched his analogy, the householder would, under the Bill, be entitled to use disproportionate force to defend themselves but would probably be unaware of that fact. The Bill would create misapprehension about what people could do.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend might recall that the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) invited a gentleman into his home at 2 o'clock one morning because the man knocked on the door and said that he needed to use the toilet. Even such an esteemed figure as the right hon. Gentleman might not have fully understood the nature of trespass. If the Bill came into law, he thus might not fully understand the precise degree of force that he could use.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. If we are talking about the countryside, there is an interesting point that people who have limited authority to do one thing and may thus enter a place legally can become trespassers if they do something outside the extent of that authority. An example cited under the Game Act 1831 is of someone who had permission to go on to land to hunt for rabbits, but then started hunting hares. It might be splitting hairs to raise the case, but such evidence of trespass under the Game Act 1831 would presumably be evidence of trespass under the Bill if the animals in question were inside a building—we would presumably be considering battery-farmed rabbits or hares in such circumstances.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend talks about the householder being unclear about whether someone is a trespasser. One of the arguments for the Bill that is being pressed by members of Her Majesty's official Opposition is the fact that it would reduce the number of burglaries committed, because possible burglars would be scared off and deterred by the draconian powers open to a householder. However, would not a possible burglar also be confused about the position? Any chance of the Bill deterring burglars would be limited by their confusion about the powers of the householder.

Mr. Dismore: I am not entirely sure that I agree with my hon. Friend's argument. The Opposition say that a burglar would assume the worst in such circumstances. If that is the case, it might be an argument in support of the Bill. However, if my hon. Friend is right—in this context I suspect that he is—it would not have that deterrent effect at all, because burglars would assume, as criminals always do, that they would not get caught and that the lesser rules would apply. They are not very intelligent people, which explains why they undertake such business, although I suppose that we can think of the famous jewel thieves whom we sometimes see in fiction.

Chris Bryant: Is not the other problem with the concept of trespass the fact that the tort of trespass originally related to land—and still primarily does in law—rather than to buildings? I know that the concept of trespass in a building comes from the Theft Act 1968, but the situation is none the less confusing.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. If ordinary people were to read the Bill, they would think that "trespass" applied to anywhere on their property. They might not read the small print that refers to a "building or part of building"

When we examine the definition of a building, as I hope that we eventually will, the situation gets even more difficult and confusing.

Let us continue to examine proposed new subsection (1A) to section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 by considering what is meant by the "defence of persons or property"

One might think that that is a relatively uncontroversial aspect of the Bill that raises no significant problems, but that is not the case. Property does not have to be either lawfully owned or legal property in its own right.

Let us suppose that the legal owner of a TV or video discovered that it had been stolen by another person in their tower block. If the owner decided to go and repatriate it, they might think that they were entitled to use disproportionate force to recover it, because they would be acting inside a building to prevent crime. However, the burglar in his flat could also use disproportionate force to defend the stolen property from its lawful owner and fight back, so the situation would ratchet up. Each person is legally entitled to use disproportionate force against the other. That is surely not the Bill's intention, but it is the inevitable and logical consequence of the way in which it is drafted. The lawful owner of the property is preventing crime while operating inside a building, and the burglar, who is also inside the building, is defending property, even though it is not his. According to the Bill, each can use disproportionate force against the other. Who knows where it will end, except with two corpses on the carpet? Surely, that is not the Bill's intention.

Dr. Palmer: Most of us are not legal experts, unlike my hon. Friend. Even so, we have been able to identify many ambiguities and problems in the Bill. In the current state of affairs, the position is intuitively clear when a case comes to court. Would it therefore not be a retrograde step to create a haze of legal ambiguities? The ensuing lawyers festival would make today's debate look like peanuts.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. I do not practise as a lawyer any more, but the only people to gain from the Bill belong to the legal profession. I expect lawyers to make a great deal of money from the obtuse arguments whose surface we have only scratched today.

I have dealt with the position when property is owned illegally, but what is the position when property cannot be owned legally in the first place? For example, what if there is cache of drugs in a crack house? A drugs gang may be about to sell drugs to an addict who has entered the property legally at the invitation of his dealer for a fix. The junkie finds that he does not have enough money, and tries to grab the drugs. The drugs gang could use disproportionate force against the junkie to prevent him from seizing the illegal drugs that should not be in its possession in the first place. The junkie could argue that he was trying to prevent crime by seizing drugs from the dealers. Theoretically, both parties could deploy the argument that they were entitled to use disproportionate force.

Similarly, a drugs gang may wish to use disproportionate force against another gang whose members are trying to collect payment or steal the drugs. That is not an infrequent occurrence, as we know from the leaflet produced by the CPS and ACPO, which says that burglaries are often used to conceal the fact that nefarious activities such as drug dealing are under way. The law is bad enough without introducing legalised gang warfare between tooled-up drugs gangs in a shoot-out. Each gang could use their Uzis to mow the other down—the Opposition might think there is nothing wrong with that—with disproportionate force. That is perfectly legal for both gangs under the Bill, because one is entitled to shoot someone if one faces the threat of force. One drugs gang is trying to prevent crime, and the other is trying to commit it. However, both are trying to defend their property, and the net result is legalised gang warfare. Surely, that is not what we are attempting to achieve in the Bill.

Chris Bryant: To be fair to the Opposition, those gangs would not be able to go out and do that. They would only be able to do so in a building.

Mr. Khan: Or part of a building.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting is right. What about a shoot-out in the staircase in the common area of a tower block—a not uncommon location for drug dealing or, for that matter, a crack house? Machine Gun Kelly could stand outside the lift shaft to mow his opponent down. It would be perfectly legal for each of them to use disproportionate force against the other in a fight over a drugs cache or money, which is surely an unintentional consequence of the Bill.

Mr. Flello: It is a little unfair to accuse the Opposition of supporting such a thing, given that there are unfortunately only two Opposition Members present.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a caustic comment about the Opposition's interest in their own Bill. I am pleased to see so many of my hon. Friends present to make their views known through interventions or, if there is time, through their own speeches. I regret to say that there is still an awful lot more to say about the Bill. We must give it proper scrutiny. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, were he in his place, would expect nothing less of me.

Mr. Khan: Can my hon. Friend reassure me that he will talk about the Bill's compatibility with the European convention on human rights?

Mr. Dismore: Of course I intend to do that. It is a little way down my list of subjects, but I hope there will be time to get to the Human Rights Act and the implications of the convention.

Let us consider the definition of "building", a subject that has already tested the House today, and rightly so, as this is one of the particularly weak points of the Bill. Clause 1(2) introduces in section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 a new subsection 1A referring to anybody "who is in any building or part of a building".

"Building" is defined in new section 3(1C) as having

"the same meaning as in section 9 of the Theft Act 1968 (c. 60) (burglary)."

So we must refer to the Theft Act. Unlike the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark, this Bill deals not just with domestic premises, but with all buildings, with no distinction between domestic and commercial premises. On burglary, section 9(1)(a) of the Theft Act 1968 states:

"A person is guilty of burglary if—

(a) he enters any building or part of a building as a trespasser".

We have considered the meaning of "trespasser", and I should say that the penalties for invading a domestic property are rather higher—a sentence of up to 14 years—than for any other property, for which the sentence is 10 years. The definition of "building" is cross-referred in subsection (3), which states:

"References in subsections (1) and (2)"—

about which we need not worry at the moment, and references to a building that is a dwelling—

"shall apply also to an inhabited vehicle or vessel, and shall apply to any such vehicle or vessel at times when the person having a habitation in it is not there as well as at times when he is."

The problem is that that does not define what a building is, so we have to go to the case law to find out how a building is defined. I must resort to my old bible, "Archbold: Criminal Pleading". The 2005 definition states:

"Any building or part of a building may be the subject of a burglary."

That includes houseboats and caravans which are regularly inhabited, even if they are empty at times. It goes on to say:

"The word 'building', being an ordinary word of the English language, and the context not being such as to show that the word is used other than in an unusual sense, its meaning is a question of fact not law."

That is about all that "Archbold", the bible of criminal law, has to say about it, except that, I am pleased to say, the editor of "Archbold" helpfully cross-refers us to the excellent book by emeritus Professor Sir John Smith, "The Law of Theft", 8th edition, in which a little more guidance is given.

Jim Dowd: It must be a bestseller.

Mr. Dismore: Indeed. It is even available in paperback.

Jim Dowd: Are there plans to turn it into a musical?

Mr. Dismore: I think not, but the book provides helpful guidance as to what a building is in law.

Professor Smith says:

"Many things which have been held to be buildings for other purposes will not be buildings for the purposes of the Theft Act—for example, a garden wall, a railway embankment or a tunnel under the road."

That is, perhaps, self-evident, unless one is, for example, a railway worker or a roadman.

Mr. Flello: A number of my constituents enjoy the happy hobby of caravanning, and my hon. Friend has mentioned caravans. At the moment, if a caravan sits in the front garden of a property in my constituency and somebody tries to take or burgle it, the householders can rightly and legitimately use reasonable force to stop them. What would the situation be under this proposed vigilante Bill? Would a caravan count as a building? What if the householder uses their caravan only once a year? Where would the Bill leave my constituents?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend has raised a very interesting question. I think that a caravan would probably count as a building, whether or not people live in it and even if it is just parked on a front drive. A difficulty would arise if one of his constituents owned a Dormobile, which complicates the situation, and I hope to refer to the difficulties created by Dormobiles very shortly, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Khan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for having done the reading, which has saved me from having to do it. What about the position of those of my constituents who enjoy going camping in a tent? Would a tent be classified as a building? And what about those of my constituents who have the good fortune, like many of the constituents of official Opposition Members, to own large properties that contain a big wall, a garden or piece of land and a bricks and mortar building? Would such householders receive the protection of the Bill on the piece of land between the wall and the bricks and mortar building?

Mr. Dismore: On the second point, such householders would not be protected by the Bill, because the piece of land is not inside a building. My hon. Friend has presaged the eminent Professor Smith, who says:

"To be a building, the structure must have some degree of permanence. A substantial portable structure may be a building but probably"— that is as far as he goes—

"not a tent even though it is someone's home."

The best advice that I can give my hon. Friend is that a tent would probably not be covered by the Bill. That highlights our problem with the Bill, because "probably" is not good enough when one is discussing matters of life and death, which one is when one considers the Bill.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend may recall from the Sexual Offences Act 2003 that a tent is defined in law as a structure, not a building.

Mr. Dismore: That is very interesting, because the eminent Professor states that "A substantial portable structure may be a building but probably not a tent".

Perhaps my hon. Friend should write to Professor Smith to put him right. However, his point arises in a context other than the Theft Act 1968, with which we are concerned today. I am sure that Professor Smith would be very interested to know about the comparison with the Sexual Offences Act 2003, which may give him additional guidance on how to construe the 1968 Act and ultimately this Bill, were it to become law.

Jim Dowd: If I have understood my hon. Friend's definition of a building, which concerns the building's degree of permanence, I imagine that a cave would not be a building, but what about a tunnel that has been built and is a permanent structure? I mention that point because the Bill refers to the prevention of crime in general rather than just crime against persons or property. Criminal action on the permanent way is a great headache for the railway authorities. Would the railway authorities have powers under the Bill?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend has raised two issues. First, what about troglodytes? Troglodytes are people who live in caves. Many people live in caves. Indeed, when I was on holiday in Spain, I visited several towns in which the houses were made out of caves. Are such caves buildings? My hon. Friend has posed a very good question. I presume that if they had a built-on front wall built and possessions inside they would be a building, whereas a tunnel would not. However, there may be a building inside a tunnel—for example, a sub-surface underground station. That raises interesting questions. If the British Transport police wanted to apprehend an offender who was in the ticket hall and then leaped over the barriers and ran down the tunnel, what would be the powers of the constables chasing him? Would those powers switch between the moment they left the ticket hall and the moment they entered the tunnel? Under the Bill, they probably would.

Chris Bryant: I am not too worried about the troglodytes, but I am still worried about those who inhabit vehicles. The hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) referred to theft from a car. Very few cars would count as an inhabited vehicle. My hon. Friend drew a distinction between a Dormobile—the "dorm" element suggests that people sleep and perhaps live in it—and a caravan. Where would he place mobile homes, which for the most part are not mobile but stationary with no vehicular element?

Mr. Dismore rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I am not criticising the hon. Gentleman for straying too far away from the main contents of the Bill, but he spent some time defining trespass and is now defining buildings. Those definitions must apply elsewhere in law. I hope that he will use his speech particularly to address the Bill before us instead of defining terms from the law generally.

Mr. Dismore: I would hate to quibble with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the problem is that the Bill defines "building or part of a building" by cross-reference to section 9 of the Theft Act 1968. I have been examining that Act's definition of a building because that is the definition that applies in the Bill. It is not my fault that the drafters made that cross-reference. I would far prefer that they had set out what they mean by "building" in the Bill. If we are to explore the Bill properly, I therefore have to consider how "building" is defined for the purposes of section 9 of the Theft Act. The work that I have been using as my bible is the seminal work on the law of theft.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda asked about vehicles. Cars certainly do not apply. Before I come to the issue of mobile homes, though, it is important to set out the benchmark definition of a building. That was given by a former Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, in a case that took place quite a while ago. He says that a building in the ordinary sense is a block of brick or stonework covered in by a roof, and a structure of considerable size that is intended to be permanent or at least to endure for a considerable time. He says that a telephone kiosk is not a building, that the outbuildings of a house are buildings, and that a detached garage, tool shed or greenhouse may be a building. He identifies a difficulty on building sites in that a roof will be thought necessary for a structure to be a building but says that there is no obvious answer to borderline cases. He says that one lodger may commit burglary by entering another lodger's room, that a guest in a hotel may commit a burglary by entering the room of another guest and that on a ship somebody could commit a burglary by going into another cabin. A whole series of examples are brought into the Bill by the cross-reference from the Theft Act.

Mr. Flello: This draft vigilante Bill gives me grave concern, because of the confusion that it would cause. Could my hon. Friend, with his vast experience of these matters, give me some guidance as to what would happen on a building site that had on-site security? If some of the buildings were partly completed and some were not, would the security guard be acting within the law under this vigilante Bill if he used disproportionate force when he caught someone trying to steal things from the site?

Mr. Dismore: I have an example that I was going to use later in my speech, but it is relevant to my hon. Friend's question. I would pity the security guard in those circumstances. Let us suppose that, on a housing development, some of the houses had been finished, some had been constructed as far as the second floor and had a roof, some had only the first floor and no roof, and some were still just a wishful thought in the developer's eye, consisting only of footings or perhaps just open land.

The problem that the security guard would face as he chased the burglar from one part of the site to another would be that he would be able to use disproportionate force when he was in a finished house, but he may or may not be able to do so when he entered a half-finished house, depending on how much of it had been built, and when he chased the burglar over the open land heading for the gate, he would be back under the old rule of reasonable force. Frankly, nothing could better illustrate the anomalies that the Bill would create as a result of defining the word "building" insufficiently tightly. Instead, it sloppily cross-refers us to the Theft Act 1968 because its drafters could not be bothered to apply their minds to what a building should be, for the detailed and specific purposes of the proposals. The net consequence is that we should have all these amazing anomalies.

Mr. Khan: I am really troubled by that last example. My mind is drawn to our police officers, who are governed by their disciplinary codes, as well as by the civil law. Having read about these matters, what guidance would my hon. Friend give to a police officer giving chase, for example, to a teenage trespasser on a building site or on the railway—my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd) mentioned tunnels earlier. How would the police officer know how not to fall foul of the Bill's provisions, by contrast with the provisions of the disciplinary code or the civil law provisions that might apply if they were sued, if someone were assaulted as a result of the way in which the police officer behaved?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend raises an important point. I would hope that the police officer would exercise their common sense. A police officer is entitled to use reasonable force in apprehending a criminal, as is any citizen attempting to effect a citizen's arrest under the law as it stands. Police officers are trained in the criminal law, and they know when they may and may not use disproportionate force, but that would not be the case under the Bill, because of all the anomalies that it contains. I suspect that a police officer would have more sense than to use disproportionate force. I have rather greater respect for the police service than do the Conservatives, given their suggestion that police officers might wish to use disproportionate force beyond that necessary to detain a suspect.

Mr. Flello: If a police officer giving pursuit to a drug dealer, for example, were in plain clothes and went across the building site that we talked about earlier, he would need not only to think about apprehending the criminal but to be cognisant of the fact that the security guard on the premises could use disproportionate force against him, not realising that he was a police officer because he was in plain clothes. Would not the police officer therefore have to take into account the fact that he might encounter disproportionate force simply because of the area in which he was pursuing the criminal?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend's example is not at all fanciful. I think that it was the case of Kenneth Nye—

Jim Dowd: Kenneth Noye.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his correction. Kenneth Noye was a well known member of the organised crime fraternity. He killed a plain clothes police officer who was staking out his property, because he thought he was a trespasser. Noye escaped conviction, even under the existing law of reasonable force. What would be the position were the new proposals in the Bill to apply? Plain clothes police officers could be subject to disproportionate force all over the place, both in the circumstances that we have heard described and in many others that I am sure that everyone in the House can imagine.

Mr. Khan: An additional point is the criticism that a police officer would face if he or she used excessive or disproportionate force but not grossly disproportionate force. My hon. Friend and I, and our hon. Friends who work with the police, are aware that that would lead to criticism of the police when they were not falling foul of the Bill.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. All that one can say to police officers in those circumstances is that they should use their common sense, and use the reasonable force that they consider necessary to apprehend the offender. Ultimately, I suspect that that is the advice that we would all have to give to householders, or anybody else, even if the Bill were passed. To do anything else would still lead to the grey areas mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe.

Dr. Palmer: Does my hon. Friend agree that we would end up back where we started if we gave householders the advice that the law is not completely clear and that they must rely on the common sense of the jury and behave reasonably, which makes the task of the jury that much harder? Does not he agree that there will be situations in which the use of force to make an arrest is an ongoing process? The police officer might have to hit the suspect several times to subdue him. If the first blow was in a building, and the second blow was not, the question arises as to whether the first blow has become disproportionate.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend raises an interesting set of circumstances, but the force was probably not even reasonable if it did not lay out the offender.

On the definition of "building" as it applies to the Theft Act 1968, cross-referred to the Bill, a number of interventions asked about the position of mobile homes, which is an interesting way of summing up the anomalies in that regard. I mentioned dormobiles and motorised caravans, which are used for the ordinary purpose of a motor car during most of the year but are occasionally lived in, usually when the owner is on holiday. While the vehicle is being lived in, it is undoubtedly an inhabited vehicle, but when it is being used for the purposes of a car, it is not. The exact moment at which it becomes an inhabited vehicle might be difficult to ascertain. Is it when the family has loaded their possessions before going on holiday, when they take to the road, or when they park up at the seaside? When they use the vehicle as a car when on holiday, is it covered? A whole series of anomalies are created in relation to mobile homes.

The Bill is not good enough in this respect. It must be much more specific and clear in its definition of a building. We heard earlier about the Englishman's home being his castle. What if it is a ruined castle? Is that a building? What if it is ruined castle now being restored? At what stage does it become a building? Perhaps it is a house; perhaps it is not. The problem is that the Englishman's home might be his castle, but it might not be his building for the purposes of defending it under the Bill.

What about the position of trains? We still have sleeper trains. If people break into one cabin from another, the chances are that it would be covered by the Bill. Were the great train robbery to occur now, however, the train driver and the post office workers who were victims would not be covered by the Bill, because the mail van, and the driver's cab, would not be considered parts of a building for this purpose. I suspect that the cabins might be.

What about a prisoner who invades the cell of another prisoner in jail? The prisoner, who is the "owner" of the cell, might wish to use disproportionate force to defend his property from the prisoner invading his cell, and the next thing is that we have a prison riot on our hands. That is encouraged by the terms of the Bill.

As a result of the different tests of self-defence in different circumstances, the anomalies are legion. The definition of a building should have been drawn a lot tighter, rather than trusting to luck, sticking a finger in the air, testing the wind and referring to the Theft Act.

We have had a lot of discussion today about the definition of grossly disproportionate, which is the meat of the Bill. Clause 1 would insert new subsection (1A)(a) into the Criminal Law Act 1967 and introduce the phrase,

"the degree of force used was grossly disproportionate".

If the defence is that the force was disproportionate but not grossly disproportionate, the prosecution has to prove that the force was not just disproportionate but grossly disproportionate.

Jim Dowd: We briefly touched on the matter a few minutes ago, but I find deeply troubling the use of the term "grossly". Where does it sit in the gradation of disproportionality? Is it worse than severely, markedly, significantly or extravagantly? How is a jury, for example, to distinguish between mere disproportionality, slight disproportionality, severe disproportionality and gross disproportionality?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. The Joint Committee on Human Rights report on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newark, which contained exactly the same language, said that judges could have a problem interpreting it. If the judges have a problem interpreting it, how can the ordinary householder in the street, never mind my hon. Friend, not have problems interpreting it?

The problem is that neither disproportionate nor grossly disproportionate are defined in the law anywhere. There is no case law on it—civil or criminal. There have been no cases under section 329 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which introduced the term into civil law. There is no guidance in the law.

Chris Bryant: I do not know whether my hon. Friend is aware that there are in fact two places in the law where the term grossly disproportionate is used. The other place is schedule 3, paragraph 4 of the Opencast Coal Act 1958, which refers to the estimated cost of the work being "grossly disproportionate to any prospective increase attributable".

Does he accept that the concept of the proportionality is much easier to use when one is attributing financial or some other value, rather than when one is talking about the action of an individual?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. We know that the Bill is about defending property. I will bear in mind your constraints earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and not stray down the highways and byways of other Acts and measures that the House has passed, although those may be the only guidance. It will be interesting to know, if I may say in parenthesis, whether that terminology has ever been interpreted in the courts or whether it simply appears in the statute. If that is so, it will not provide us with any more guidance than we have to start with.

Mr. Flello: Does my hon. Friend envisage a situation where the Association of Chief Police Officers will have to distribute large amounts of leaflets explaining what proportionality, disproportionality and grossly disproportionate mean? Will that not be a tremendous waste of money?

Mr. Dismore: I envisage ACPO having to distribute tomes the size of "Archbold", rather than a leaflet, to explain to people what the new law will be. I have had to trawl through "Archbold" to try to find some definitions. Those will have to be incorporated in the leaflet. My hon. Friend is right: it is important that people are made aware of what the law is. However, I suspect that it would need to be rather bigger than a leaflet. It would be at the very least a thick pamphlet or a tome along the lines of "Archbold" if it is to make clear what the law is, should the Bill go through.

Mr. Khan: If my hon. Friend is suggesting that "Archbold" should be compulsive reading for all citizens, I second that idea. He referred to the fact that, once a defendant raises the issue of self-defence, the burden shifts to the prosecution to prove otherwise. What will the position be in the new context if the Bill, God forbid, is ever passed?

Mr. Dismore: The Bill is silent on that interesting point. In those circumstances, one can only assume that the burden would shift to the defendant from the prosecution, where it is at present. That would create even more confusion. I am surprised that the Bill does not make clear whether the burden will lie on the defence or the prosecution.

Chris Bryant: Does my hon. Friend agree with the journalist who wrote:

"For unlike the current law, where the householder may have to explain why the action he took was reasonable, the person who would need to prove that the force used was 'grossly disproportionate' might well be dead."?

Those are the words of Melanie Phillips in The Daily Mail on 6 December 2004, opposing the previous Bill.

Mr. Dismore: It is interesting to hear such an eminent journalist as Ms Phillips, writing for the newspapers she does and holding the position she normally holds, expressing that view. That shows the real unease felt throughout the country about the Bill's proposals.

Lynne Featherstone: Does the hon. Gentleman agree, information being key, that it would be useful that, rather than either the Bill or Archbold being distributed, a leaflet such as the one which already exists could be distributed to every householder?

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Lady raises an interesting point and an issue canvassed previously when the Bill of the hon. Member for Newark was debated. It is incumbent on the Government to make sure that there is a proper information programme so that people are made aware what the law is. It is also incumbent on them to produce a leaflet in other languages, too, as people from minority communities particularly fear the impact of burglary. For recent arrivals to our shores, the regime of law under which they previously lived may have been a little more anarchic than ours, and it might be important to remind them of exactly what they are or are not entitled to do. I hope that the Minister will be able, should she come to reply to the debate, to pick up that point and say whether the Government intend to distribute the leaflet in a way that makes it accessible to all our citizens, whatever their native tongue.

Mr. Flello: Does my hon. Friend agree that rather than bringing in a vigilante Bill, a better way forward would be to encourage the Home Office and the Inland Revenue, for example, to work together so that small businesses receive just such a leaflet directly with their end-of-year packs?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Although the leaflet is targeted at householders, the same provisions apply to business people, whether they be shop owners or work in an office. The Home Office might well imagine that it would be helpful to ensure that shop owners, about whose fears of people breaking into their shops we have heard much, benefit from a leaflet that would not require greatly to be changed from the existing leaflet, which sets out the position very well. It might require just a change to the title, and shop owners would benefit from it. I hope that the Minister will pick up on that if there is time for her to reply to the debate.

Mr. Khan: I urge caution. My hon. Friend has explained his excellent practice of informing his constituents about their rights, but I urge caution because we must put matters in context. Fewer than 1 per cent. of burglaries are aggravated. Burglaries are also at the lowest level for 20 years. My hon. Friend, as a hard-working constituency MP, will understand that the perception of crime often overtakes the reality, and I would not want us to be carried away and to end up creating more concern among some of our most vulnerable constituents.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend echoes some of the points I made earlier in giving some statistics about the incidence and risk of burglary. The important thing is that the leaflet must reassure people, and can do so in two ways. First, it can reassure them that the prospects of their being the victims of burglary are relatively slight. Secondly, they could be given some information on what they could do to reduce the risk of burglary—for example, the installation of window locks or asking the local police service to make a crime prevention visit. It is important that people know where they stand on these difficult issues. An information leaflet would not be just about telling people what they could do if their home were invaded. It would tell them what they could do to stop their home being invaded in the first place, and to reassure them that the risk of that happening is relatively slight.

Mr. Khan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is grossly irresponsible of opportunist Opposition Members to refer to the one or two stark cases where householders have been prosecuted because of action that they took against intruders?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. If we examine some of the cases, we see a different picture emerging. As we have no definition of "grossly disproportionate", perhaps we should consider some of the cases that have come before the courts and test them against the existing definition and against the "grossly disproportionate" definition.

The research paper from the Library helpfully sets out a number of examples. The Library has gone back almost 20 years in looking for these cases. Having done so, it has produced relatively few. The number of cases that we are dealing with, even under existing law, is relatively small. The first case concerns a Mr. Eric Butler in May 1987. He was charged with malicious wounding after he stabbed a mugger on the underground with a sword stick. That case was withdrawn—it was reasonable force.

Chris Bryant: More importantly, such a case would not be dealt with under the Bill because it was not in a building.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. Going back to the discussion that I had earlier with my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd), it could be argued whether it was or was not a building, depending on whereabouts on the underground it took place.

The second example is the case of Mr. Carrera. In May 1991, he was charged with murder after he was attacked with a knife by a drunken drug mugger. He turned the weapon on his assailant. He was acquitted under the present law of reasonable force.

Mr. Khan: Would my hon. Friend agree that even if the Bill were ever enacted, Mr. Carrera would still face the prospect of investigation and potentially the same outcome, and that the stress that he endured would be the same before and after the Bill's enactment?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. If somebody is dead it is not possible to escape an investigation. I hope to say more about that later.

Mr. Flello: If my hearing serves me well, my hon. Friend referred to a mugger. The offence would not be caught under the Bill, because the offence took place outside a building, not within it.

Mr. Dismore: Absolutely.

Another case was that of Mr. Tony Evans, who in June 1993 shot an intruder. Presumably that was inside a building. He used a small-bore shotgun. He was not prosecuted because it was considered that he had exercised reasonable force.

There was the case of Mr. Williamson, in August—

Mr. Khan: Before my hon. Friend leaves the case of Tony Evans, may I refer him to what Mr. Evans said? He accepted that the police could not condone what he had done. He said:

"They had to act. It could lead to a vicious circle if everyone starts arming themselves to shoot at burglars. The burglars may start arming themselves and then the police and before we know it we may be living in a gun society."

Does my hon. Friend agree with those comments?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is correct. Mr. Evans says it all. We heard earlier the hon. Member for Newark quoting a burglar supporting the Bill. He had been shot in the buttocks. Mr. Evans, the victim of the attack, was saying that the existing law is correct and that police behaviour was correct in investigating him. He was not even prosecuted, because it was felt that he had responded with reasonable force.

Chris Bryant: Is not one of the sadnesses of the procedure that we have had to go through the fact that some Conservative Members have sought to suggest that we should try to restrict any investigation, prosecution or procedures towards prosecution in nearly every case? Sir Nicholas Lyell, the then Attorney-General, told the House following the Tony Evans case that any shooting incident must be carefully investigated. Surely that is the truth.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Sir Nicholas was a Conservative Member.

The next case is that of a Mr. Williamson. In August 1994, he disturbed a burglar and stabbed him in the neck with a kitchen knife. He was not prosecuted because it was considered that that was reasonable force.

Then there is the case of Mr. Lyon, who was cleared of attempted murder and wounding after firing his shotgun at a man he thought was about to burgle his allotment shed. He was convicted of a lesser charge of unlawful wounding, but the Bill would have given him no help because he was not defending a building within the Theft Act definition. Even under the Bill, that would still be considered grossly disproportionate force bearing in mind the action that he took in the situation that he faced, a context similar to that in the Tony Martin case.

John Pritchett was cleared of wounding two burglars who had broken into his wine store after he opened fire on them with a 12-bore shotgun. He shot them, but it was reasonable force.

In November 1995, Mr. Richards shot at a thief who was fleeing into trees with the intention of scaring him off. He was cleared under the existing law of reasonable force but I suspect that the Bill would not help him because the incident did not occur in a building and he was not acting in self-defence or to protect property but to scare people off.

In January 1996, David Kent was cleared after shooting a suspected burglar in the neck. Mr. Kent told the court that he feared for his life when he fired his shotgun after the assailant lunged at him. He was cleared under the reasonable force law. I will not go into the facts of the Tony Martin case because they have been explained in great detail today, but the hon. Members for Newark and for Vale of York and every Conservative Member have said that even under the Bill Tony Martin would have been dealt with, so they cannot pray that case in aid.

Kenneth Hall shot a thief who was stealing from his car. He was acquitted in 1996. That was reasonable force, but, more importantly, it was not in a building and would therefore not have been covered by the Bill.

In March 1998, Ted Newbery shot and injured an intruder through the door of his allotment shed. He was acquitted under reasonable force and would not have gained any protection from the Bill because it was not a building.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend has reeled off a series of cases in which a jury has concluded that a defendant was not guilty. Given that juries are selected from a pool of ordinary citizens, does he agree that most householders, like juries, have common sense and know what is reasonable?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right in saying that juries have a lot of common sense, but many of the cases that I am describing never even got that far. They had to be investigated by the police, but the individuals concerned were either not charged or, if they were, had their cases dropped. Most cases did not go to a jury.

In the case of Mr. Davenport, two masked men with a hammer went to his home at midnight to attack him. He said that he was frightened for his life and stabbed and killed one of them. He was acquitted by a jury under reasonable force, but I think that the prosecution was properly brought in the circumstances of the case.

In October 2002, Mr. Barry-Lee Hastings killed a burglar. The burglar was stabbed 12 times in the back and Mr. Hastings was convicted of manslaughter. On the face of it, he was not acting in self-defence and what he did would probably be considered grossly disproportionate, so he would have had no help from the Bill.

In June 2003, Mr. O'Connor, an elderly blind man, stabbed and killed an intruder breaking into his home. He was not charged, under reasonable force.

Jim Dowd: My hon. Friend says that the Bill would not apply, but new subsection (1A) uses the words

"Where a person uses force in the prevention of crime".

Could it not be held that someone who shot dead a habitual burglar was preventing future crime?

Mr. Dismore: That is not the issue. The problem is that these people were not in buildings, and if they were not in a building they could not have relied on this defence. My hon. Friend makes an important point, but I think that prevention of crime here refers to crime in the immediate circumstances rather than to a burglar committing a crime next week or next month.

Mr. Faulkner, another example from 2004, was a 73-year-old farmer who shot a burglar after he had been broken into three times. The judge said that he could not be criticised for the way in which he defended his property. He was not prosecuted because he had the reasonable force defence. Mr. Cook, in a case from August 2003, used a hockey stick to beat up a group of late-night revellers who attacked his wife outside the family home. He was acquitted under the reasonable force rules, but because the incident did not take place in a building, he would not have been able to pray the Bill in aid in any case.

There is also the case of Linda Walker in March 2005. This was the famous case of a special needs teacher who defended herself heroically. She fired an air pistol at a group of youths who were terrorising her, but she was imprisoned because, under the old rules, it was not considered to be self-defence. As it took place outside her property and not in a building, the Bill could not have helped her. That is one case that might be on the borderline between "disproportionate" and "grossly disproportionate", but because the event happened in a building, she would not have benefited from the Bill in any case.

Mr. Flello: As my hon. Friend says, in that case, it is possible that the "grossly disproportionate" rules might apply, but how do we know? The thinking behind "grossly disproportionate" is so woolly that we have no idea of knowing whether it would work or not.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right, but I am just trying to do the best I can by applying a little common sense to the definitions.

The promoters have constructed a whole superstructure to suggest that a change in the law is necessary to protect people in certain circumstances, but the examples that I have cited prove that their case is fallacious. In all those cases, people were either not charged or acquitted under existing law. In some cases, the new defence provided by the Bill would not apply because the events happened outside a building. In other cases, they would have fallen foul of the new law because the force used was excessive. I do not understand what the hon. Member for Vale of York would gain, should the House see fit to give her Bill a Second Reading today.

On 13 January 2005, the Crown Prosecution Service issued a press release, listing other examples of cases where people were not prosecuted. There was a robbery at a newsagent in Greater Manchester where one of two robbers died after being stabbed by the newsagent, but the CPS did not prosecute. A householder, who returned home to find a burglar there struggled against him and hit him on the head. The burglar later died, but no prosecution resulted from that case in Derbyshire. Armed robbers threatened a pub landlord and barmaid. The barmaid escaped, fetched her employer's shotgun and shot one of the intruders. She was not prosecuted in that case from Hertfordshire.

Two burglars entered a household with a knife and threatened a woman. Her husband overcame one of the burglars and stabbed him. The burglar died, but there was no prosecution in that case from Lincolnshire. A middle-aged female took a baseball bat off a burglar and hit him over the head with it, fracturing his skull. The burglar actually made a complaint, but the CPS refused to prosecute in that case from Lancashire. All those cases—the sort of cases for which the Bill provides protection—were perfectly adequately dealt with under the existing law of defence of reasonable force.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend has provided five further examples of where the decision was taken not to prosecute. Some Opposition Members have argued that using the Attorney-General as a safeguard for prosecutions would provide greater certainty, but is it not the case that clarity in the law is what people need? Is it not more important than having a Law Officer take a decision on a prosecution?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes two interesting points. First, he stresses the need for clarity in the law, which we have debated extensively today. However, the matter of whether the prosecution should be cleared by the Attorney-General is one aspect of the Bill for which I have some sympathy. In fact, there are very few cases under existing law where the Attorney-General's intervention would arise, but it could be a useful safeguard if a prosecution follows. I hope to return to that issue later in my remarks.

Chris Bryant: I wonder whether that is right. Is it right to put very high-profile cases, covered by the national media, on a politician's desk for a decision on whether a prosecution should proceed? Is that really what we want?

Mr. Dismore: I see the force of my hon. Friend's argument, but in such circumstances the Attorney-General would be acting as a Law Officer, not as a politician. Perhaps a better way forward is to suggest that the decision be taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions personally—an alternative that would probably achieve the same objective.

For completeness, the CPS gave a number of examples of people actually being prosecuted. In one case, a man laid in wait on commercial premises for a burglar, caught him, tied him up, beat him up, threw him into a pit and set fire to him. That is probably grossly disproportionate, and the individual concerned would not, I suspect, find a defence under the Bill.

Mr. Flello: But would that be grossly disproportionate under the Bill; where does it state that?

Mr. Dismore: The Bill does not state that, but common sense tells us that such an action would be regarded as grossly disproportionate.

In the second case cited by the CPS, several people trespassed on to private land to go night-fishing. They were approached by a man with a shotgun who threatened to shoot them. They ran away, but one was shot in the back with 40 shotgun pellets. Again, that was probably grossly disproportionate; moreover, the Bill would have offered no protection in such an incident because it took place outside. In a third case, a householder laid in wait for a burglar who tried to burgle his shed, and shot him in the back. That is the "Tony Martin circumstance", which, as we know, given the concessions already made by Opposition Members, would amount to grossly disproportionate force.

The question then arises of why we need to change the law of self-defence in the first place. I suggest that we do not. The law is clear and we have to have consistency in the law; having different tests for different circumstances is fraught with danger. We have already discussed what would happen when such incidents occur in, and outside, buildings; and, for example, whether a dormobile constitutes a building. I mentioned earlier the example of a security guard taking such action on a building site. As it stands it would constitute reasonable force, but if he is in the construction hut, the question arises as to whether the hut constitutes a building—a marginal point. If it is on completed premises, it probably constitutes a building. Would he have the nous to work out when he can and cannot use the defence provided in this Bill? What about allotments and garden sheds? Clearly, the allotment itself is not a building; the garden shed may or may not be, depending on the size of the structure.

What about people who are attacked who are not in any form of building? The victim of a street mugging could use only reasonable force. We know that a phone box is not a building, because there is case law to that effect. The victim of a phone box mugging could defend himself with nothing other than reasonable force. Such an incident could easily happen, because as we know, a lot of drug deals are done in phone boxes.

Dr. Palmer: I realise that my hon. Friend is in danger of running low on time, but I want to mention one issue that has yet to be stressed. The general public take separate views on the danger of excessive injury to a criminal, and on the danger of any injury to an innocent party or to someone who has committed a very minor act of trespass. Does my hon. Friend not think it important to stress that the Bill as drafted poses a risk of excessive over-reaction to someone who commits an actual offence, and of grievous harm to someone who has done no real harm?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a very interesting point. My main concern is that, one way or the other, the Bill would lead to an inevitable escalation of violence, rather than a diminution, as its proponents would have us believe.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend has explained the Bill's inconsistency in respect of the approaches taken by victims of crimes against property, and by those who have been mugged in the street. However, is there not a more fundamentally offensive aspect of the Bill? Victims of crimes against their person—those who are raped in a park or assaulted in a public place, for example—would have fewer rights and less protection under the Bill than the victims of crimes against property in the household.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. Indeed, that was to have been my next point. How can we distinguish between the victim of a rape in a park who is allowed to use only reasonable force against her assailant and the victims of rape in other circumstances, inside a building that could be a public place, such as a tube station or a shopping centre—attacks have occurred in both—or the victim's own home? In one case the victim would be allowed to use disproportionate force to defend herself, whereas if she was raped in a park, in an open space, she could not. That cannot be right. How can we explain to women what they can or cannot do to defend themselves if we have to say that it depends on where they are attacked? That is ludicrous.

Chris Bryant: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend. I urge him to agree yet again with Melanie Phillips, who wrote in the Daily Mail:

"After all, 'grossly disproportionate' tells householders that they can use 'disproportionate' force with impunity"

Is not that the fundamental problem? Changing the law as the Bill proposes would ratchet up violence by both burglars and their victims.

Mr. Dismore: Exactly. It is interesting that one can agree with that eminent journalist twice in an afternoon.

Mr. Khan: Does my hon. Friend agree that we must ensure that our hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) has better reading matter for his spare time?

Mr. Dismore: One always has to look at the views of the opposition in newspapers such as the Daily Mail and The Mail on Sunday. On this occasion, my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda is to be congratulated on his reading material.

Mr. Khan: For research purposes.

Mr. Dismore: Indeed.

The problems posed by the Bill go beyond the position of the victim. What about the good Samaritan rescuer? In trying to prevent a crime, the rescuer could find themselves in an extremely difficult position. The circumstances would be different depending on whether they were inside or outside a building and whether force was disproportionate. The measure would create significant difficulties.

After going through all that material, my view is that we would do better to leave well alone, while making sure that people are aware of their rights under existing law.

Jim Dowd: In summary, this is the worst type of legislative change. As my hon. Friend has demonstrated, not only would it be largely ineffective, but where it was effective it would be counterproductive, so the Bill does not have much merit.

Mr. Dismore: I have to agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Khan: I am troubled by the fact that my hon. Friend may not have time to deal with the European convention on human rights. Given the other hat he wears, I should be interested to hear his views on the compatibility of article 2, the right to life, article 3, the right not to suffer inhumane and degrading treatment and article 8, the right to privacy and family. What are his views about the findings of the previous Joint Committee on Human Rights? Will he share his experience and expertise in those issues?

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. I promised him that I would cover those points, and although I really wanted to work through a lot more material relating to the Bill before I did so, I am inclined to indulge him. I do not know whether I have sufficient time in the seven minutes left for the debate to deal fully with and give full justification for the human rights arguments, but I will give it a go.

Chris Bryant: Important as those issues are, will my hon. Friend deal with one more point before he moves on to them? I think that he has said six times that people would have only the defence of reasonable force, which seems to suggest that such force would not be substantial. In fact, the Law Commission, referring to partial defences to murder, stated:

"We acknowledge that such a person, though genuinely acting in fear, might not always act 'reasonably' so as to attract the full defence of self-defence."

In other words, one can go quite a long way and it is important that we get that point across to the public.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right. Some of the examples that were given earlier make that clear. Victims gave tough responses, even including the death of the assailant. In all the cases to which I referred the victim was either not prosecuted or was cleared.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting has been waiting with bated breath for some time for my views on the Human Rights Act 1998. I will indulge him, although I had hoped to deal with the matter in a more structured way later in my speech. I speak in this context as the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, although I was not the Chairman when the Committee produced its two reports on this subject.

Our starting point when considering this serious matter must be part I of schedule 1 to the Human Rights Act. One of the rights and freedoms under the convention is article 2, which is titled "Right to life". There would be a possible cross-reference to article 8 and the UN convention on the rights of the child if the alleged criminal were a child. I will not go down the route of the UN convention because we have insufficient time, but that convention would cause the promoter of the Bill additional problems.

If the Bill were a Government Bill, the Minister would have had to certify that it was human rights compliant. As it is a private Member's Bill, however, it does not have to go through that process. I would be surprised if the hon. Member for Vale of York had made any effort to check the position of the Bill under the legislation. If the Bill were found not to be compliant with the Human Rights Act or the European convention on human rights, our courts could certify that the Bill was incompatible. If that happened, we would simply end up back here having the debate all over again. We would turn the law back to where we started because that would be required of us under the 1998 Act.

Mr. Khan: Bearing in mind what my hon. Friend says and the fact that the mischief that Opposition Members are trying to prevent is clarity, how would a court interpret a Bill that was incompatible with the Human Rights Act?

Mr. Dismore: A judge could merely issue a certificate of incompatibility. We would be back here straight away and we would have to debate a new Bill to put the law back to where we started. However, that gives rise to the question of whether the Bill would be incompatible, so perhaps I can address that matter now as we are running a little short of time.

Article 2 says:

"Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law."

It goes on to deal with defending people from unlawful violence.

Mr. Flello: Does my hon. Friend agree that the reasonable force defence in existing law gives the victims of crime the right to enjoy their property and live their lives without the need for this nonsense vigilante Bill?

Mr. Dismore: Absolutely. That is also protected by other parts of the convention and the Human Rights Act.

The Joint Committee on Human Rights has examined the matter on two occasions, first in the context of the Criminal Justice (Justifiable Conduct) Bill, which the hon. Member for North Thanet introduced in 2004. The Committee reached the firm conclusion that the Bill would not be compliant with our obligations under human rights law.

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend might have read press reports about the wish of some members of Her Majesty's official Opposition to withdraw from the convention, which would obviously allow them to pass the Bill. Is he aware of the implications of withdrawal from the convention for the status of a member of the Council of Europe?

Mr. Dismore: Unless a specific derogation were allowed, we could not continue as a member of the Council of Europe if we were not signed up to the convention.

Mr. Khan: Will my hon. Friend confirm my understanding of the convention, which is that countries cannot derogate from articles 2 and 3?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As I was saying, unless there were a permitted derogation, a Government or country who wished to withdraw from those provisions would either have to leave the Council of Europe, or be thrown out of it.

The Joint Committee on Human Rights scrutinised the Bill of the hon. Member for North Thanet in its 23rd report of Session 2003–04. It said:

"This Bill would remove the deterrent effect of the criminal law in relation to murder, manslaughter and assault, amongst other offences . . . In removing the deterrent of the criminal law in this way, the Bill would in our view breach positive obligations to protect Convention rights to life and physical integrity. We consider that the Bill would be unlikely to be capable of interpretation"—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Secondary Schools (Wellingborough)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I would like to thank the Speaker for granting me the opportunity to hold a debate on an issue of immense importance to my constituency. I am also grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Corby (Phil Hope), who will respond to the debate. I am pleased that half of the Members who represent Northamptonshire are in the Chamber, as well as my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski), who is concerned about the issue.

Secondary school provision in Wellingborough has been a huge concern for many years, as I will explain. I am grateful to all the teachers in my constituency, who do a tremendous job in circumstances that are not always ideal. I give them my praise and thanks for the superb job that they do. I should also like to place on the record my praise for the pupils and students who attend Wellingborough schools. They, too, face difficult conditions but, together with the help of their teachers, they work extremely hard to achieve their individual goals.

The problem with secondary school provision in Wellingborough has been apparent for many years, ever since the closure and demolition of a local secondary school in 2001. The John Lea secondary school was closed in 1998 by the Labour-run county council, which thought that there were enough secondary school places in Wellingborough for local children. How wrong it was. John Lea secondary school was a modern school with good buildings and facilities. At the time, there was widespread fear that the closure of the school would leave the remaining schools in Wellingborough oversubscribed, and would leave some children without any education at all. Despite that fear, the school was demolished in 2001 to make way for new homes for new families. Those families, of course, had children who required secondary school education.

Let us be honest: the closure and demolition of John Lea was meant to make money, yet that money has never gone back into secondary education in Wellingborough. I was not living in Wellingborough when John Lea was closed—I moved there shortly afterwards. However, I was living there when the decision was made to demolish the school. Along with many others, I fought to save the school with my "Listening to Wellingborough" campaign. I founded that campaign because I felt that too many politicians of all parties had become arrogant and out of touch. They were more than happy to preach to people, but were not prepared to listen. My "Listening to Wellingborough" campaign aims to seek the views of local people, groups and organisations and to campaign on their behalf for change.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bone: I shall first make a little progress, if I may.

I listen to local people at every opportunity through surveys, public meetings, visiting residents and people coming to me. They were crying out for someone to listen to their views and concerns, and then do something about them. I spoke to many worried parents who were very concerned about the effects of the closure of John Lea school. As part of my listening campaign, I started SOS—"Save Our Secondary Schools." I could see, like many others, that the closure and demolition of a local secondary school would have a hugely detrimental effect on secondary education in Wellingborough.

We campaigned against the demolition of the school. We went door to door seeking the views of local people, and we distributed numerous leaflets informing local residents of the proposals. The then leader of the Conservative party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), and the shadow Secretary of State for Education at the time, my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), both came to Wellingborough to give their support to the SOS campaign. Chris Heaton-Harris MEP petitioned the European Parliament on behalf of parents from Earls Barton, a community in Wellingborough, whose children were being denied a secondary school place. Yet despite all our efforts, the decision was made by the Labour-run county council to demolish John Lea school, and in 2001 the school was no more.

One of the biggest oversights that was made in this case was that no one took into consideration just how much Wellingborough was due to grow in the coming years. The oversight has had a devastating effect on school provision and school choice, and the effects are still being felt.

Daniel Kawczynski: My hon. Friend describes the problem in Wellingborough as acute, and I am grateful that he has brought it to the attention of the House. The problem is also significant in rural areas, particularly in some of the villages near Shrewsbury. One such case is Grafton school—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The debate is specifically about Wellingborough.

Mr. Bone: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention, and I accept his general point about the provision for rural areas. Many people think of Wellingborough as an urban area, but Earls Barton, for example, is a rural village from which children have to travel miles to get to a school.

When John Lea was closed, it was noted by the local authority that although there would be enough secondary school places for pupils transferring from primary schools, there could be further difficulties ahead if extra children were to move into the area. In fact, after the closure of John Lea school, all the remaining secondary schools in Wellingborough were oversubscribed and crowded.

Some children had to be bussed outside the county to go to school. Some parents paid for their children to go to a private school. Some parents started to educate their children at home. Some families even moved away from the area to get their children into a school. Most worryingly of all, some children were left at home without any education at all. In April 2001, there were 21 pupils who were forced to stay at home because of a lack of school places. Some of those children had been without any education for up to six months. In short, although many children were not getting the education that they deserved, a worrying number were not getting any education at all.

Some of the children denied a school place were at a critical stage before their GCSE examinations. How could an education authority and a Government leave children at home with no education at all? Had it been the other way round, and had parents been deliberately not sending their children to school, the LEA would have come down on them like a tonne of bricks. Sarah Robertson, who was 15 at the time, was at a critical stage in her education, with exams imminent, yet she had been without a school place for almost six months. I met many worried parents who did not know which way to turn because of the failure of the Labour-controlled local authority, and I met pupils who were bored and frustrated by being stuck at home. If that had been a one-off incident, it would have been bad enough, but it has happened time and again because of the closure of the school. In a subsequent year, another large group of children were left at home for weeks on end without any education at all.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this afternoon's debate. As the Member of Parliament for the neighbouring constituency of Kettering, may I say that I share his concerns? I put it to him that one of the major themes in our combined local area is that we face the prospect of 52,000 new houses being built in north Northamptonshire by 2021, while existing educational provision is not sufficient for the current population.

Mr. Bone: I know how hard my hon. Friend works on behalf of his constituents. I feel a little guilty that secondary school children from Wellingborough are being bussed into Kettering because provision in Wellingborough is insufficient. I shall address his second point later in my speech.

What was the solution proposed by the local authority and the Government? They decided to force already overcrowded schools to take even more pupils, which damaged the education not only of the pupils forced into those schools, but of all those already there. That should not have been allowed to happen, but unfortunately some children still do not have a school place. Since 2001, there has been a huge amount of growth in my constituency with many, many new families, whose children require secondary school places, moving into the area.

Over the past four years, there has been an explosion of new development in my constituency, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) has referred, and it is set to get much, much worse, with thousands of new homes being built on the order of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The Milton Keynes south midlands sub-regional strategy will see 13,000 new homes being built in Wellingborough by 2021, with another 10,000 homes planned for east Northamptonshire, large parts of which are in my constituency. Yet despite the knowledge that those new homes will be built, the Government have not indicated whether the infrastructure will be in place to support new and existing Wellingborough residents and their children.

[Mr. Bone]

Turning to the problems that we face at the moment, there are currently four secondary schools in Wellingborough—three are foundation schools and one is a community school. I have been told that in Wellingborough between nine and 10 children a month find themselves without a secondary school place and must go through a lengthy process in order to get into a school. For example, a parent came to see me at my surgery last Friday. Mr. Hussein moved back into Wellingborough after being away for two years. He has two children, one of 17 and one of 12. The 17-year-old had previously been educated at a secondary school in Wellingborough, but that school could not re-admit her because it is now over-subscribed. The other child could not get into a secondary school near where they live, and both children were told that they had to go on a waiting list, so they are currently at home with no education at all.

I have spoken to the local education authority, which will do its best to get those children into a school. However, the process that it uses to place nine or 10 children a month involves a meeting which occurs only once a month and which can only occur after the LEA has been made aware of the situation. It is quite possible that such children will be without any education for three months. Do the Government think that that would be the case if one of Wellingborough's secondary schools had not been knocked down?

The LEA claims that some secondary school places are available in Wellingborough, but those places are all at the only school in Wellingborough that is in special measures. For many families moving into Wellingborough, there is no choice whatever—no matter where they live and no matter how far away they are from the school, they must go to the school that is in special measures. That situation is unacceptable, because there must be choice—parents should have some choice in what school their children go to. I note with interest that the Government's education White Paper advocates parental choice, which is welcome, but unfortunately it is just not happening in my constituency.

Even those pupils coming from primary schools in Wellingborough are limited for choice. At the Wrenn school last year, there were 280 applicants for 250 year 7 places. Twenty-six people appealed, but only three of those appellants were able to get a place at the school. That means that the school is already, in year 7, three pupils over the number that it considers to be its maximum admission level. The admissions system allows parents to put down a first, second and third choice of schools in Wellingborough, but if their children do not get their first-choice place, they are extremely unlikely to get their second choice, because those will already have been filled.

It is natural that every parent wants their child to go to the best possible school, and inevitable that some schools are better than others, but the most popular schools in my constituency are constantly oversubscribed and struggle with the limited capacity of their school buildings. Let me take one as an example. It is extremely popular and high-achieving. Only 208 places in each year group are available because of the restrictions of building capacity. In fact, the school now has to operate a one-way system on the stairs because the corridors are so full. It is having to use up its reserves to pay for essential maintenance. There is damp on the walls in some of the classrooms and condensation on the windows. This popular and high-achieving school needs Government funding to allow it to remain so. It is simply not big enough, and parts of it are literally falling down.

When I asked the Minister whether provision was being made to build a new secondary school in Wellingborough, I received a written answer stating that as part of the building schools for the future programme, Northamptonshire schools are due to be refurbished or rebuilt over the next six to 14 years. Six to fourteen years? This work needs to be carried out now.

In response to a second question that I asked about a new secondary school in Wellingborough, the Minister said that the Wellingborough area of Northamptonshire is prioritised towards the end of the building schools for the future programme. Apart from the obvious paradox that nothing is prioritised if it is at the end of a list, that means that, three times over, year 7 students could start secondary school and go through the whole of their secondary education before the existing Wellingborough schools are refurbished, yet those schools are in desperate need of repair now.

There is currently no real choice for parents and children in Wellingborough. If children are not granted their first choice of school, they are rarely granted their second choice. The only pupils who seem to have a real choice of school are those with special educational needs. That is most welcome, but although it is important that statemented children should be able to go to the school that parents believe will cater best for the children's needs, it is equally important that the right funding and resources are put into these schools to help facilitate SEN pupils throughout their schooling. I do not believe that that is happening in Wellingborough.

Schools in Wellingborough are oversubscribed and some have been forced to take on extra pupils over their maximum intakes. At Wollaston school, years 7 and 9 are over the 240 maximum. At the Wrenn school years 7, 8 and 10 have more pupils than the 250 maximum. Last year, Sir Christopher Hatton school was oversubscribed by more than 40 pupils who put it down as their first choice.

It is clear from what I have said today that Wellingborough needs a new secondary school, and given the huge increase in development over the next 15 years, we need it now. I ask the Minister to be good enough to deal with the following points. First, what are the mechanisms necessary to get a new secondary school built? Secondly, when can we realistically expect a new secondary school in Wellingborough to be opened? Thirdly, in the intervening period, will he undertake to look at providing more funding so that existing schools can expand for the benefit of all the pupils in Wellingborough?

I believe that the demolition of John Lea school may have been a genuine mistake, but it is essential that the Government, working with the local education authority, take urgent action to correct the situation.

2.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) on securing this debate. I am aware of his interest in this issue from the parliamentary questions that he has tabled in the past.

Changes to school provision in an area are essentially a matter for local decision. The local authority has a statutory responsibility for planning sufficient school places and for proposing to close schools and to open new ones. These duties are further strengthened in the schools White Paper, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, and I shall say more about that later if time allows.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the relevant mechanisms, and I will start by talking about the present school organisation arrangements and why they came about. Before this Government took office in 1997, proposals for changes to schools often came to the Secretary of State for a decision. We considered that those matters were best decided locally, however, and a new system was put in place by the School Standards and Framework Act 1998.

If a local authority decides that there is a need for a new school, it must first consult in the local area. Among those bodies that we advise should be consulted are any schools affected by the proposals, as well as parents and teachers in the area. I am pleased to say that the guidance was revised in September, when local Members of Parliament were added to the list, as were the local district and parish councils in the area in which the schools are situated. Local authorities are responsible for planning for school places in their area. They have a statutory duty to ensure that there are sufficient places and that high quality education is provided in a cost-effective way.

I understand that Northamptonshire updated its school organisation plan in September this year. The new plan shows that the authority expects the number of secondary pupils in Wellingborough to increase gradually between now and 2008. However, there are at present 425 surplus places in the town. I shall come back to that point in more detail in a moment. In the longer term, a new secondary school might be required, and if Northamptonshire decides that such a school is needed to cater for a growth in the local population, the mechanism requires it to hold a competition in accordance with the provisions of the Education Act 2002. We have introduced competitions because we want to encourage a wide range of educational providers to come forward and promote schools that have a strong ethos. This is all part of our aim to drive up standards and to ensure that every child has the opportunity to go to a good school.

As the hon. Gentleman has asked, I shall explain what would happen should Northamptonshire decide to hold a competition. First, the authority would publish a notice inviting interested parties to bring forward proposals for the new secondary school. The authority would then publish a summary of all the proposals received and any that it wished to make itself, as the local authority. Anyone would be able to pass comments on any of the proposals, be they objections or expressions of support. The authority would then submit all proposals and comments to the school organisation committee for consideration. The committee would pass the proposals, with its comments, to the Secretary of State for a decision.

Of course, any promoter may publish proposals for a new foundation or voluntary school at any time, under the existing arrangements, to increase diversity. There does not need to be a general shortage of places. Such proposals are decided by the school organisation committee, or by the schools adjudicator if the committee cannot reach unanimous agreement. The committee may approve proposals only if it is satisfied that any capital necessary to implement the proposals has been secured. I hope that I have described the mechanism in a straightforward manner.

Under the normal funding arrangements, the Department for Education and Skills is allocating Northamptonshire schools more than £78 million of capital over the next three years. We expect that money to be used for its priority needs, including the provision of statutory school places. It includes an element to cover pupil number increases. However, local authorities can also apply to the targeted capital fund—the TCF—every two years, if they have exceptional growth that they cannot fund from other sources.

Northamptonshire has been allocated £12 million from the TCF for 2006–07 for a replacement school in another part of the county where it is prioritising need. Northamptonshire did not apply in the TCF round for 2007–08 funding. It will have a further opportunity in due course to apply for 2008–09 funding.

On the revenue side, Northamptonshire has benefited from an increase in its total funding for education of £1,100 per pupil in real terms since 1997. We will announce in the near future the school funding settlement for 2006–07 and 2007–08, including each local authority's allocations of the new dedicated schools grant for each of those years.

In the longer term, the building schools for the future programme—a massive investment in schooling—will support investment in all secondary schools in Northamptonshire, including new schools, where there is a need. Northamptonshire is expected to enter the building schools for the future programme in waves seven to nine—2011–14—with projects in Northampton and Corby. It has proposed five geographical groupings of schools for its building schools for the future investment. Wellingborough, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, is prioritised in the final tranche of investment in waves 13 to 15, in 2017–18.

I want to set out the detail of the local position that the hon. Gentleman described. I understand that since the closure of the John Lea school more than seven years ago in July 1998, Wellingborough has been served by three secondary schools. The John Lea school was closed because the number of pupils on the roll fell below 50, with more than 90 per cent. surplus places, and funding empty places, as we know, can represent a poor use of resources. The three remaining schools—Sir Christopher Hatton, the Weavers school and Wrenn school—now have 425 spare places between them.

I am aware—and the hon. Gentleman mentioned—that the Weavers school has been in special measures since November 2004. In conjunction with Ofsted, the authority is addressing that. The new head teacher is helping the process and two additional school governors have been appointed to provide additional support. The local authority is also supporting the school, and there have been discussions with Department for Education and Skills advisers about how that can most effectively be done The Department has partnered Northamptonshire and Lincolnshire for the new relationship with schools. Each school will be allocated a school improvement partner, who are mostly experienced head teachers and senior managers in schools. They will provide high-quality support, challenge and monitoring. Given the hon. Gentleman's concern about the quality of education at that school and its current position, I advise him strongly to get active and join the school and local authority in finding ways in which the school can turn the situation around.

On the question of growth, which has been raised by the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members in the Chamber, the authority is confident that recent enlargements to its secondary schools will provide sufficient capacity to meet future demand for places in the medium term. In the longer term, Northamptonshire might decide that a new secondary school will be required to cater for growth in the local population, but that will be a decision for Northamptonshire at a local level. I understand that there are no current plans to open a further secondary school in Wellingborough, but the local authority will monitor that situation and the progress with growth projections, which he mentioned earlier.

I have described the situation that pertains to date, so I shall briefly mention some of the changes that we propose in the White Paper, which might have some future relevance to the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman. Building on the progress that we have made since 1997, our aim is to transform our school system, so that every child receives an excellent education, whatever their background and wherever they live.

The White Paper sets out our plans to improve radically the system by putting parents and the needs of their children at the heart of our school system. We will ensure that every school delivers an excellent education, that every child achieves to their potential and that the system as a whole is increasingly driven by parents and by choice.

We are going to introduce tougher rules for failing schools. Schools in special measures will be more quickly turned around and where no progress is made after a year a competition for new providers will be held. Schools that receive a notice to improve from Ofsted will enter special measures within a year if progress is not made. Parents will be able to urge Ofsted action, or request new providers. Where there is strong demand or dissatisfaction with existing choices, local authorities will have to respond to their concerns.

Time does not allow me to go into more detail unfortunately, but there is a new approach, in particular with the abolition of school organisation committees, which gives local authorities a key role in making decisions on the most appropriate schools for an area. The authority will be expected to assess proposals that it receives on their merits and approve the one that best meets the needs of the area. Under the new regime, it will be possible for a local authority's decision to be challenged, in which case the schools adjudicator will make a decision.

I hope that I have described the mechanisms, outlined some of the factors that will affect a decision in terms of timing—

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Violent Crime

1. Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): What measures he is taking to tackle violent crime. [33819]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): Violent crime as measured under the British crime survey has fallen by 34 per cent. since 1997, but it is still too high, so the Government are undertaking a full range of work that will continue to reduce it. They include measures in the Violent Crime Reduction Bill, which is currently before Parliament. Those measures will give police and local communities the powers that they need to tackle guns, knives and alcohol-related violence.

Mike Penning: The Home Secretary will not have cheered up any of my constituents with that short and complacent comment. Drink abuse has made my town centre a no-go area. My excellent police force is doing its level best to control the situation, but extending licensing hours and abolishing the Hertfordshire constabulary is not the answer. Can the Home Secretary come up with something better?

Mr. Clarke: There is no complacency at all. Our measures, including those in the Violent Crime Reduction Bill, are designed to strengthen our capacity to deal with violent crime. As for the reorganisation of the constabulary, it is a means of conveying more resources to the front line, where they are really needed.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): Crime in Middlesbrough is down by 20 per cent., thanks to the great leadership of chief constable Sean Price and the Cleveland police. Like the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning), however, I find that problems in the town centre are serious at times and take up a large amount of resources. Has my right hon. Friend any words of encouragement? Can he give Middlesbrough any financial support so that we can tackle the difficult issue of violent crime, which is definitely on the increase?

Mr. Clarke: I can certainly give words of encouragement. Announcements on police funding will be made later today. Moreover, the Violent Crime Reduction Bill contains measures requiring organisations in alcohol disorder zones which are putting pressure on police resources to contribute to the cost of resolving the problems. That is a new departure, and one that is very welcome.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Tackling violent crime is a major concern in North Shropshire. Is the Home Secretary aware that 88 per cent. of the first 3,000 people to reply to the survey in West Mercia wanted the authority to be strengthened as a strategic authority? Would it not be wise for him to talk to the chief constable directly? May I bring the chief constable to see him to discuss violent crime, and to explain that an enhanced West Mercia—not the ludicrous crashing through of a regional authority that only 12 per cent. of people want—represents the way ahead?

Mr. Clarke: My ministerial colleagues and I have frequently discussed those matters with chief constables and with chairs of police authorities, including the chair and chief constable of West Mercia. The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to concern in West Mercia about proposals for a merger with other forces, which has been expressed to me directly. I intend to wait for the conclusions reached by the police following the consultation before deciding how to proceed.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): Millions of women experience crimes of violence. They are beaten, raped, mutilated, murdered and trafficked. I hope that my right hon. Friend will support the "Stop Violence Against Women" campaign. Will he also promote the extension of sexual assault referral centres such as Millfield House, the result of an initiative launched by Derbyshire constabulary and Derbyshire Rape Crisis? It has provided 230 counselling sessions and 100 medical examinations following sexual assaults. Does my right hon. Friend think that such centres may help us to improve on the 5.3 per cent. rate of convictions following prosecutions for rape?

Mr. Clarke: I strongly support the campaign. I also support the centres, whose number we have recently doubled.

My hon. Friend's fundamental point is about giving every individual, particularly women, confidence to deal effectively with these appalling crimes, properly supported by the police. That is the relationship that we must develop, which is why I take amiss some of the ill-informed political sloganising that surrounds some kinds of violent crime. We are trying to ensure that those crimes are reported and dealt with, through the means described by my hon. Friend.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Should action on violent crime not include proper support for victims? Can the Home Secretary explain why victims of violent crime are having to wait more than four years for payments from the criminal injuries compensation scheme in Glasgow?

Mr. Clarke: Certainly, action on violent crime should include proper support. I agree that there are a number of unacceptable delays in payments from the scheme.

The Government intend to publish later this week detailed proposals for consultation on how we might improve the agency's performance and focus resources more effectively.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Home Secretary aware that in Derbyshire—quite remarkably—crime has fallen in nearly every category for several years running since Labour came to power? The reason is the extra money that has been provided. Would it not be even better, especially in areas where the drug culture is prominent, if Members of Parliament—especially those over there on the Conservative Benches—stopped giving examples of people taking drugs, and others shoving that white stuff up their noses?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend makes his point extremely effectively and it is important to emphasise what he says. Crime figures have been coming down, including, I am glad to say, those on crime relating to drug abuse—we are reducing levels of drug crime as well.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con) rose—

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

David Davis: It is good to be back.

The truth is that violent crime has nearly doubled under this Government.

"Tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime" is the Prime Minister's most famous phrase. Alcohol is a major cause of violent crime, but the Government's answer to too much drink, too much of the time, is more drink, all the time. Which of the following quotations does the Home Secretary agree with: that the new 24-hour drinks law is "a serious piece of legislation intended to . . . curb crime", or that, as a result of that legislation,

"Yes, you may see a rise in violent alcohol related crime"?

Both were said by the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure whether this is the right hon. Gentleman's final Home Office questions, but whether he is on his way up or out, or still here after Christmas, I pay tribute to his commitment to genuine debate in this area—in the hope of gaining him a few more votes in the leadership contest.

First, the right hon. Gentleman is simply wrong when he says that violent crime has doubled. All the facts indicate absolutely clearly that violent crime has reduced. Secondly, is the Licensing Act 2003 serious legislation? It certainly is, as it is designed to encourage responsible drinking and to tackle the kind of activities that we have seen over many years. Thirdly, is it possible that our alcohol reduction campaign pre-Christmas will lead to an increase in recorded alcohol-related crime? It is possible, as the police arrest more people, which is what they are out trying to do.

David Davis: I thank the Home Secretary for his kind words, but it is after the deadline for voting. As for his comments on the level of violent crime, I suspect that it will not be the last time today that the Government will rest their case on fiddled figures.

Let us come back to the other major cause of violent crime, which is drugs. Under this Government, both the supply and the use of hard drugs have spiralled out of control. As a result, a report last week from the Joseph Rowntree Foundation showed that professional drug dealers' average income was £7,500 a week—equivalent to a legal income of over £500,000 a year. Is it any wonder that in defence of such lucrative territories we see spiralling violent crime, including knife crime, gun crime, wounding, murders, even killing of innocent bystanders? That is a direct result of the Government's lax drugs policy. Does the Home Secretary believe that his current anti-drugs policy is helping to reduce levels of violent crime and, if so, how?

Mr. Clarke: When the right hon. Gentleman refers to fiddled figures, he should remember that the British crime survey, which he has criticised, was established by a Government of whom he was a part to establish an objective assessment of crime. He should look more carefully at his own record. During the general election, for example, he and his party produced fiddled figures on poster sites throughout the country to such an extent that police protested about what was going on. As for drugs policy, I agree that drugs remain a major source of criminality at all levels and need to be tackled, both at the level of both the organised crime itself and the supply into this country, and at the level of the demand for the drugs. Our drugs policy does that and has led to significant improvements in recent years.

Police Force Mergers

2. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on his proposals to merge police forces in the south-west of England. [33820]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): The consultation phase is currently under way and no decisions have yet been made. Police forces and authorities in the south-west as well as other regions will be expected to present their preferred options by 23 December. Thereafter, careful assessment will be carried out on the viability of those options for proceeding to implementation. Throughout the whole process, forces and authorities should be engaging fully with their local communities and stakeholders, and feeding in their views.

Mr. Robertson: I thank the Minister for that answer, but I suspect that the whole House believes that decisions have already been taken on this issue. I am glad that she is going to listen to the consultation, because in Gloucestershire the chief constable, the police authority, the county council, each of the six local authorities and thousands of people across the area totally oppose the proposed mergers. Gloucestershire has a very good record in tackling level 2 crime, and we should remember the infamous West case and the biggest legal aid fraud case in the country. Why does the Minister feel that all those people are wrong and that she is right?

Hazel Blears: I can certainly confirm that decisions have not been taken, which is why we have said to police forces and authorities that we want them to do the work locally and to produce the options and business cases that will enable us to provide improved policing for local communities. The hon. Gentleman and his party have to face up to the reality. According to the best possible advice from Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, the current 43-force structure is no longer fit for purpose in the 21st century, and we have to do something to ensure that we can meet the challenges that exist. We have not closed off any options, but there will have to be some change.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Somerset and Avon police have worked very closely with South Wales police on Operation Tarion, which is trying to tackle the terrible trade in drugs in the south Wales valleys. As one who supports the combining of Welsh police forces into a single Wales police force, may I ask the Minister whether she will ensure that, none the less, the relationships that have been built up with forces across the border, especially on drugs policy, will continue?

Hazel Blears: I am delighted that my hon. Friend is engaging in this debate in a mature and constructive fashion. This is a serious point, because all of us will be subject to very local views. People will naturally want to cleave to their current organisation, but my hon. Friend is prepared to look at change in order to improve policing. I am delighted to give him the reassurance that he seeks. The existing relationships between forces that have been working across borders to tackle serious and organised crime will not only continue but will need to be strengthened. HMIC's advice is that such crime is likely to get worse, not better, and that the pressures on level 2 services will increase as criminals become more sophisticated. So those excellent relationships in tackling drug crime across the south-west will need to be strengthened.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I hope that the Minister is aware of Bournemouth's strong relationship with Hampshire; indeed, it used to be part of Hampshire. Why, therefore, are Dorset and Hampshire being prevented from considering a merger in the context of police restructuring?

Hazel Blears: In originally setting out the criteria that we wanted police forces and authorities to consider, we said that we wanted options that did not involve crossing Government Office boundaries or dividing existing forces, and we did so for a very good reason. Improving policing services does not depend simply on the police working on their own; it also depends on the rest of the criminal justice system, the Crown Prosecution Service, the various community safety funding streams and local government. We said that we would not rule out such options completely, but that there would have to be a remarkably compelling case for going across Government Office boundaries or for splitting police forces. Some may well come forward with such options, but at the moment we see no sign of the compelling case that would need to be made in order to outweigh the practical considerations contained in the criteria.

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): I very much welcome the announced merging of police forces across the south-west, and I hope that that will help to deal with the very serious problems of crack cocaine dealing and Bristol's acting as a drug supermarket for the south-west. However, there is also the increasing problem of the misuse of khat among the Somali community in the south-west. When will the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs' report on the criminalising of khat be produced?

Hazel Blears: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the constructive way in which she is approaching the question of merging forces. She is right: we need to combine our capacity, so that we have the resilience to cope with very serious issues such as drugs, money laundering, serious and organised crime, terrorism and civil emergencies. I can also give her the assurance that the issue she has raised about khat is under active consideration. I understand that the report is with the advisory council at the moment and we will consider the issue as soon as we can. It is important to bear down on all kinds of drug activity that can lead to increased criminality in our communities.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): Is the Minister aware that Gloucester, Cleveland and Northamptonshire police forces have estimated that this restructuring will cost them each £50 million? Is the Minister in a position to say what the overall national costs will be? They could run to billions of pounds. Will it be left to council tax payers to fund it or will the local government finance statement later today reveal that the Government will pick up the bill? Surely the Government should listen to the public, abandon the restructuring, and provide more front-line police, not an unnecessary merger programme.

Hazel Blears: Issues of finance and governance will be of prime importance, especially to our police authorities. Indeed, when I went to the Association of Police Authorities conference last week in Belfast, those issues were rightly raised. We envisage that savings will be made by bringing forces together, but there are issues about up-front costs. We have set up a tripartite finance working group, with representatives of the association, the forces and the Home Office. We can look at a range of measures to obtain finance. It may be that forces that will come together already have improvement programmes costed into their forward business plans. When we consider the business plans on 23 December, we will take a keen look at the financial provisions. It may well be possible to do some prudential borrowing around those issues and it may be possible to capitalise some of the costs. I genuinely believe that bringing forces together will give us some long-term economies of scale, but this is not a cost-cutting exercise—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Minister could write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I may need to brush up my English geography, but as far as I am aware, Yorkshire is not in the south-west. The hon. Gentleman may ask his question if he can keep it to the south-west.

Mr. Clapham: The reorganisation of the police forces in the south-west of England is obviously an important measure, as it is elsewhere in the UK. In addition to considering the reorganisation, will my right hon. Friend look closely at the way in which action is co-ordinated between and within police forces including, for example, the chief constable's policing plan, the police committee and the safer and stronger communities priority? It is important that we all share the same agenda, because the public can be confused by the disintegration between the various committees that put the police argument forward. Will she ensure that that co-ordination takes place?

Hazel Blears: Yes, I shall try to ensure that there is co-ordination in the south-west, the south-east, Yorkshire and the north-east. My hon. Friend makes an important point. Bringing forces together at a strategic level should help us to strengthen the neighbourhood policing that everybody wants to see in their communities. The pressures to take our neighbourhood police officers away to deal with serious and organised crime will grow, and if we can bring forces together, we can ensure that we will be able to sustain our commitment to every area having a visible and accessible police team. I know that my hon. Friend plays a pivotal role in his local crime and disorder reduction partnership and how much he will want to protect neighbourhood policing.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The Minister has had the advantage of listening to the chairmen and chairwomen of the police authorities of England and Wales at the Belfast conference last week. Can she identify a single one of them who supported the Government's restructuring policy?

Hazel Blears: Yes, as well as attending the general conference session, I had a series of positive, constructive and detailed discussions with chairs and chief executives of police authorities. The hon. and learned Gentleman would feel that I was being somewhat premature if I were to detail the nature of those discussions at this point, but many of the police authorities—unlike Opposition Members—recognise the need to change if we are to be able to deal with the serious issues of counter-terrorism, serious and organised crime and civil emergencies. I point out to Opposition Members that if they think they live in a world where we can continue with the current configuration of police forces and not provide better services to the people of this country, they are living in a fantasy world. I suggest to all of them that they talk to their police authorities and look at the real and serious issues that many of them face.

Probation Service

3. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): What plans he has for the probation service. [33821]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): A consultation paper setting out the Government's proposals to restructure the probation service was published on 20 October. We intend to legislate to implement those proposals, which will help to drive up performance and contribute to the reduction of reoffending.

Jim Cousins: I am grateful for that reply. The Government have rightly set the probation service some tough targets, which have been met. Indeed, new services have been developed to deal with numeracy, literacy and the mental health and well-being of the people who use the service. May I, therefore, urge my hon. Friend not to break up the service, and not to hold out the threat of privatisation with the prospect of loss of identity and a complete free for all about who the employers might be in the future?

Fiona Mactaggart: I share my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for the success to date of the national probation service, which has achieved a lot in helping us to reduce reoffending. I share, too, his congratulations to the service, but it knows, as a service that has gone through change and stepped up to the challenges of change, that we can do better, and our proposals to create contestability and to involve a range of providers for probation services will enable us to do that more effectively in future.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): What evidence is there that the introduction of a mixed economy in the delivery of probation services will in any way enhance public protection or reduce reoffending?

Fiona Mactaggart: The experience of contestability in the Prison Service has shown us that we can improve provision in terms of not only resources but also, for example, the decency agenda. As Her Majesty's inspectors have pointed out, the private Prison Service has done a lot to improve our prison services.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): In recent times, the Home Office has proposed market testing and possible privatisation not just for the probation service but also for the Forensic Science Service and various young offender institutions. In a mature and constructive way, may I ask my hon. Friend whether any aspect of the management and apprehension of offenders has such a strong public service element that it would be inappropriate for market testing and possible privatisation?

Fiona Mactaggart: I believe that the state has to take responsibility for those services and that we need to ensure that they are delivered in a way that reflects a public service ethos. That does not require every person who delivers every part of them to be employed by a public authority.

Islamist Extremism

4. Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): If he will make a statement on measures he is taking to combat Islamist extremism. [33822]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): Combating extremism is a job for the whole Government working in partnership with all faith communities. Over the summer, Ministers from all Departments met representatives of faith communities throughout the country to discuss the best means of proceeding.

During the summer, we established with the Muslim community a series of working groups to support communities' ability to challenge extremism themselves. Those "preventing extremism together" groups have developed a broad range of practical proposals, and many of them will be taken forward by community representatives, with Home Office support, in the coming months.

Michael Gove: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his reply, but he will be aware that among those who have been advising the Government on combating extremism are Mr. Ahmad Thomson, Mr. Khurshid Ahmad and Mr. Mockbul Ali. They have asserted respectively that Hitler was financed by Zionist financiers and that Muslims are obliged to want an Islamic state. One of them, Mr. Mukbar Ali, described the Muslim Brotherhood, the godfather organisation of Hamas, as reformist, progressive and liberal. Does the Home Secretary believe that people who hold those views are the right individuals to help us build the inclusive, tolerant, multi-faith society that everyone on the Conservative Benches wants to see?

Mr. Clarke: I do not accept the descriptions that the hon. Gentleman has given, but I shall certainly look at them carefully. This is a major issue for the way in which we engage with the mainstream Muslim community following the events of July, and it is very important that we have the widest possible range of engagement. That does not mean tolerating and accepting views of the type that he describes—I abhor them just as strongly as he does—but it does mean that we must have a very full debate, particularly relating to young people from the Muslim community, to ensure that we can contest the extremism in the most effective way.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): Does the Home Secretary accept that dealing with extremists is not just a problem to be resolved in the United Kingdom? When the Foreign Affairs Committee goes to countries ranging from Morocco and Libya to Saudi Arabia, one of the things that they are most concerned about is access to websites and CDs. Will he therefore work with his colleagues in other countries to deal with those websites and combat those ideas?

Mr. Clarke: I very strongly agree with my hon. Friend. She may be interested to know that, just last Friday, the European Union Council of Justice and Home Affairs Ministers concluded a set of proposals on contesting radicalisation recruitment for precisely the reasons that she gives. When I led an EU delegation to Washington, we had very specific discussions with the Americans on exactly the same basis. She is entirely correct.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): In the summer after 7/7, both the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary made it clear that central to policy would be to achieve the expulsion from this country of a small number of extremist imams and others who are doing so much to stir up hatred—a statement that was welcomed by quite a number of moderate Muslim figures. Can the Home Secretary confirm to the House that no one has yet been expelled under that heading? Will he tell the House how many proceedings against such individuals have been started?

Mr. Clarke: I shall not set out the details of the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, which he asks publicly in the House today, but I will say that we have successfully taken action against individuals who have been settled in this country. However, I acknowledge—this is the truth in his point—that it is a very difficult process to deport people from this country to countries where they may not be able to live or where it is thought that they cannot live safely. That is a central issue for us in that approach.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the persons described by the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) in no way represent the majority of our constituents who are Muslims? In fact, they would be disowned by them. They do not represent them in any way.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is 100 per cent. correct. That is certainly the case. What is most important in all this is to work with the mainstream Muslim community to isolate extremism, and that is exactly what we are seeking to do.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): In October, the Government's strategy to counter Islamist extremism was reviewed by the Prime Minister's delivery unit, which found that the strategy

"is not connected or coherent", that no one seems to be in charge and that

"we measure meetings and reports, not real-world impact."

How will the Home Secretary make sure that that strategy does not fail completely?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman refers to leaks, but he is leaking the wrong criticism that has been made. Leaving that aside for a moment, the fact is that we have a highly structured and effective campaign to deal with the issue. We are focused not only on dealing with extremism in the way that was suggested by the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) in asking about the relations with the whole Muslim community and the intensification of our democracy, which is centrally important, but on dealing with the explicit terrorist and extremist threat, which is what the report to which he refers was about. We have made a number of significant attempts to achieve a far more effective situation.

Antisocial Behaviour (Wirral)

6. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on levels of antisocial behaviour in Wirral, South. [33824]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): For the current year, Wirral crime and disorder reduction partnership was allocated nearly £400,000 to tackle crime and antisocial behaviour. That is helping local agencies to bear down on this type of unacceptable behaviour through a range of preventatives and other measures.

Ben Chapman: Is my hon. Friend content that, in the funding streams, resources and allocation of priorities used by the police, sufficient focus is given to constituencies, such as mine, with large suburban and semi-rural areas and countryside? Does he agree that incidents, such as that when Bebington British Legion was invaded by 10 youths who intimidated and abused those inside, might be best avoided if the already scarce police resources were not diverted to urban areas? Will he assure me that an appropriate balance is drawn between semi-rural and suburban areas, which have their own problems with antisocial behaviour, and downtown areas, which have a different set of problems?

Paul Goggins: It is important to strike the balance to which my hon. Friend refers. He never fails to take the opportunity to raise the issue in both Parliament and his constituency—rightly so—and to push the kind of partnerships that can make a difference. Wirral is an action area. It has an antisocial behaviour co-ordinator, whose job it is to ensure that each and every part of my hon. Friend's constituency and the rest of the Wirral gets the appropriate response whenever antisocial behaviour rears its ugly head.

Prison Population

7. Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): If he will make a statement on the size of the prison population. [33825]

8. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): If he will make a statement on the size of the prison population. [33826]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): The prison population on Friday 2 December was 77,262. It is the duty of the Government to provide places for all whom the courts send to prison. Our aim is to work with offenders while they are in prison so as to remove the danger they offer to the public and to reduce their propensity to reoffend.

Dr. Lewis: Does the Minister accept that the early release schemes that have been applied in the past have done nothing to reduce the prison population, because otherwise why are our prisons bursting at the seams? Will she undertake not to try to resolve that problem by further reducing the prison sentences served, which so discredits the sentences nominally imposed that our newspapers are full of the complaints of the families of PCs and head teachers who have been murdered that the murderers are being let out far too early?

Fiona Mactaggart: Since the inception of the scheme to which I think the hon. Gentleman largely refers, more than 119,000 prisoners have been released on home detention curfews. Something like five or six additional prisons would have been required had it not been possible to release those people in such a way. While I am second to none in offering my condolences to people who have suffered tragedies due to released prisoners who have breached the conditions of their curfew, it is worth pointing out that the reoffending rate among those on home detention curfews in the period following their curfew—and, indeed, while they are on curfew—is substantially less than that of other offenders. Although the scheme is obviously not risk free, that suggests that the risk is being managed relatively well.

Philip Davies: Due to the lack of available prison spaces, more than 6,700 crimes have been committed by people who have been let out of prison on an electronic tag. Some 1,200 people who were let out of prison early on parole since 1997 went on to commit a further crime before the end of their sentence. Is it not time to make more prison places available, stop electronic tagging and make prisoners serve their sentences in full to restore some credibility and confidence to the criminal justice system and for the safety of all our constituents?

Fiona Mactaggart: The Conservative party is making much of this kind of flouncing, as it did during the general election, when it promised 20,000 extra prison places, but only something like a fifth of the money to pay for them which they claimed to have identified from administrative savings. The synthetic passion that Conservative Members are demonstrating is frankly not up to snuff. We need to reduce offending and that is what this party has done. We need to ensure that prisons are used for violent, dangerous and seriously persistent offenders and that is precisely what we are doing. We need to ensure that people serve sentences effectively, which is one of the reasons why immediate custody rates have gone up from 6 to 16 per cent. in magistrates courts and from 49 to 60 per cent. in Crown courts. It is also why the average length of sentence served has gone up from 20 to 27 months. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman checks his facts before he pounces.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that one contributing factor to overcrowding in prisons is the thousands of people who are in on remand, some of whom end up being acquitted and quite a lot of whom end up with a sentence that is shorter than the time they served on remand? Will she consider the significant variations between different police and court areas in the numbers of people who are remanded, as opposed to being on bail, before trial?

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right. The biggest proportionate increase in the prison population is the remand population, which has increased by 10 per cent. over the past year. It is also clear that different areas have different practices in relation to remand. That is one reason why we need to ensure that better bail information is available to courts so that they do not remand unnecessarily. Apart from anything else, prisoners on remand are not able to participate in some of the effective work that takes place with sentenced prisoners. We need to ensure that we bear down on the unnecessary use of remand, although we need to use it if the safety of the public requires it.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): One thing that would help to cut the prison population would be if we did a better job on rehabilitation. Can my hon. Friend assure me that more resources will be put into rehabilitation, in particular education in prisons and for young people on the secure estate, which has been sorely neglected in recent years, although it has started to pick up?

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right. Our additional investment in education means that one in 10 basic literacy and numeracy qualifications is obtained by adults in prison. We are putting particular efforts into working with young offenders to help them to reduce their reoffending. There has been reassuring progress in some of the reconviction rates for young offenders. We need to ensure that we put in the effort on the programmes, education and, indeed, the other things that are associated with reducing reoffending, such as having a home and a job. All those things help people to go straight.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): Is the Minister aware that when rehabilitation becomes the main way of reducing the number of people in prison, resettlement prisons, such as Latchmere House in my constituency, which has only 207 places, are essentially the poor relatives of the Prison Service? However, Latchmere House has managed to achieve a reoffending rate of only 25 per cent., precisely because it reintegrates people with their families, gets them into jobs and allies them with Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous in their community. Will she reconsider putting more finances into such prisons, which can achieve our goal, rather than looking at them as something to satisfy a punitive instinct?

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Lady is right. Working with prisons that resettle people in a local community is important. We should welcome and develop the work of institutions such as Latchmere House. It is inevitable that they are less expensive to run than the high security estate. I am not going to promise to rebalance spending so that they get substantial amounts, but our direction of travel, in terms of the prison estate, is to look more carefully at the way in which prisons work with their local community to rehabilitate and resettle reoffenders, and with their local employers and others to ensure that reoffenders have jobs and homes, that they are healthy and that their alcoholism and drug use are effectively tackled, so that they contribute to society rather than stealing from it, as they have done in the past.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that in appropriate cases involving non-violent offenders, community punishments are much more successful than imposing prison terms in preventing reoffending? Does she also accept that we have an awful long way to go in convincing the public of that truth? What is her Department doing to pursue that task?

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right. The Criminal Justice Act 2003 made available to sentencers a robust series of community punishments, which they can target on the individual offender. Only last month, we launched a community payback initiative, which is designed to ensure that offenders make restitution for some of the wrong they have done to the community. I hope that that initiative will publicise how an effective, well-supervised community punishment can do more to rehabilitate offenders than lurking in prison, largely on remand, does for some offenders who end up there. Prison should be used for truly dangerous or violent offenders or for serious repeat offenders.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): With 60 per cent. of our prisons dangerously overcrowded according to Home Office figures, large numbers of convicted prisoners being kept in police stations in London, record reoffending rates and record levels of suicide among prisoners, the resignation of the prisons chief executive, and now prisoners able to take mobile phone pictures inside our top security establishment at Belmarsh, would the Minister say that Labour's prisons policy is working?

Fiona Mactaggart: I advised the hon. Lady's Friends to check their facts before they made allegations. No prison in the UK is dangerously overcrowded. The chief executive has not resigned: he has moved on to another job, and her comment is a complete mischaracterisation of the action of someone who has served the public so well for so long and who is taking up a new challenge. There is neither a record reoffending rate, nor a record rate of self-inflicted deaths; in fact, the numbers have decreased in both cases. As for her claim that our police cells are full, since the middle of November only three people have been held overnight in police cells. She should check her facts.

Licensing Laws

9. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What resources he is providing to local and police authorities to assist them in dealing with the liberalised licensing laws. [33828]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): Government expenditure on policing increased by more than 39 per cent., or £3 billion, between 2000–01 and 2005–06. The powers contained in the Licensing Act 2003 will assist police and trading standards authorities to tackle alcohol-fuelled disorder. In addition, we have recently announced funding of £2.5 million to boost a range of operations to crack down on alcohol-related disorder.

James Duddridge: I think that that was a no. Sir Ian Blair, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, has called for the big pub chains to make a contribution to pay for extra policing. Does the Minister believe that there should be extra policing, and who will pay?

Andy Burnham: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was listening, because I said that an extra £2.5 million has been allocated. I do not know whether he was one of those who predicted the end of the world when the new Act came into force, but in my view its long-awaited reforms allow the vast majority of law-abiding drinkers to enjoy a quiet pint when they want, and give the police powers to clamp down on unruly establishments. That is a fair balance, which is good for the whole country.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Police and trading standards officers in Lowestoft are making use of their new powers to crack down on licensed premises that sell alcohol to under-18s. Sadly, however, seven of the 14 establishments visited during a recent effort were observed selling alcohol to under-18s. Will my hon. Friend join me in sending a message, not only to those establishments but to all of them, that selling alcohol to under-age people is antisocial and morally reprehensible and can lead to a fine of £5,000?

Andy Burnham: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend and I congratulate those who have been doing that work in his area. Where work has been done through the alcohol misuse enforcement campaign to clamp down on alcohol-related crime, the result has been a significant reduction in such crime. However, he is right to say that there should be no tolerance of organisations that repeatedly sell to under-age drinkers. I support the full use of the powers that we have given police forces and others to clamp down on the sort of morally unacceptable behaviour to which he has drawn our attention.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that my police force is already in crisis, despite the figures that he has given? An all-party meeting of Dorset MPs was told only a few days ago that it would not even be possible to fund the force by increasing the council tax element of its funding, because the Government had prevented that, so the force would have to lay off staff. In Bournemouth, we have record numbers of applications for all-night licensing, and funding for the policing of the town centre is already in crisis. Nothing that the Minister has said gives me any reassurance that the situation will not become extremely bad indeed.

Andy Burnham: Dorset police, like other police forces in the country, have received significant extra resources under this Government. They have been particularly creative in using fixed penalty notices and other measures that we have put at their disposal to tackle alcohol-related crime. May I take the opportunity to remind the hon. Gentleman and other Conservative Members that tomorrow they are likely to have a new leader to impress, who appears to take a different view from the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues of the changes to the licensing laws.

Community Support Officers

10. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the contribution of community support officers to reducing violent crime and gun crime; and if he will make a statement. [33829]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): The primary role of community support officers is to provide high-visibility reassurance policing and to tackle antisocial behaviour. Home Office research and individual force evaluations have shown that CSOs are making a significant impact in these areas and are popular with the communities that they serve.

Michael Fabricant: I congratulate CSOs on their work, but the Minister says that that work is policing. Is he aware, however, that Metropolitan police officers refer to CSOs as plastic policemen and policing on the cheap? Is it not the case that they have no powers of arrest and that we need more police officers who can arrest and who can police?

Paul Goggins: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's description of community support officers. Of course, I agree that we want more police officers, which is why the police force that serves his constituency now has 69 more police officers than it had in 1997. There are also 63 community support officers who were not there at all under the previous Administration, so the hon. Gentleman's area is on the way to a total of 339 community support officers by 2008. I should have thought he would be grateful for that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Despite the negative comments of the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant), community support officers in North-West Leicestershire have been a great success. Does my hon. Friend agree that although the focus is on antisocial behaviour, as he told the House earlier, effectively tackling such behaviour can, in the medium and long term, drive down the levels of violent crime to which the hon. Gentleman referred?

Paul Goggins: My hon. Friend is entirely right, and I am grateful for his positive comments about the success of community support officers in his area. It is true that CSOs free up the time of police officers so that they can deal with more serious crime. CSOs also act as a deterrent, putting people off engaging in serious crime in the first place. All in all, the addition that CSOs make to policing is very beneficial.

Immigration

11. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): If he will make a statement on the points system for the admission of immigrants. [33830]

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Government published a consultation document on a new points-based system for managed migration, "Selective Admission: Making migration work for Britain", on 19 July. The consultation period ended on 7 November. We are now analysing all the responses we have received. We anticipate that we will publish the Government response to the consultation in the new year, together with a timetable on the way forward.

John Bercow: I am grateful for that reply. Given that substantial immigration will continue to be vital to our competitiveness, will the Minister confirm both that the skills advisory body will be independent and that its reports will be published regularly as a matter of course, so that we can all see for ourselves that policy is driven by the interests of the country, not by the prejudices of the worst elements of the tabloid press?

Mr. McNulty: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question, which is, as ever, thoughtful. While I am on my feet, may I commend to the House the Social Market Foundation pamphlet, "Incoming Assets: Why Tories Should Change Policy on Immigration and Asylum", which he wrote—I think that it costs £10, unless it is remaindered already? It is excellent, and his colleagues—not least the incoming leader, whoever he is—would do well to read it. If the points system is to work effectively, he is right that the skills advisory body should not only be independent from Government, but regularly publish its reports on the gaps that it perceives in the labour market and on how those gaps will be filled—if not by EU labour, then by labour from beyond that.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Will the Minister assure the House that before the final decisions are taken there will be full consultation with the officers at Sheffield and Croydon who will implement the schemes, which will dramatically change how the work permit section operates? Will he also assure the House that the large backlog at the immigration and nationality directorate will be eased before the scheme is implemented? Along with the new director general, I know that he is seeking to clear the backlog, so that cases are dealt with as efficiently and as effectively as possible.

Mr. McNulty: In both cases, I can give my hon. Friend the assurances he requires. I have made sure—not least by attending a consultation session with staff from both Sheffield and Croydon—that IND staff are involved in the process, which will mean significant changes, and I assure my hon. Friend that that level of consultation with our staff will continue. I hope—if I have anything to do with it, this will be the case—that the backlog at IND at Sheffield, Croydon and elsewhere will be dealt with long before the introduction of the all-singing, all-dancing points system.

Antisocial Behaviour

12. Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): what steps he is taking to tackle antisocial behaviour involving mini bikes. [33831]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): The inappropriate use of mini bikes is a growing problem and incidents that disturb local residents, damage the environment and put the safety of the public at risk are becoming more frequent. A range of powers can be used to deal with the illegal use of those vehicles. The most commonly used legal power is under section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002, which allows a constable in uniform to stop and seize vehicles, following further nuisance after giving an initial warning.

Mr. Simon: Ministers have come to the House on previous occasions to tell us about the full range of powers that the police have and on which I offer my congratulations. However, the rumour in the west midlands is that a 14-year-old "asboid" on a mini bike is difficult and dangerous to catch and that the police have been told not to chase them, lest the charming "asboid" or, indeed, the policeman should be injured. What advice can the Home Office offer the police, because if we cannot catch those involved, we cannot confiscate their mini bikes or do anything about the problem?

Andy Burnham: I fully appreciate the seriousness of the issue, because a 13-year-old boy who was riding a mini motor bike on the street died in my constituency in the summer. I sympathise with my hon. Friend and know that problems have occurred in the Brook Vale park and Witton lakes area of his constituency, although I understand that four vehicles were recently seized. I am sure that his chief constable will have heard his remarks today. I know that West Midlands police has the power, which is under trial, to issue fixed penalty notices to those who are causing harassment, and I hope that it will use that power, too.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Is the Minister aware of the scale of the problem caused by mini bikes in my constituency? What restrictions has he considered on the sale of those vehicles to under-age youths?

Andy Burnham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing the scale of the local problem in his constituency to my attention—as I have said, I, too, have a significant problem in my constituency. We have introduced a significant number of powers, but he is right to draw attention to the role of retailers, and of irresponsible retailers in particular. I know that some well known high street names are selling these vehicles to young people, and I urge them to use their retailing campaigns responsibly.

Knife Crime

13. Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): if he will make a statement on measures to tackle knife crime. [33832]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): Knives have no place in our schools, on our streets or in our neighbourhoods, which is why we have worked out a package of measures with the Association of Chief Police Officers to strengthen our legislation in that area. We want to tackle the knife culture, especially among young people, and engage with our communities. The Violent Crime Reduction Bill, which is currently before Parliament, will give police and local communities new powers to tackle knife-related violence.

Alison Seabeck: I welcome the Minister's comments. However, I am a little concerned that today's Plymouth Evening Herald has shocking figures showing that there have been 1,000 knife crimes in the past three years in Plymouth, and that between April and August this year there was, on average, one incident involving a Samurai sword each week. The Minister may be interested to know that following a high-profile campaign run by Devon and Cornwall police, that fell to one incident in the 37 days of that campaign. Shopkeepers, too—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is enough for the Minister.

Hazel Blears: I am delighted that my hon. Friend and her local police force have been involved in such a successful campaign in the Plymouth area. I can tell her that there is a range of measures in the Violent Crime Reduction Bill, including not selling knives to under-18s, ensuring that we can search for knives in pubs and clubs, and giving schools the power to search for knives. I can also tell her that we are working with police forces on whether we can have a general knife amnesty in the early part of next year. I believe that that will be a huge success in terms of people handing in knives. I am also looking seriously at adding Samurai swords to the list of offensive weapons because of the damage that they cause.

Pre-Budget Report

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Having taken the long-term decisions to achieve and sustain low inflation and stability, the task of this pre-Budget report is to meet and master global economic challenges and to make the critical decisions to secure Britain's long-term economic future. The theme of this report is that by combining our enterprise with investments in skills and science, in infrastructure and in housing, at every point matching investment with reform, Britain can lead in the world's most wealth-generating and dynamic sectors—in science and modern manufacturing, in finance and capital markets, and in education and the creative industries. With fiscal discipline, and by matching investment with reform in welfare and in public services, we can combine a strong economy with opportunity and security for all.

The past year has seen a virtual doubling of global oil and commodity prices. In the United States, inflation has risen to 4.3 per cent. In the euro area, inflation forced a rise last Thursday in interest rates. Across Europe and America, almost a million manufacturing jobs have been transferred to Asia, and a quarter of a million service jobs have been outsourced to that continent.

While all countries have faced global inflationary pressures, the British economy has also had to deal with domestic inflationary pressures to achieve what we and the Bank of England identified early last year as the necessary slowing of house prices and of consumer spending, which some in this House predicted would return Britain to the old familiar stop-go cycle of overheating, inflation and recession, and which, under previous monetary and fiscal regimes, did so time and time again.

In the past eight years, our new monetary framework has been tested: in 1997 when domestic inflation had to be curbed; and then in 1998 and 2001 when we had two global crises, the first starting in Asia, and the second the IT crash, the US downturn and of course falling stock markets around the world. Now, in 2005, tested by both domestic and global pressures, we are on course to meet our inflation target of 2 per cent. House prices, which were rising at 15 per cent. each year for three years, and at their peak rose by 25 per cent., have moderated to 3 per cent.

This is in stark contrast to previous decades when our economy faced simultaneous domestic and global inflationary pressures, in 1990, when inflation went above 10 per cent., in 1980 to over 20 per cent., and in 1975 to over 27 per cent.; when in the past a cycle of overheating and inflation could only be brought back under control by mortgage rates above 10 per cent., recession and unemployment.

Now today, when, more than ever, stability and low inflation are the essential foundation for investment and job creation for our future, Britain ends this year with inflation lower than America, the euro area and the European Union. We are on course to meet our inflation target not just this year but next year and the year after that.

The average inflation in Britain from 1970 to 1997 was 8 per cent., with inflation often going above 20 per cent. Our stability since then is such that, in the past seven years, inflation has been at or around 2 per cent. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Chancellor make his statement. Perhaps if hon. Members catch my eye later, they can question the statement then, but not now.

Mr. Brown: As Chancellor, I have always understood that the strength of a monetary and fiscal regime is how it performs not only in good years but in this, the toughest and most challenging year for the economy. It has been a tough year, but by facing up to global and domestic inflationary pressures, inflation is not—as it was in the past—above 10 per cent. but 2 per cent. Interest rates are not above 10 per cent. but below 5 per cent. Unemployment is not, as it was in the past, at record highs but at record lows.

The economy is not in recession; growth, even in this toughest year, is at 1.75 per cent. This is the 34th quarter of continued growth under a Labour Government. We are the first Government of any party to achieve eight years of uninterrupted growth since 1805.

For the fifth successive year, British growth is higher than that of France, Germany, Italy, the euro area and the European Union. British business investment is already rising this year by 3 per cent. and is expected to increase next year by 3 to 3.5 per cent. and in 2007 by 4.5 to 5.25 per cent.As production grows, we expect exports to rise by more than 5 per cent. next year and the year after.

Globally, there are continuing risks from trade imbalances, exchange rate movements and commodity price shocks. Domestically, monetary policy will continue to monitor closely the housing market and consumer spending. Domestic demand is projected to grow at the same rate of the economy. Overall growth is projected in 2006 at 2 to 2.5 per cent. and in 2007 and 2008 by 2.75 to 3.25 per cent.

Some people said that, as we moderated the housing market and responded to the oil shock, employment in this country would fall. Some predicted that we would end this year with fewer people in work. In fact, I can report to the House that, in just 12 months, employment in this country has risen by 330,000 to 28.8 million—the highest in this country's history. It is higher in every region and nation of the country.

This year, the economy has been generating 6,000 new jobs every week and 3,500 new companies are being formed every week. Indeed, of the extra jobs since 1997, almost 1 million have been generated by small businesses alone.

By tackling youth and long-term unemployment, the new deal has helped ensure that, while unemployment in America is higher than ours—and in France and Germany, it is much higher, at nearly 10 per cent.—in Britain, unemployment is lower than 5 per cent.

We know that continuing that record of high employment with low inflation demands continued wage responsibility in all sectors. So the Secretary of State for Health is submitting evidence to the pay review body that the headline rise in national health service pay should be based on our 2 per cent. inflation target, and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is announcing that, even after taking account of the normal annual increments and performance pay, the total increase in the education pay bill will be just 2.8 per cent. These are both signals of our determination to keep public pay costs under control and to contribute to continued low inflation in this country.

On this foundation of stability, our task is to match investment with reform in science and skills, infrastructure and housing, and to show that working in partnership with the private sector, we can best meet the challenge of globalisation. Although we have already doubled investment in science, global competition requires us continuously to update our 10-year framework. With, this week, a new public private partnership, supported by £50 million of new public investment, Britain is determined to lead the world in the new frontier of genetics and stem cell research. With the establishment of a new national institute for health research in the NHS, pharmaceutical and biomedical companies have just announced a new £500 million a year investment in Britain, making Britain the leading location for research in new drugs and treatments.

To support research and development across modern manufacturing, I am publishing today reforms to help access the research and development tax credit. The design of new products and services is now such an important sector that we propose a network of creativity and innovation centres—one in each region—offering start-up help to new design talent and supported by an expanded national centre in London to showcase British design. Because we have learned in the past that the neglect of investment in science held our economy back, we are determined to make the necessary long-term investment, with Government and private sectors working together to make us fully equipped for the global challenges ahead.

The same is true in skills and education. The successful economies of the global era will be the high-skill economies. Published today is the interim report of Lord Leitch, the first long-term assessment of Britain's skills needs. Since 1997, we have more than doubled investment in education, and the Leitch report finds that the number of adults with skills has risen from 79 per cent. to 86 per cent. But workers will, on average, change their job seven times during their working life, and the vast majority of today's workers will need to train or retrain for tomorrow's skills. The final Leitch proposals will come next year, but to step up the pace of change now, the national employer training programme, which offers free training for employees and help for all small firms with their costs, will be expanded nationwide from next summer to provide training in 50,000 companies for 300,000 new employees a year.

Some people seek to abolish the new deal, but, more than ever, a Britain equipped for the global economy needs a new deal that continuously equips people for jobs and skills. So this Government will not abolish the new deal; we will strengthen it. In eight areas of the country, teenagers who have too often fallen through the net and are receiving no training will be offered learning agreements: a training wage in return for gaining skills. No teenager in our country should be denied the opportunity to acquire the skills and employment that they need. With opportunities come responsibilities. The new deal pilots to help lone parents back to work will be extended to new areas of the country. From April, for men and women unemployed for six months or over, we will pilot personal action plans that involve compulsory interviews and intensive work plans.

Our third economic challenge is to make more affordable housing available for the rising number of families seeking homes. In the last eight years, low inflation and low interest rates have given homebuyers the lowest mortgage rates for 40 years. There are 1 million more homeowners now than in 1997. But to build more affordable homes of high quality in strong communities, Britain must—as the Barker report recommended—put in place long-term reforms in planning, land use, the competitiveness of the construction industry, and infrastructure in both the private and social sectors across the country.

The Deputy Prime Minister is today responding to the joint representations of the CBI, the Town and Country Planning Association, and Shelter. He is publishing new planning guidelines that will bridge the gap between the 150,000 new houses that we build each year and the 190,000 new households that are formed, in particular to help to build houses that young couples can afford. To provide land for new houses while protecting and improving the environment, he is asking local authorities to bring forward more brownfield areas for development. Where proposed new housing is of high quality, meeting the design code, local authorities will be obliged to accelerate planning consent. The construction industry must also rise to the challenge, particularly of investing in skills. To widen the number of investors in the residential and commercial property markets, we will this month publish legislation to set up in Britain real estate investment trusts to increase the funding for new property developments.

Because our aim is to build not just homes but communities, and to fund the new roads, schools, hospitals and infrastructure that convert estates into genuine communities, building on the recommendation of Kate Barker, we are today publishing for consultation proposals for a local planning gain supplement, which will give local authorities a fair share of planning gains to invest locally. Investment in social housing has almost doubled since 1997 but will have to rise further. We are announcing pilot projects today to encourage local authorities to bring derelict sites back into use and to build new housing for rent.

We know that shared equity has an increasing role to play in helping young couples in all our constituencies to get on the first rung of the housing ladder, and I can tell the House how we plan to extend equity share schemes. I can announce that three of the biggest building societies and banks have joined the Government as partners in shared equity; that building companies, including four of the biggest builders, are also now able to offer shared equity purchases; that we are now in discussion with investment companies on their possible involvement; and that we see a possible role for housing associations in extending shared equity.

Our aim is a new consensus across our country on the extension of home ownership and affordable housing—public and private sectors working and investing together to strengthen the economy, protect the environment and meet the housing needs not just of some but of all in our country.

As part of the figures that I am publishing today, let me confirm that already this year the first £4.7 billion of savings identified by the Gershon review have been achieved, with the Government's target of £3 billion in procurement savings exceeded by £1 billion, one year early. On target, we are also seeing a further 18,500 reduction in civil service posts, including 10,000 from the Department for Work and Pensions and 3,500 from Revenue and Customs. I can also confirm that we are on target with the relocation of a further 2,000 civil service posts out of London. Ahead of schedule, £5.7 billion of assets have been sold, on target to meet our objective of £30 billion of sales by 2010. In the coming year, we will conduct a zero-based asset review.

In addition to the new measures that we have announced to implement our new risk-based approach to regulation, I am proposing at the EU Finance Ministers meeting tomorrow competitiveness tests for all new and existing European regulations. I am closing a relief under which, for tax reasons only, people are being persuaded without changing what they do to set up a company, replacing the £10,000 starting allowance with a rise in the investment allowances for smaller business to 50 per cent.

I have today written to the European Commission asking for a derogation so that over 1 million businesses with turnovers not at the current two thirds of a million but at one and a third million or less will be able to take advantage of more flexible VAT payment options that will suit their business needs.

After consultation with British film makers, I can announce a new film tax credit to support British films. To increase support directly for producers, we can guarantee a credit worth 16 per cent. for large-budget films and at least 20 per cent. for small-budget films.

Anti-avoidance and fraud measures published today, including new requirements for disclosure, will address artificial tax arrangements involving capital gains and losses, trusts and offshore companies, rebated oils and the misuse of self-invested personal pension schemes to purchase second homes.

From reallocations to local councils from Departments, £305 million in 2006 and £508 million in 2007 will be made available to reduce pressures on the council tax. Later this afternoon my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government will give full details to the House.

I can tell the House that the current budget deficit, which reached a peak of £55 billion in 1993, will fall from £19 billion last year to £10 billion this year and then to £4 billion, and then zero. There will then be a surplus of £7 billion, then £11 billion and then £13 billion in future years, meeting the fiscal rule in this cycle by more than £16 billion, in contrast to the deficit over the last cycle, 1986–97, of £157 billion.

It is on the basis of this fiscal rule and our second fiscal rule, the sustainable investment rule, that the Government will plan our 2007 spending review, including our response to the long-term reviews on transport, pensions, energy and skills. Our second rule allows us to borrow for essential public investment, as long as there is a sustainable level of debt.

In 1997, the capital investment being made by this country in schools and colleges was just half a billion pounds a year. Today, we are investing £7 billion a year, and we are on track to renovate 12,000 more primary and secondary schools in our country. In 1997, Britain invested just over £1 billion a year in building and renovating our hospitals. Today the figure is £5 billion and it is rising to £8 billion by 2008. And investment in transport is doubling.

In total, net public investment, which was just £5 billion a year in its overall total in 1997, will this year be £26 billion and next year £29 billion. Even with this record investment, we meet our second rule, which ensures borrowing for investment within sustainable levels of debt. Net debt levels will be 36.5 per cent. this year and in future years 37 and 37 per cent., and then 38, 38 and 38 per cent., at every point lower than today's 44 per cent. in France, 47 per cent. in America, 60 per cent. in Germany and 80 per cent. in Japan. So, our debt levels are lower than those of our major competitors. Even as we borrow not for short-term consumption but for long-term investment, our borrowing levels are lower than that of our competitors. Total net borrowing, which reached £51 billion in 1993, will fall from £37 billion this year to £34 billion, £31 billion and then £26 billion, £23 billion and £22 billion. Cyclically adjusted, our net borrowing this year is just 2.2 per cent. of GDP, and it will fall to 1.6, 1.6 and 1.6 per cent., and then 1.5 and 1.4 per cent. in the years that follow.

Within these figures public investment, which I remind the House was just £5 billion in 1997, will continue to rise to £31 billion in 2007, then £32 billion, £34 billion and finally £35 billion in 2010. That is on average £40 million a year today per parliamentary constituency rising to £55 million a year by 2010, contrasted to just £10 million per constituency in the years before 1997. In just five years, from now until 2010, Britain will see more investment in its social and economic fabric than in the entire 18 years from 1979 to 1997.

Our two fiscal rules enable us to meet the country's priority to invest more not just in schools and hospitals but in transport, housing and, of course, in sport and the Olympics. I have, however, noticed representations that a third fiscal rule should be adopted. It is, each and every year, irrespective of the needs of the economy and the case for investing in public services, to restrict public spending growth to a lower rate than the growth of the economy in order to cut taxes. On closer examination, what has been called sharing the proceeds of growth would mean this year spending at least £12 billion lower and, by next year, £17 billion lower than plans, and I have concluded that this rule, however rebranded, is simply a new gloss on an old proposal advanced before previous Budgets, which would undermine our public services, our infrastructure and our economy.

It is our commitment to investment for the long term that allows us not only to address global economic challenges but to combine prosperity with fairness to all. Within the fiscal figures we can now do more to help families, the elderly and young people, and to meet our obligations on security and defence.

Defending our country is the first duty of Government. In response to the bombings in London in July and to the terrorist threat, it is right to do all that we can to support our police, our armed forces and our security and emergency services, whose bravery we commend and on whom we depend each and every day for our security and safety. Since 11 September we have doubled the budget for national security. Today we are making available an additional £135 million for security and counter-terrorism, and we are providing an additional £580 million for the armed forces for Iraq, Afghanistan and other international obligations.

At the end of a year in which we have seen the doubling of aid to Africa, promised at the G8 summit, and of debt relief, multilateral and bilateral, to 100 per cent.—which is just the start of what we must do in future years—the Secretary of State for International Development, to expedite the critical negotiations on trade, is offering to treble Britain's aid for trade to £100 million. It is unacceptable that the world is insufficiently prepared for natural disasters, so Britain will contribute to an expanded United Nations emergency fund. We will also contribute £50 million to a new IMF shocks facility.

Child tax credit is benefiting 6 million families, with 1.5 million poor children already lifted out of poverty. The mobility of our economy is now such that each year 200,000 men and women who move into new and better jobs see their family incomes rise by more than £10,000. Some have suggested that we should cut back child tax credit. This I refuse to do because, with child benefit, child tax credit is doing more to help families meet the costs of bringing up their children, and helps more families out of poverty, than any single measure from any previous Government.

Although a case has been made for fixed awards based on last year's incomes, to which we will continue to listen, it would be better to have a system that responds flexibly to changes. While requiring earlier notification of changes in circumstances, the Paymaster General is today making a detailed statement that from April next year we will allow annual income changes not of £2,500 but of up to £25,000. That will cover 95 per cent. of all income rises during a year. Where recovery takes place during the year, we will adopt new rules on repayment to address potential hardship.

Our policy is opportunity for all, and it is matched by responsibility expected from all. Today the Treasury and the Department for Education and Skills are jointly publishing plans showing how parents who want to do their best by their children can be given the support that they need, from child care tax credits and maternity pay to support for parenting at Sure Start centres and the increase in mentoring for children in care that we are announcing today.

But what parents often seek is early help, the most effective measure and the best hope we have to keep children out of trouble later. There are a dozen agencies that often duplicate each other's efforts without reaching that troubled child. To inform decisions in our spending review, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is piloting a new concept—that of one lead professional, based around the school, using funds brought together in one budget, with the authority to identify problems early and the freedom and capacity to intervene quickly and do what is right before a child's future is blighted.

The oil shock of this year has led to calls for more efficient use of energy and support for alternative fuels. Today I am enhancing the capital allowances for production of the most environmentally friendly biofuels. That will include help for oil companies to meet the agreed biofuel obligations.

Carbon capture and storage protect the environment from carbon emissions by containing them at source and transporting them to the North sea, where they make it easier to extract remaining oil from mature fields. I can announce a new partnership with the Norwegian Government. Together we will consider the right level of incentives to speed up the adoption of this important new technology. Because the United Kingdom can also become a world leader in clean coal, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is today announcing further support for clean coal and all carbon abatement technologies. That is part of our wider energy review.

Because we need to encourage energy efficiency in small and medium-sized businesses, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is today announcing further funding for the Carbon Trust.

So that all import capacity for gas is put to use, Ofgem is announcing today that it will use its powers to intervene where necessary to ensure that importers either "use or lose" their capacity to import. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have today written to the European Commission supporting Ofgem's call for an urgent investigation to make sure that this winter there are no blockages to the full use of the interconnector with Europe and thus no restriction on imports of gas from Europe.

Our economy has had to withstand an oil price rise from around $25 to a current price of around $55, which is also close to the level of almost all future projections. Returns in the North sea are now nearly 40 per cent. on capital, compared with ordinary returns of 13 per cent. With the tax on new development in the North sea now lower than in the USA, the Gulf of Mexico, Norway, Italy and Australia, and in order to strike the right balance between producers and consumers, I will raise the supplementary North sea charge from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent., while giving new incentives to companies for exploration and development of the most difficult fields by extending the exploration expenditure supplement to all their ring-fenced activity.

I am also now able to freeze petrol and diesel and road fuel gases duties for this full financial year at an Exchequer cost for the full year of £600 million. I am also able to set aside resources, so that the winter fuel payment—the universal payment tax free to all pensioner households—will be £200 not just this year, but next year, the year after that and every single year of this Parliament, and it will be £300 for the over-80s, paid every year before Christmas.

In addition to the winter payment, I want to ensure that for pensioner households energy costs are as low as possible while ensuring the most efficient and effective heating system against the winter cold. Insulation and central heating can reduce heating bills for the typical pensioner household by £300 a year. The energy savings are so great that no pensioner household should be without insulation and no pensioner should be without help to install central heating. After many years, it is time to complete that insulation and the installation of central heating where it is possible to do so.

The Government's warm front programme has so far insulated 1 million homes but there are still 500,000 with no central heating and 2 million without insulation. Separate announcements will be made for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. By setting aside an additional £300 million over the next three years, the Government's warm front programme will not only be able to offer pensioner households on pension credit free installation of central heating, but we will offer all other pensioner households without central heating £300 towards the costs of installing it. We can go further. I am grateful to the energy companies that are matching our offer by announcing this afternoon that they will extend their offer of insulation. There will be free insulation for all pensioner households on pension credit, with, for all other pensioner households, between £125 and £175 paid towards the costs of insulation.

Let me conclude with a set of measures in an area which is not fashionable today, but I believe vital for the long-term future of our country. It is an area where we can make progress only if the Government invest and work together with the voluntary and community organisations that are at the heart of every community in this country. A responsible society requires strict measures to combat vandalism and violence. It also requires that society fulfils its responsibility to encourage what is best in our young people, and we have to do far more where in the past too little has been done, investing in youth and community facilities that are modern, relevant and welcoming for teenagers up and down the country.

Today, I can announce an agreement with the banks and building societies that unclaimed assets held in bank accounts will, once realised, be put to use to improve youth and community facilities throughout Britain. It is right for us as a Government to make a start now. First, the Government are joining with seven of Britain's leading companies to launch the country's first national youth community service. With up to £100 million of initial finance, it will fund gap-year volunteering in Britain and abroad for young people who otherwise could not afford gap years, and it will fund part-time and full-time community service in every constituency. Secondly, because we want the 2012 Olympics and, beyond that, any English bid for the 2018 World cup, to regenerate sport for young people in our country, the Culture Secretary and I are today announcing details of a national sports foundation, modelled on the Football Foundation's successful investment in football facilities. We will invest new money in improving facilities, amenities and participation across all sports in every area of the country.

But as the Youth Green Paper said, more can be done not only to support wider youth services, but to put decisions about the programmes for young people in the hands of young people themselves. So as a first step, we will provide finance for each local authority to set up a young people's fund; for amenities and activities run by young people, and decided on by young people themselves. On average, half a million pounds will be provided for each local authority over the next two years, so that they can strengthen local communities.

Stability is the foundation. More investment, not less; responsibility from all; opportunity for all, not just the few: I commend this pre-Budget statement to the House.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Let me begin by welcoming the measures that the Chancellor announced on trade justice, the international finance facility and debt relief for the poorest nations, which we support. We also support the new measures on youth projects and the extension of shared equity schemes—a policy that, as he well knows, we proposed at the last general election. We will study the proposals on planning, but we believe that decisions on planning should be taken by local communities, not by unelected, unaccountable and unwanted regional assemblies.

The real story from today's report is that the Chancellor's deficit has gone up to £10 billion. He is borrowing £151 billion over the next five years—£17 billion more than he predicted. He has just announced that growth this year is half what he predicted before the general election—he did not linger on it, but I understand that to be his announcement—and his forecast for next year is also lower. [Interruption.] His golden rule is now tarnished and discredited; productivity growth has slumped; business investment has collapsed; and this year, Britain's economic growth is among the weakest in the developed world. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not the habit of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) to shout; perhaps she should not do so today.

Mr. Osborne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Chancellor was supposed to come to the House to deliver an accurate report on the state of the British economy; instead, his speech sounded more like tractor production figures from the old Soviet Union. This is a tragic story of a Chancellor who has been forced to wait so long to get into No. 10 that his reputation in charge of No. 11 is crumbling. This is the iron Chancellor, who has single-handedly destroyed the public finances; the prudent Chancellor, whose means-testing has devastated pension savings; the business-friendly Chancellor, who is presiding over the lowest rate of investment in business since records began; the progressive Chancellor, whose own shambolic tax credit scheme has left families relying on food parcels; the long-serving Chancellor, who is now presiding over a long-term decline in this economy's ability to compete. No wonder he looks so gloomy. The longer he stays at the Treasury, the more his chickens are coming home to roost. For this is a Chancellor who is the roadblock to reform; a Chancellor who is now holding Britain back.

Let us look at those growth forecasts. In March, the Chancellor told us that the economy would grow by 3.5 per cent. In September, he downgraded that to 2.5 per cent. and today—in case you missed it, Mr. Speaker, because he rushed through that bit—he downgraded the growth forecast again, to 1.75 per cent. He also downgraded it for next year. I do not remember him telling the electorate before the general election that the economy was facing a tough and challenging year. What he told the country at the time of the election about the state of the economy was not true, and it is difficult to believe that he did not know it at the time.

When the Chancellor was comparing us with other countries in his statement, why did he not want to tell us that this year our economy is growing more slowly than

[Mr. Osborne]

18 of the 25 members of the European Union—slower, to date, than Germany, Ireland and Spain? Why did he not tell us that our growth in the last quarter was slower than every major economy in the world except Italy?

The Chancellor blames the high price of oil, but that hardly explains why our oil-exporting economy is growing slower than other oil-importing competitors. He blames weak overseas markets, but almost every other developed economy is growing faster. The Governor of the Bank of England told us the true cause last month. He said that a "sharp rise" in taxes has caused a "sharp slowing" of household incomes and economic growth. But what is the Chancellor's response today? It is more stealth taxes, including a doubling of the supplementary tax rate on oil companies—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] He can go back to Scotland and tell them about that. We also heard about a new land development tax—a tax on affordable homes—which is something that all Labour Governments do when they run out of money.

With all the Chancellor's extra taxes, it is amazing that he still has a budget deficit. But he does—and that is another forecast that he got wrong. First, he told us that there would be an £8 billion surplus this year. Then in March he changed that to a £6 billion deficit. Today, the deficit has gone up again. Why was he in such a rush to go through his borrowing figures? He should have slowed down. He should have told us that he plans to borrow £37 billion, £34 billion, £31 billion, £26 billion, £23 billion and £22 billion, or £151 billion over the next five years.

The fiscal rules were supposed to keep the deficit and the debt under control. The Chancellor was meant to have fixed his spending to fit his golden rule. Instead, he fixed his golden rule to fit his spending. I congratulate the Chancellor on finally adopting our policy of making Government statistics independent, so that he cannot fiddle with the nation's balance sheet anymore. Why does not he also set up an independent body to monitor the golden rule? That way, he will not be able to claim that an entire economic cycle began without anybody else noticing.

The Chancellor talks about the great challenge that Britain faces from China and India, but with falling research and development, falling productivity growth and falling business investment, his policies are simply not rising to that challenge. They are holding Britain back. In 1998, he said that "Productivity ... is a fundamental yardstick of economic performance".

Does he remember saying that? Well, he did. So let us use his own yardstick. In 1998, productivity growth averaged 2.75 per cent. Today, it is 0.5 per cent., or one fifth of the rate that he inherited. If productivity was his fundamental yardstick, he has failed fundamentally on his very own measure.

Unreformed public services are holding Britain back, too. The Prime Minister will remember telling his party conference that each time he had tried to reform the public services he wished that he had gone further. Well, who stopped him? Who frustrated him? It was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the roadblock to reform. He blocked health reform. He blocked education reform. He blocked welfare reform. Now he is blocking pension reform, too.

With all the talk of reports in the pre-Budget statement, why did not the Chancellor mention the Turner report more than once? The fact is that he sabotaged the Turner report, even though it is his means-testing and his pensions tax that has destroyed savings. The man who created the pensions crisis is the very same man who is standing in the way of providing a solution. No wonder Lord Turner describes the Chancellor's position as "not a contribution to a sane argument".

How the Prime Minister must love Lord Turner. This country needs a Chancellor who is interested in reforming Britain for the future, not in defending his failed policies of the past.

I have no doubt that when the Chancellor gets up, he will deliver in public all those one-liners that he normally reserves for the Prime Minister in private, but let him answer these simple questions. Why were his growth forecasts so wrong? Why is the deficit so high? Why is productivity so weak? Why is investment in business down? Why is red tape up? Why is bureaucracy up? Why are taxes on the rise? Why did he sabotage Turner? Why does he block every real attempt to reform public services? Let us hear his answers. Let us hear why he is holding Britain back.

The Chancellor could have used today's report to prepare our economy for the future, to set out the reforms this country so desperately needs, but he did not. Instead, this is a Chancellor forced into the humiliation of admitting that he got it all wrong. This is a Chancellor who is past his sell-by date. This is a Chancellor who is holding Britain back.

Mr. Brown: Why does—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will answer each question, but why does the shadow Chancellor not have the courage to come to the House and say to the House what he has been saying outside it. I have the article he has written—

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will decide whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is answering in a proper way. I will be the judge of that.

Mr. Brown: I have the article that the shadow Chancellor published only a few days ago. What does he say? In place of all the allegations he made today, he talks about "Labour's success on macroeconomic policy".

Then he says that Labour has improved the macro-economic management of the UK economy and that Labour has established "economic credibility". He then says that there is "public confidence" in Labour's "ability to manage the economy".

Then he says, against the Conservative party, that its short-termism

"has hampered ... a long term economic policy" for the country. Then he says that Conservatives

"still lag a long way behind the Labour party when it comes to public confidence in our ability to manage the economy."

The reason why the hon. Gentleman cannot acknowledge that we have the longest period of sustained growth, the lowest inflation, the lowest interest rates for 30 years and the highest employment ever is that he knows that at no point under a Conservative Government would that ever have been possible to deliver.

In the Financial Times on Saturday, the hon. Gentleman complained that I had been "too brutal" with him in the last three months, but having heard his speeches I am afraid that I have not been brutal enough. They say that the Conservatives are about to skip one generation. Perhaps it is time that they skipped another one as well.

On forecasts, the only party in this country in the last 30 years that has forecast growth and given us recession is not the Labour party, it is the Conservative party. On productivity, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, the only party that has had negative productivity growth in this country in the last 30 years is the Conservative party. On manufacturing, the only party that has had negative manufacturing growth is the Conservative party. On child tax credits, I think the whole country will resent the fact that the shadow Chancellor suggests that somehow the Labour Government are putting children into poverty when it was the Conservative opposition to child tax credits and to child benefit that put so many children into poverty.

Why will the hon. Gentleman not defend his own policies? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have given the Chancellor a lot of elbow room, but the policies of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) are nothing to do with the Chancellor. I know that he has disowned himself in that way, but perhaps he can continue.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman complains about investment. Business investment was £87 billion in 1997; it is £110 billion this year. How can he say that there has been a collapse in business investment when business investment continues to rise? He says that the new deal is not working, but we have 330,000 more people in jobs this year. He complains about our regulation, but we are getting rid of some of the ridiculous regulatory agencies created by the Conservative Government. We the Labour Government are taking to Europe the proposal to put a competitiveness test on regulations and to end the gold-plating of European Union regulations.

The Conservative party's policies are to abolish the new deal, to cut the child tax credit and to announce— [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman said that our growth was lower than that of Spain and Ireland. What he did not say is that our growth is higher than that of France, Germany, Italy, the euro area and the whole European Union. If he wants to look at differences in growth in the economy, let us look at the comparison between two recessions under the Conservative Government and growth in every year under a Labour Government.

The hon. Gentleman's policies are to abolish the new deal, to scrap the child tax credit—[HON. MEMBERS: "What are your policies?"] Conservative Members do not like it, do they? At the last election, they said that they would spend more—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chancellor will assist me by not referring to the Conservative party's policies. I know that he has got a lot of material there, but perhaps he could use material that will not embarrass the Speaker.

Mr. Brown: Our policy is to keep the new deal, to keep children out of poverty, to increase public investment in this country and to increase enterprise efficiency and productivity in our economy. The Conservatives were in power for 18 years; from what we have heard today, they will be out of power for 18 years.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Three years ago, the Chancellor told us that Britain was recording its best economic performance for 50 years. Two years ago, he told us that it was the best economic performance for 200 years. On his last outing, he told us that it was the best economic performance for 300 years. We are all rather disappointed that he has not come along today and told us that he is outperforming the Romans.

The Chancellor has demonstrated his talent for producing rabbits from hats, while disregarding the big long-term challenges, such as creating a sustainable state pension system and reforming the unfair system of local taxation—but we welcome some of his rabbits. I am glad that he has listened to representations from Liberal Democrat Members and others and scrapped the tax relief on second homes under the self-invested personal pension scheme. That is very welcome. I also welcome the substantial relief from overpayment—the £25,000 ceiling—that he is now giving on tax credits.

The Chancellor is having to acknowledge, however, that we are now in the process of what economists call a growth recession. It might have been desirable if he had gone next door to the Prime Minister to ask for a short seminar on how to do humility, but instead he has tried to blag his way through by blaming the problems on the oil producers and slow-growing Europe. He knows that that is complete nonsense. If the problem is oil, why are the oil-importing United States and Japan booming? If the problem is a slow-growing Europe, why has Britain been consistently outperformed by Sweden and Spain? The problems, as he well understands, are domestic.

Does the Chancellor accept the explanation that a large part of the slow-down in consumer spending is caused by growing anxiety about private debt? Does he accept that the share of our income that is spent on debt servicing—20 per cent.—is almost the same as it was when personal finances collapsed under the last Conservative Government? If he does not accept that explanation, does he accept the explanation of the Governor of the Bank of England that consumer anxiety about taxation has produced the slow-down in spending? How does he explain the fact that private investment in the economy is half what he forecast in the Budget? In particular, why has commercial research and development fallen, despite the fact that he is spending £800 million a year of taxpayers' money subsidising it?

The Chancellor is quite right to say that the big long-term challenge is about public spending, the public finances and how to make tough choices on public spending—we endorse that. However, may I ask him a series of specific questions? Can he explain why no Treasury Minister publicly contradicted the Home Secretary after he promised that compulsory identity cards would be made available free of charge at a cost of £6 billion to the Home Office, excluding the cost to other Departments? Has the Chancellor put any financial limitations on the Prime Minister's expressed enthusiasm for nuclear power? Will there be any limitation of the subsidies and guarantees that could become available?

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

The Chancellor has written eloquently in the past few weeks about the evils of the common agricultural policy. Can he explain why the Prime Minister is now on the brink of surrendering £1 billion of British taxpayers' money, despite having achieved no single concrete concession on the common agricultural policy? Can the Chancellor explain where he was when his deputy and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry reached an agreement on public sector pensions that was such that a rising star in the Treasury could join the civil service at 20 or 21 years of age and retire 40 years later on a generous final salary scheme, while the rest of the population has money purchase pensions, or a state pension scheme that Lord Turner has described as "not fit for purpose"?

In conclusion, I speak as someone who I think has more time for the Chancellor than many of his own colleagues. Why cannot he stand up in Parliament and say, "Yes, indeed I am proud of my record as Chancellor in presiding over economic stability and low unemployment and fighting poverty"—I endorse all those things—and also say, "I have made mistakes. We've exaggerated the projections and there has been administrative over-centralisation."? Why cannot he simply stand up and acknowledge his own failures?

Mr. Brown: I, too, have a great deal of time for the shadow Chancellor who resides in Twickenham, rather than the shadow Chancellor for the Conservative party. However, the hon. Gentleman must recognise what has happened to the economy during the course of this year: we have been able to maintain stable growth.

When the hon. Gentleman gave his press conference on Thursday, he said:

"Compared with Europe Britain has . . . low inflation."

On public sector debt, he said:

"The big picture is basically very good".

On investment in public services, he said:

"There has been an enormous injection of money into the public services, which we support."

On employment, he said:

"A world where we have full employment—this is, you know, Gordon's great achievement".

On monetary policy, he said:

"Monetary policy has generally been a big success story".

He acknowledged all those things; at least he did so at a press conference, while the Conservative shadow Chancellor tries to write them in an obscure article that he hopes that no one will be able to read.

The fact is that the Liberal Democrats have dropped all their tax proposals, but are still making public spending commitments. If the hon. Gentleman is really going to be a successful shadow Chancellor for the Liberal party, he must stop the barrage of public spending commitments that have been made by his spokesmen and women in only the past few days. I have press releases that have come out on transport, the Home Office, child care, more money for dentistry and, of course, the Liberals' London manifesto. They are all public spending commitments, but the hon. Gentleman has dropped all his tax pledges and has no way of paying for them. As far as we are concerned, a public spending review will take place in 2007. All the issues the hon. Gentleman raises will be examined during the course of that.

On public sector pensions, the hon. Gentleman should know that £13 billion of public sector money was saved as part of the negotiations. All the other issues will be part of our public spending review in 2007. I would rather be in my position on public sector finances, looking at increased public investment and taking the right decisions for Britain, than in his position of being forced by his colleagues to drop all the tax plans while still being unable to control their spending plans.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend's proposals to use unclaimed money in so-called dormant bank accounts for youth and community programmes will be welcomed. Will he ensure that the banks do not use the definition of dormancy as a way of hanging on to that money unnecessarily?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that. He has taken an interest in unclaimed assets for a long time. The problem has been dealt with and considered by successive Governments for many years. It involves a negotiation with banks and building societies, and there is still the issue of pension funds and insurance companies to address.

However, as far as banks and building societies are concerned, he will see in the print of the Treasury documents that an agreement has been reached whereby once the money is released from the dormant assets, it will be used for youth and community services. The full negotiation on the detail of the money to be released is still to be completed, but there is an agreement in principle, first, that the money will be provided and, secondly, that it will go to youth and community services, and some to financial education. That will allow us to build the youth and community services that our country has long needed. Those have been neglected. As each of us, in every one of our constituencies, knows, young people are being asked to behave properly, and so they should, but at the same time they say that they do not have proper community and sports facilities. If we can make an impact on that with the unused assets, it would be a great advance for Britain.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Surely even the Chancellor would agree that, since this time last year, the main event is that British growth has fallen below the most pessimistic independent forecasts. It is now among the lowest in the developed world and in the last quarter was the lowest in the G7 apart from Italy. It is unlikely to recover quickly because it has been accompanied by a fall in personal consumer demand, crushed by the level of household debt, and an impending fall in public demand because of the fiscal crisis and mounting debts. Even if the people who still believe in his fiscal rules and his description of the public finances also believe in fairies, does he accept that the two big economic announcements of new taxes are both dangerous? Oil tax slowed down development of the North sea gas fields in 2002 and a land development tax has never worked and will go against all his measures to restore the housing market.

Given that the right hon. Gentleman is planning to slow down the rate of public spending beyond 2008, does he not accept that he has to accelerate that and, before his review in 2007, show that it is possible to slow down public spending without sacking policemen, doctors and nurses? Does he also accept that he will not be a responsible Chancellor until he demonstrates that he can do that and unless he gets on with it now?

Mr. Brown: I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman makes a more comprehensive contribution to the debate than the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, but if he reads the Conservative research department brief, he will find himself misled about what is happening to the British economy. Despite what he says, growth is higher than it is in France, Germany, Italy, the euro area and the European Union. The figures, as published, show exactly that.

As for his objections to our two policies, the land development proposals are part of a consultation document. We look forward to the consultation that will take place over the next few months. However, on planning gain, when builders make money out of the sale of development land where infrastructure is needed in areas where housing is being built, the question is not whether the infrastructure should be provided, but who takes responsibility for financing it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may agree with me that the developer and companies should make a contribution—indeed, a bigger contribution—to the development of the infrastructure. This is an argument that we can have in the next few months, and it is an argument that is certainly needed if we are to build the houses that we need in this country.

I disagree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's statements on oil. The argument is exactly the same as the one that we advanced, to which he refused to listen, on the effect of VAT on fuel. He has to face the fact that returns on the North sea, at about 40 per cent., are quite different from the returns on ordinary investment in other firms. He has to accept that even in countries such as America, tax measures are being considered or used to ensure that more of the return from changes in oil prices comes to the consumer. In the past three years $1.2 trillion has been transferred from consumers to producers because of the escalating price of oil. I think that if he were Chancellor, he would be the first to want to do something about that.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): While congratulating my right hon. Friend on his statement, may I welcome in particular what he said about housing? Does he agree with me that building more homes, especially in areas such as central Oxfordshire where his science investment is so important and welcome, can both increase economic growth and tackle acute housing need? Is not that precisely the combination of social justice and economic opportunity that will be welcomed by businesses large and small, by public services and especially by those who desperately need housing and whose hopes are blocked by Conservatives in local government?

Mr. Brown: I agree with my right hon. Friend and thank him for his contribution to the debate over many years. The fact is that we have to face up to the need for housing and for infrastructure around housing. Those who are not prepared to face up to that fact will find either that waiting lists for houses in their local authority areas grow, or that we are unable to attract to this country some of the people whom the financial services industry and other industries need for their expansion. Given the increasing number of households, it is necessary to be able to build more houses. We have made a number of proposals on planning, land use, social housing and the development of shared equity. I had hoped that there could be an all-party consensus on what needs to be done to build the houses that we need—high-quality, affordable houses that build communities as well as homes—but if that is not to be, we will have to press ahead to make sure that we build the housing and infrastructure of the future and do not get stuck in the past.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Today the Chancellor has announced a doubling of the North sea supplement from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent., in effect creating a 50 per cent. corporation tax regime in the North sea or imposing a 25 per cent. hike in tax on the sector. Is he aware, as many in the industry are, that that fiscal regime may well lead to a rapid and irreversible loss of key resources, skilled people and equipment; that that resource flight may in turn lead to the loss of many of the 260,000 jobs in the sector, 60 per cent. of which are in Scotland; and that it may lead to the sector being unable to deliver the benefits to the economy that it has been delivering? Is the Chancellor confident that the £1 billion cash grab that he has made today will not lead to a massive reduction in revenue in the medium and long-term future?

Mr. Brown: First, we have given new incentives for the development of smaller oil fields. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman will know that the tax rates on new developments in other parts of the world are higher than they are in Britain and that we are bringing ours into line. Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman has to face up to the fact that the oil price when we established our regime was between $22 and $28 a barrel. Even in the last year it was estimated to be about $40, but it has risen to nearly $70 and fallen back to $55 a barrel. It is right to strike a balance between the needs of producers and consumers. The last people who can complain about taxation in relation to Scotland are the Scottish National party. In the past few weeks and months in the Holyrood Parliament SNP Members have proposed more money for child care, more money for children in care, more money for the fishing industry, more money for GPs, more money for police officers, more money for the arts, more money for local authorities and more money for social workers. They could not pay for any of it under their party's plans.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Chancellor's announcement of 1 million new homes and in particular what he said about shared equity schemes. Can we encourage more building societies such as Halifax and Nationwide to become involved in that important scheme?

I realise that negotiations on unclaimed assets are continuing with the banks and building societies. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the money is not only distributed from those sources, but that, as in the Republic of Ireland, local communities are able to put in bids in relation to their own areas? They know their areas well and they know how to build them up, and it is important that they share in the windfall.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. I look forward to discussing those issues with the Treasury Committee on Thursday. On unclaimed assets, we are publishing more information today, and the debate about the way in which those assets can be used in other areas—not just the banks and building societies—will continue. I look forward to dealing with all the other issues raised by my right hon. Friend at the Select Committee on Thursday.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Does the Chancellor feel any sense of anguish that his tax policies have wrecked the retirement expectations of millions of our occupational pensioners?

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman looked at the issue, he would see that pensioners in Britain today, with the measures that we have introduced, are better off than they would have been if a Conservative Government had been in power. Not only has the basic state pension risen faster—

Sir Peter Tapsell: What about occupational pensions?

Mr. Brown: Let me deal with the question in my own way. The basic state pension has risen faster than inflation. We have introduced pension credit, as well as the winter fuel allowance and free TV licences, which the Conservative party opposed at one stage. As for occupational pensions, the savings regime and the pension tax reliefs in this country are designed to help people save more for their retirement. We will have a debate now—[Interruption.] The savings ratio in this country is higher than in America, the fastest growing country in the industrialised world. The British savings rate is higher and has been—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps, one day, the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) may have a chance to put a case, but not today. It is the Chancellor of the Exchequer who is replying.

Mr. Brown: The debate on occupational pensions will continue as a result of discussions on the Turner report.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Employees at Glaxo in my constituency will undoubtedly welcome what the Chancellor said about the pharmaceutical industry, and the employers at Farmway will undoubtedly welcome what he said about the capital allowances for biofuels. Can he confirm that, in addition to those measures, he will continue to support the science base, unlike the Opposition parties?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has a great knowledge of these issues, having worked on many of them as an official at the Treasury. She takes a special interest in science and the environmental issues that led us to introduce the proposals on biofuels. Let us be honest: the science base of this country—one of the most inventive countries in the world—has been neglected over the years. The fact that we now have a 10-year plan for science and are doubling investment in science is essential for our global economic future. The medical investments that are now under way as a result of the partnership between the NHS, universities and pharmaceutical companies will lead to £500,000 of new investment in the next few years, with the potential for £1 billion-worth of new investment just in medicine and medical science. That is one step towards Britain leading the way in a range of medical and other sciences, which means that we will be well placed to be one of the great success stories of the global era.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): We must assume that the real estate investment trusts that the Chancellor announced are based on the American model—they will be straightforward, simple and offer real incentives to investors—and are not based on the Treasury's original thinking that they should be revenue neutral. Does he not realise that previous land development taxes have failed, partly because of their complexity, but also because developers speculated against political change? Given the profits to be had, people will hold back development in the expectation of a change of policy, such as tax abolition. That means that there will be less land available for development, house prices will go up and home ownership will become a distant dream for a new generation of Britons under this Government.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman had better look in detail at the consultation document published today. The fact of the matter is that in an honest debate about what planning gain involved in the past, the amount of planning gain resources that have been given to local authorities for the building of infrastructure—schools, hospitals, but particularly transport and especially roads—has been small in relation to the needs of those local authorities. He would agree that if we are expanding the number of houses and if a development gain is being made it is a fair question as to how it is shared between the different beneficiaries and the different groups in a local area. That is what the debate about the planning gain supplement is about. It is a local planning gain supplement, because the money will principally go to local authorities and local areas where housing development is under way. As I understand it, planning gain provides about £1 billion of extra funds for local authorities during the year, but the fact is that local authorities are spending far more to develop the infrastructure, particularly the transport that is necessary for these services. The consultation document is there for people to see, and the Conservative party would be wise to consider the issues before it makes a wrong decision once again.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): As we are facing one of the worst winters for many years, I congratulate the Chancellor on providing £300 million for central heating for pensioners on pension credit. I also congratulate him on the new initiative to provide an additional £300 million subsidy for private sector pensioners to install central heating. Will he assure the House that he will keep those figures under review and ensure that that excellent initiative continues in future years and future programmes?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend takes a big interest in the needs of both pensioners and people without high resources in the communities of this country. I hope that the insulation and central heating scheme receives all-party support. It is a scandal that as we face the winter months, large numbers of pensioners are unable to afford either insulation to cut their heating bills or central heating, which is why the measure is open to all pensioner householders and is not restricted to one group of pensioners. Where pensioner households do not have central heating, it is possible to obtain a £300 grant to install central heating, starting immediately. Equally, where pensioner households do not have insulation, the energy companies—I am really grateful to them for what they have proposed today—will offer between £125 and £175 towards the cost of insulation. As I have said, I hope that the measure receives all-party support. We face cold winter months, so the sooner that pensioners can access the scheme, the better.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): International competitiveness is one of the things that the Chancellor glossed over in his statement. In its latest annual report, the Treasury has produced a helpful table based on the World Economic Forum international competitiveness league. During the right hon. Gentleman's time as Chancellor, Britain has slipped from fourth to 13th in that league—why?

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman examines the different leagues for competitiveness, productivity, stability, efficiency and regulation, we are doing very well. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members look at the figures, they will see that we are ahead of Germany and Japan in productivity, and we are catching up with France. Yes, we are behind America, but the measures that we are proposing are designed to enable us to catch up. In 1997, when we came into power, we had the lowest GDP per head in the G7, but now it is the third highest. It is important to look at all the different comparisons, and Conservative Members will be particularly interested in one of them: the Heritage Foundation, which is one of the more right-wing institutes in the United States, has stated that in terms of economic liberalism, deregulation and flexibility of the economy, we are better placed in the rankings than when the Conservative party was in power.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Chancellor's announcement of the shared-equity scheme. Does he agree that areas such as my black country constituency, which historically contains low incomes and a lot of brownfield sites, could particularly benefit from the scheme? Will he also ensure that local authorities are involved in the dialogue between banks, building societies, developers and the Government? Young people who are searching for accommodation often make the local authority their first port of call, and local authorities have an important part to play in assessing the need and potential for the scheme in areas such as mine.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and will talk to him about the expansion of shared-equity schemes and how they will affect his constituency. We clearly need to do more on social housing, too. We need to build more housing for rent and make it possible for the pilots on disused sites to be successful in different areas of the country. I regard the shared-equity scheme as one of the most exciting developments in recent years. The fact that the building societies, building companies, investment companies and, potentially, housing associations are all examining how they can develop shared equity is an important development for our economy.

Today, I visited the home of someone who could not afford to buy a flat in London if they had to obtain a 100 per cent. mortgage. They have got a 40 per cent. mortgage—the rest is covered by a rent agreement—and can move into their first flat, which they will do before Christmas. Many thousands of people throughout the country depend on the development of shared-equity schemes to have a chance to get on to the first rung of the housing ladder. We are determined to work towards making shared-equity schemes happen as quickly as possible and, again, I hope that the measure receives all-party support.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I, too, welcome the Chancellor's statement on tackling fuel poverty, especially among the elderly. It is a scandal that in this day and age people still have to choose between heating and eating. Given the levels of fuel poverty in my constituency and in Northern Ireland generally, can the Chancellor confirm that the measures that he announced—welcome as they are, and which I hope will be uprated year on year—will apply to Northern Ireland?

Mr. Brown: That is what the discussion will be about. Funds have been allocated for Northern Ireland. I hope that that means that insulation and central heating programmes will move ahead. I am determined, over the next few months, to ensure that as much as possible is done to insulate and to provide the necessary central heating. As the hon. Gentleman says, it is a scandal that in this day and age too many pensioners feel unable to provide the heating that is necessary for the warmth that they need, and we must take this new initiative to make it possible for them to have it.

Local Government Finance

4.51 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about local authority revenue finance for England in 2006–07 and 2007–08.

Sensible planning for service delivery needs a stable and predictable funding environment. Freezes on grant distribution changes have helped, but the time has come to go further and give councils firm forward financial allocations. There is no reason why councils cannot now provide similar certainty for their local taxpayers when setting their council tax for 2006–07 by providing an indicative council tax for 2007–08.

To give councils as complete a picture as possible of forward financial allocations, I am today announcing, for the two years 2006–07 and 2007–08, allocations of formula grant and grant for the "Supporting People" programme. The Government will also publish, by local authority, a table of allocations of all the major revenue grants that can be allocated in advance, including the neighbourhood renewal fund, which gives indicative allocations of £525 million for 2006–07 and £525 million for 2007–08 for the 86 most deprived local authority areas in England. By the end of this week, we expect that the vast majority of individual specific grant allocations will be announced to local authorities. The only grants that cannot be announced at this stage will be performance-led or data-driven in their nature.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools will shortly announce the provisional allocations to authorities of dedicated schools grant. Hon. Members should bear in mind that those allocations need to be added to those that I am announcing today to give a fuller picture of the above-inflation funding going to authorities with education and social services responsibilities. With the next spending review period, we will move to give three years of grant allocations to local government.

It is also high time that we overhauled the system that we use to distribute the formula grant. For more than 20 years, successive Governments have used a system based on notional figures for spending and local taxation. In the 1990s, the Government described the old standard spending assessments as "intended to represent the amount which it would be appropriate for the receiving authority to calculate as its budget requirement".

We no longer take that view. The formula is simply a means of distributing Government grant. Notional spending and taxation figures none the less continue to be misunderstood and misused for a variety of purposes, such as spending or tax targets, for which they were neither intended nor suitable. Such notional figures get in the way of sensible budget setting, because councils treat them as targets or going rates, and of a more mature relationship with local government on doing business together. I propose a system that deals in honest currency—cash grant—not fanciful assumptions about spending.

I accept that most responses to the consultation were against our proposal along those lines. However, the arguments supporting that position were not strong. Many stated that the new system would be more complex or use more judgment than the existing system; neither is the case. The new system will retain the strengths of the old. It will continue to take account of the relative needs of an area and the relative ability of councils' areas to raise council tax. There will be an element of grant that is distributed on a per capita basis and a grant floor.

Total revenue grants to English local authorities will be £62.1 billion in 2006–07 and £65.1 billion in 2007–08—increases over the previous year of 4.5 per cent. and 5 per cent. respectively. Part of that increase is dedicated funding for schools, leaving formula grant for other services that will total £24.8 billion in 2006–07 and £25.6 billion in 2007–08—increases of 3 per cent. and 3.8 per cent. respectively. That means that, by 2007–08, the increase in Government grant for local services since we took office will be 39 per cent. in real terms.

We have been working with local government over the past three years on possible changes to grant distribution formulae. We consulted publicly over the summer and I am publishing the summary of consultation responses today. Following that consultation, we propose several changes. The main drivers behind the change that I propose are: updating, especially the use of 2001 census data in place of that from the 1991 census; making the system more forward looking by using projections of population and council tax base; and adapting to policy change.

The new formulae for personal social services for children and younger adults are based on extensive research and have a solid evidence base. That makes it clear that there will need to be substantial change to reflect the evidence on service provision and the very different social and demographic environment of the 2001 census. The grant system also takes account of councils' widely varying ability to raise council tax, depending on the council tax valuations of housing in their areas. We propose to increase that resource equalisation because that will make the system fairer for those authorities with relatively low ability to raise council tax locally.

I propose to adjust the grant distribution system to reflect the introduction of free off-peak bus travel for the over-60s and the disabled from next April. I shall do so by increasing the weightings in the district level environmental, protective and cultural services formula that are given to factors that reflect support for the disabled and the needs of areas where take-up is likely to be highest.

Grant floors—the minimum guaranteed increase from one year to the next—are a permanent part of the system. Given the importance that we attach to stability and predictability of grant, we shall phase in the larger changes this year with more than usual care. The changes in children's social services and younger adults' social services will be phased in with specific formula floors. On top of that, we propose grant floors for groups of authorities.

For 2006–07, the floors will be as follows: for authorities with education and social services responsibilities, 2.0 per cent.—that figure excludes the increase in schools funding, which will give all such authorities above-inflation increases in grant; for police authorities, 3.2 per cent.; for fire and rescue authorities, 1.5 per cent.—that figure masks the help we are giving those authorities by phasing in recovery of the modernisation grant paid in 2004–05; and for shire district authorities, 3 per cent. For 2007–08, the floors will be as follows: for authorities with education and social services responsibilities, 2.7 per cent.; for police authorities, 3.7 per cent.; for fire and rescue authorities, 2.7 per cent.; and for shire district authorities, 2.7 per cent.

Within each group of authorities, those above the floor will have their grant increase scaled back to pay for the floor. The floor levels that I propose will mean that there will be a fairly narrow range of grant increases in 2006–07, with police authorities in particular all receiving approximately the average increase. For 2007–08, all authorities will receive a grant increase at least in line with inflation, and more formula change will come through for most authorities.

I would now like to come to the "Supporting People" programme, which was introduced in 2003 and is successfully providing support to more than 1.2 million vulnerable people. I am pleased to announce a two-year settlement for this programme. The "Supporting People" grant allocation for 2006–07 will be £1.685 billion, which is a significant investment, and I have also announced guaranteed minimum allocations for 2007–08 to enable authorities to plan their expenditure. Further, I am pleased to announce that authorities will be able to roll forward any savings from 2005–06 to 2006–07 in order to reinvest in the programme. This announcement will bring stability to the sector and enable authorities to work with support providers and voluntary sector and community groups to plan for the future. Building on the success of the "Supporting People" programme, I recently launched a consultation on how the programme can be further improved. Following that consultation, I will announce the full allocations for 2007–08 next summer.

This settlement is good news for councils and for council tax payers. We have been working closely with local authorities this year to identify the extent of the pressures that they face up to 2007–08, and we consider these actions necessary to mitigate those pressures. I am pleased to announce extra formula grant for the two years over and above previous plans of £305 million and £508 million for local government. We have also agreed with local government that we will jointly move forward on a number of fronts aimed at addressing the real pressures that councils face. This includes a continued commitment to the new burdens procedure, working with local government to assess the costs and savings of implementing new polices, and funding the net costs. We will be strengthening the mechanisms to enforce the new burdens procedure. Further, I announced to the House on Friday the agreement that the cost pressures arising from the temporary reinstatement of the 85-year rule in the local government pension scheme will not fall on taxpayers.

We are also aware of authorities' concerns over the costs of the new licensing scheme. I am pleased that we have been able to reassure the Local Government Association on this issue. The Minister with responsibility for creative industries and tourism has today reaffirmed the Government's commitment that the cost to local authorities of meeting the requirements of the Licensing Act 2003 will be fully met by fees within the national fee regime, provided, of course, that they are incurred legitimately and efficiently.

Local authorities will also benefit from the extra money coming in to local authority budgets through the local authority business growth incentive scheme, and from the new top-up grants for police and fire and rescue pensions, which will help budget planning and, ultimately, the council tax payer.

We have provided a stable and predictable funding basis for local services and we expect local government to respond positively on council tax. We therefore expect to see average council tax increases in each of the next two years of less than 5 per cent. Following today's announcement, there will be no excuse for excessive increases. Local government should be under no illusions—if there are excessive increases, we will take capping action, as we have done over the past two years.

I am also announcing today consultation on alternative notional amounts. The draft alternative notional amounts report sets out the proposed notional adjustments to local authorities 2005–06 budget requirements to help enable like-for-like comparisons with 2006–07 budget requirements for capping purposes. That is being issued for consultation today to ensure that authorities know, in advance of setting their budgets, the budget requirement figure for 2005–06 that the Government will use when considering using our capping powers.

The Government have provided another significant boost to local authorities with a financial package that is stable, predictable and adequate to meet the pressures that local authorities face over the next two years, while keeping down council tax increases to acceptable levels. I have placed copies of tables giving grant allocations and supporting documentation in the Vote Office and the Library of the House, and full details are being made available for local authorities on our website. I look forward to receiving consultation responses, and I commend these proposals to the House.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I thank the Minister for early sight of his statement, and particularly of the supporting documents. It has been a good and worthy tradition that we get plenty of time to respond to this particular statement, and it is partly due to him giving me so much information that I missed the first 15 seconds of his statement. No disrespect was intended.

I welcome the move towards a three-year programme and settlement, which is extremely sensible, and the Opposition support the Government in their aim to achieve that in the long term.

About a month ago, we were regaled with headlines in the national press suggesting that the hon. Gentleman and his friends in the Department were wandering around Whitehall with a begging bowl for local government, as previous settlements had proved to be inadequate. That followed the same practice last year. The House will recall the views last year of a senior and, sadly, anonymous mandarin, who, when asked to spare additional funds for the hon. Gentleman's Department, told the asking official to vacate his office as expeditiously as possible. To emphasise the point, the mandarin preferred to use the shorter Anglo-Saxon version of that request, and it seems that the spirit and the gesture remain firmly embedded in this settlement.

We were told that this year things would be different. We were told that the one-off bung of £1.4 billion would be added permanently to the local government settlement. It now looks like a £2 billion bung over two years. It was a settlement and then an amendment, but it need not be so. In the pre-panto season, we were promised a Robin Hood settlement in which hard-pressed local authorities would receive resources to do their job properly. On examination of the hon. Gentleman's statement, it is clear that the settlement would not please Robin Hood, but would find considerable favour with Guy of Gisborne, chief torturer to the sheriff of Nottingham.

The settlement envisages an increase in council tax of twice the rate of inflation. This year, council tax payers will see their bills approach an 80 per cent. hike since Labour came to office. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the small print in the Chancellor's pre-Budget report, on page 229, reveals that council tax receipts are forecast to rocket by a massive 7.1 per cent.—an extra £1.5 billion snatched from hard-working families and pensioners? That is an intolerable burden, particularly at a time when the Government have allowed a shameful drop in the take-up of council tax benefit.

Next year, like this year, we will see the sad parade of old-age pensioners being threatened with jail. Next year, like this year, we will see significant cuts in services by councils trying to keep their tax increases to as reasonable a level as possible. Next year, like this year, we will see that the optimism of the Minister's statement, as council budget meetings are held, will prove to be a false hope and a bitter reality.

Last year, we were promised that Sir Michael Lyons would have reported on this year's settlement. In October, we were promised an interim report this autumn. In today's pre-Budget statement, there was not a mention of that interim report. When will we receive it? Will it be before Christmas, after Christmas or in the early spring?—[Interruption.] It seems that the Minister of Communities and Local Government suggests early spring. It is no use to talk about an increase in funding without talking also about an increase in burden. The Minister's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), who I am pleased to see in his usual place, became a late convert when addressing this problem. Some of the right hon. Gentleman's handiwork can be detected in the statement, and I am sure that many councillors will be grateful for that.

I understand that there will be a written statement today from the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on the levels of licence fees that a local authority can charge. I understand also that there will still be a lack of clarity on the level of costs that local authorities face. Will the Minister give an undertaking that local authority taxpayers will not have to fund any part of the burden? How will the Government ensure that the full start-up costs or new licensing burdens on local authorities will be fully met? In particular, how will the cost of appeals be fully met?

Last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced a discretionary fare scheme for pensioners. The Minister will recall that I raised the problem of floor authorities, which he has mentioned. These are authorities that are in the process of losing grant across the board. Each year their losses are limited to the amount that is specified for the floor.

If the money designated for concessionary fares was simply included in the floor calculations, many district councils would effectively receive nothing for concessionary fares. Will the Minister clarify the position? Will he confirm that the £200 pensioners' discount was a pre-election, one-year wonder and has now disappeared? Were not the promises made to pensioners by the Government of a £200 discount on their council tax merely a simple one-year pre-election bribe? Will he further confirm that that has now gone? The Deputy Prime Minister tabled an order bearing on the local authority pension scheme. It is identical to the one submitted, only to be withdrawn, a year ago. That created a unique double U-turn, separated only by a general election.

We have heard about the 85-year-old rule, but what of the rest? Can the Minister give an assurance that no part of the burden of the Government's change of approach to the local government pension scheme will fall on council tax payers?

The Government, against the wishes of the public, are seeking to impose a regional police force. Will the Minister give an indication of how large the increase is expected to be on the police precept to pay for the rearrangement of the furniture in police headquarters? Does he recognise that the money would have been better spent on catching criminals rather than wasting it on Powerpoint presentations at headquarters?

There is the issue of external finance. The new planning gain supplement is nothing more than a new Labour land tax and, just like the old Labour land tax, it will fail. No doubt the House will have an opportunity to debate the issue in some detail. However, I have a few questions about the financial division of the tax. How will it be divided between the Government, the regions and local councils? It looks like a rip-off by the regions. Given that it is to be collected by HM Revenue and Customs, can we be sure that there will be a return to local people? It has the appearance of another stealth tax.

Given that there is a fragile housing market, is the Minister worried that, perversely, the approach might dry up housing developments? As for London, does the increase include the Olympic precept? What protection is there from the excessive city hall demands by Mayor Livingstone on the people of London?

The council tax is now in deep trouble. There is no sign of it coming out of intensive care. It is kept going by whip-rounds and the odd bone from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is not a strategy for independent living; it is a recipe for delay in the hope that something will turn up or that Ministers will move on to a new job. There will be another year with bills going through the roof; another year with increases that are twice the rate of inflation; another year with the council tax being Labour's stealth tax. The Government have yet again let down the people.

Mr. Woolas: I believe that the contribution of the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) has left the House in some confusion. I am not sure whether he welcomes the extra money that will enable council taxes to be kept down, or whether he is privately gritting his teeth so greatly as to rattle his fillings with anguish at the rug being pulled from under his feet. His authority in Brentwood will receive 3.1 per cent. and 2.7 per cent. increases, while in Epping Forest, which I believe forms part of his constituency, the increases will be 5 per cent. and 6.1 per cent.

Mr. Pickles: What about pensioners?

Mr. Woolas: I intend to tell the hon. Gentleman about pensioners. First, let me say that I am grateful for his welcome for the two-year settlement, and—I think that he said this as well—for the indication of our intention to move towards three-year settlements in line with the spending review periods. Our policy is to provide predictability and stability for funding, so that local authorities and their partners can deliver services at stable council tax levels.

I reject the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the 7.1 per cent. figure. This hoary old chestnut comes up every year, and is based on regressive estimates of council tax receipt. Again, the hon. Gentleman seems to be seeking to sow confusion—I do not say that he is doing so intentionally, although I have my own views—about the differences between council tax yield and council tax levels. The two are, of course, entirely different.

The hon. Gentleman said again that OAPs had been threatened with jail. Let me repeat, for the benefit of the House and the honourable ladies and gentlemen from the press, that no pensioner has been or will be jailed for not being able to pay council tax. There have been two instances this year of pensioners' receiving prison terms for being unwilling to pay the tax. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman and his party should seem to seek to promote the idea that those who are unwilling to pay taxes should not do so. It is, of course, the hard-working, honest majority who suffer. [Interruption.] I am coming to the point about which the hon. Gentleman is shouting at me from a sedentary position. He asked 17 questions; 13 of them made sense, so I shall answer those.

I covered the hon. Gentleman's serious point about licensing fees in my statement. The written statement today from the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), the Minister who is responsible for creative industries and tourism, confirms that the system will be self-funding under the new licensing regime.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the £200 discount that was announced in this year's Budget—in the last financial year, but the current calendar year. I am sure he will join me in welcoming the fact that, as we speak, cheques for £200 are arriving on the doormats of his constituents. I note that his party is very silent on the policy for the future.

A statement on the local government pension scheme was laid before the House on Friday. The hon. Gentleman accused the Government of a double U-turn, but I can give him the assurance that he seeks. The scheme is funded, and the changes proposed following discussions between employers and employees will impose no extra burden on the taxpayer.

The hon. Gentleman asked about planning gain supplement. I can reassure him that the money is to pay for infrastructure, as requested constantly and sometimes reasonably by Opposition Members for their constituencies, and that the majority will go straight to the local area. That which is regional is, of course, for the local area, if the funding stream must inevitably be at a higher level.

I confirm that the precept for the Olympics is not included in the figures that I have given today. In answer to the hon. Gentleman's proposition that the council tax is in deep trouble, it is his policy that is in deep trouble. The predictability, the stability of funding and the extra money that is being provided following reasonable discussions with the Local Government Association mean that the Government will not tolerate excessive increases. We see no reason now why council tax increases should be above 5 per cent. Indeed, average increases could be well below that.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend and his colleagues on securing additional funding to that provided for in the provisional settlement, which means that this is a better settlement than was anticipated. However, I do not think that he would ignore the fact that it is a tight settlement, with increases on average for education and social services authorities, excluding the dedicated schools budget, of only 3 per cent. this year, and in London of only 2.5 per cent. If I read the figures correctly, the increase is only 2.5 per cent. for my own authority, while Rutland, curiously, secures the best settlement of all education and social services authorities—a 6.8 per cent. increase. Does my hon. Friend feel that that reflects the aim of ensuring the targeting of resources on those in the greatest need?

Mr. Woolas: I welcome my right hon. Friend's contribution, given his deep and extensive knowledge of the system. One of the other reasons that Opposition Members are grating their teeth is that today's announcement scuppers the suggestion that there is a bias in the settlement against the south-east. The Government do not follow that policy; they have a fair policy. I warn my right hon. Friend that one has to look at the amended tables to ensure that we are comparing like with like, but I believe that we have provided a very fair settlement to authorities throughout the country and to different types of local authorities.

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I thank the Minister for his statement. It is a pleasure for me to make my first contribution from the Front Bench on this subject, having spent the best part of the past 20 years in local government and as someone who still passionately believes in the case for local government.

It is interesting to see in today's statement the contortions that the Government are going through again to lay the blame for council tax rises squarely at the feet of local authorities. Let me remind the House that it is not local government's fault that Labour has failed to introduce a decent funding system for councils, just as it is not local government's fault that the only way in which it can raise money is through the abysmally unfair and unpopular council tax.

Today, we have another "one-off" bung, although this year it will fall well short of filling the black hole that councils face, which according to LGA estimates could still be the best part of £2 billion. Will the Minister confirm that this is the third one-off grant in as many years? Perhaps he should consider renaming it an annual grant. Whatever we call it, though, the sad fact is that it will not be enough.

To fill the gap, councils would need to raise council tax by around 8 per cent. Of course, the statement has shown that such rises will not be permitted, thanks to the capping rules that were announced today. The planned cap of 5 per cent., far above inflation, does nothing to alleviate the problems for people who already struggle to pay their council tax bills—nothing will, frankly, except the abolition of council tax itself. Of course, the cap is an affront to local democracy. Perhaps the Minister will explain why Labour, which has boasted of its achievement in ending the Tories' "crude and universal" capping mechanism, now sees fit to introduce a two-year capping regime that is both crude and universal in itself.

Is the Minister aware that, thanks to the combination of spending pressures, tight grants—the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) described this settlement as tight—and no freedom on council tax, councils will once again be forced to cut services? Did the Minister read the social exclusion unit's report, "Improving Services, Improving Lives", which concluded that the quality of services provided by local government is fundamental to tackling social exclusion? Is he not therefore concerned that this settlement, combined with absolute restrictions on council tax rises, will force cuts in services? It is likely to worsen social exclusion. After all, cuts will not be easy to come by in many local authorities; councils are already striving to be ever more efficient. Is he aware that councils are producing £58 million-worth of efficiency savings every month—more than any other sector of government? Why, therefore, are they not believed when they speak of spending pressures?

The Minister has been quick to dismiss the LGA's assessment of spending pressures, but it personally surveys every local authority's finance department; the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not. Does the Minister think it wise to scoff at the LGA's estimates, given that the ODPM makes so little effort to establish the situation on the ground? Will he now acknowledge that the LGA is indeed right to warn of a black hole of some £2 billion? For the benefit of councils struggling to balance next year's budget, perhaps he can tell the House where precisely he would like services to be cut. Would he prefer a reduction in care for the elderly or cuts in children's social services; or would he like the streets to be left littered with rubbish and graffiti?

As we are all too well aware, Sir Michael Lyons is conducting a review of local government and local government finance. Enjoyable though it may be—

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is this a question to the Minister or a speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman can safely leave these matters to the Chair. The Minister will have detected questions here and there.

Mark Hunter: You are very kind, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Enjoyable though it may be for us to assemble here every year—with the eyes of local council employees, fearful for their jobs and their futures, on us—we Liberal Democrats hope that Lyons will bring an end to this whole sorry charade. Why do we put up with the most centralised and antiquated local government finance system in Europe? Why do the Government ignore all the evidence that demonstrates that the system is failing the people of this country? Given that local government is raising only 25 per cent. of its revenue, and given that it is not even allowed to make decisions about that 25 per cent., this grant statement is councils' only hope of securing adequate resources to serve their communities.

An out-of-date statistic here or a change in Whitehall priorities there can cost councils dearly. Just last year, my own council of Stockport—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am reluctant to stop the hon. Gentleman during his first attempt at such questioning, but he has said enough for the Minister to respond to.

Mr. Woolas: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his appointment to the Liberal Democrat Front Bench and on his contribution. I suspect, however, that the "Focus" leaflet was written irrespective of what I announced today. Against the background of a now 39 per cent. increase in real-terms Government grant to local authorities, it is not credible—and taxpayers know it—to paint the picture that the hon. Gentleman has attempted to paint. I suspect that, rather like the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), the Liberal Democrats feel the rug being pulled from underneath them, given the fair settlement that has been announced today and its two-year nature.

The Local Government Association's claim of a £2.2 billion shortfall has now been revised downwards, following sensible and mature discussions with the association, which is led by a very able Conservative leader. The figures have been revised, discussed and analysed, and we have a joint programme of action to pay the fair extra burdens, under the policy introduced by my right hon. Friends the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) and the Deputy Prime Minister. If local authorities face genuine extra cost pressures, we have a joint strategy to address those costs, which contrasts with the yah-boo approach of the Liberal Democrats to criticise and blame every problem in local authorities on the Government, while at the same time calling for further devolution. I suspect that the "Focus" editor is at his or her word processor as we speak, making amendments.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the amount of time that he spent with Councillor George Davies and other senior councillors from the Wirral as they expressed the injustice that they feel over the level of Government support. My hon. Friend will know from those conversations that a particular concern for the Wirral is the level of support for social services. To what extent has his statement today made good the injustice that we feel about the level of support we receive from the Government compared with that received by comparable local authorities in the south-east?

Mr. Woolas: I know that my right hon. Friend has taken a close personal interest in that matter, and especially in the Supporting People budget. Several representations have been made on that issue. I may be able to give him some reassurance, because his authority is looking at increases above the floor level, and it is also in receipt of neighbourhood renewal funds and allocations for Supporting People. I look forward to the response from his local authority when it has studied the details of the figures.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Given that the Chancellor's figures show that more than 7 per cent. extra will be collected in council tax this year, would not the Minister have been better advised to have listened to the strong representations from local government that it was not a good idea to ring-fence, in a separated grant, the amount of money for schools? Would it not be much easier for authorities to make their own decisions about priorities between schools and social services, which are the two main areas of spending? Is the Minister really saying that schools are always more important than social services? Is he saying that he thinks that councils can keep council tax down when they have their hands tied behind their back by requirements from the Government to spend certain sums in certain areas?

Mr. Woolas: The right hon. Gentleman would have a point were it not for the fact that, as I announced in the statement, we now have a floor for education and social services functions for local authorities. That will be widely welcomed by local authorities across the country and across the political spectrum. I am sure that when the right hon. Gentleman studies the figures for his area, which show above-inflation increases and—by 2007–08—an average increase in formula grant over 10 years of some 5.2 per cent. in Wokingham and 5.1 per cent. in West Berkshire, he will feel able to welcome the announcement that we have made.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): My hon. Friend has received many representations about area cost adjustment. What is his attitude to the geographical spread of area cost adjustment in the light of those representations?

Mr. Woolas: The current area cost adjustment, which was introduced in 2003–04, is generally regarded as a considerable improvement on its predecessor, and I pay tribute to my predecessor for that. Of course, the ACA is a national funding formula and any changes to it must be nationally applicable. We have taken the opportunity of the review of the ACA to implement some minor updates, simplifications and improvements. However, I recognise the real concerns felt in different types of local authority areas, and I will look again at the geography of the ACA.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Banbury young homelessness project is quite likely to close as a result of the Government's severe cuts to the Supporting People programme in Oxfordshire: a cut of £2.5 million next year, £3.5 million the year after and over the next 15 years to £11 million in year 15—a cumulative cut of £106 million. The consultation paper that the Minister issued in no way mitigates those reductions in the Supporting People projects in Oxfordshire. Those are real cuts for vulnerable people—those with learning difficulties, the homeless and others—and the Minister does not seem to be listening to the united representations of all parties and MPs in Oxfordshire, including his colleague the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) and the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris). When the Minister considers the Supporting People budget, will he look again at his consultation paper to ensure that counties such as Oxfordshire do not suffer those severe cuts and that valuable projects such as the Banbury young homelessness project can continue?

Mr. Woolas: I am of course aware of the strength of feeling and that an all-party delegation made representations on the issue. It is in part due to that that I very much wanted to be able to make guaranteed minimum allocations—and they are minimum allocations—for 2007–08, to ensure that counties such as the hon. Gentleman's could plan with some certainty. That is of course not the end of the story. The allocations of the 2007–08 Supporting People budget will, as I said in my statement, be subject to both the consultation currently taking place on the overall strategy and further announcements in the course of next year.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): I welcome the extra measures that the Minister has announced to assist local authorities with the introduction of new free off-peak bus travel schemes from next April. I thank him for the sympathetic way in which he listened to those of us who lobbied him on the matter over the past few months. Will he assure the House that the measures he has announced today will ensure that no local authority will have either to increase council tax or to cut services in order to introduce the new system, and that no eligible traveller will pay more after its introduction than they do at present?

Mr. Woolas: In the run-up to the settlement, there have been several representations from authorities across the country, including my hon. Friend's transport authority. The measures that I announced today reflect a change in the proposed formula for allocations, especially in areas where there is high usage by pensioners and disabled people. I am sure that my hon. Friend will recognise that the change has been made in response to representations from both sides of the House, and I look forward to pensioners benefiting from free bus travel in his area.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): The Minister said that he was keen to look again at the geography of the area cost adjustment. Well, will he look at mine—because he also said that he wanted greater reliance on and greater scope for resource equalisation, which means that my constituents, for whom, in effect, no account is taken of the higher costs associated with Hampshire, are expected to pay for services not in the New Forest but, increasingly, in places such as Durham? That is behind their increasing unwillingness to pay up.

The Minister of Communities and Local Government (Mr. David Miliband): What is wrong with Durham?

Mr. Woolas: I think the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) suspects that they are all poor up north.

In answer to the charge that has been made, the serious point is that resource equalisation is not the method by which the funding formula compensates authorities for the income, and relative income, of people in local authority areas. It is the measure in the formula whereby we take account of the type and spread of houses in the local authority area. When the hon. Gentleman gets the opportunity to look at the figures, he will see that in Hampshire there has been a 2 per cent. and 2.7 per cent. increase and that in his constituency of New Forest—

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): West.

Mr. Woolas: East and West—it is all one council. There will be a 4.7 per cent. increase for the council in both years. I hope that the hon. Member for New Forest, West will issue a statement to his local paper welcoming the fairness of the settlement.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): On the excellent free off-peak bus travel scheme for the over-60s and the disabled, my hon. Friend will realise that the Department's initial draft was not favourable to Carlisle. He has received representations from the chief executive, and I have had conversations with him. Can we take it from the statement today that the problems that we had with the draft have been sorted out and that the good people of Carlisle will all be able to enjoy that service free?

Mr. Woolas: It is, of course, the Government's intention to ensure that that is exactly the case. It is in the nature of grant allocations using formulae that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. That is why I have made the announcement in the manner that I have today, so that all local authorities can join one another—particularly at district level in county schemes, as well as in strategic transport authorities—and the Government to ensure that we achieve what I hope we all want to achieve: free bus travel for pensioners and disabled people outside peak hours.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Can we take another run at the concessionary travel issue, because I am not sure that the House is clear about it? Can the Minister say whether any part of the cost of the Chancellor's pre-election promise of free concessionary travel for pensioners now falls on any council tax payer, or is that completely funded by additional grant?

Mr. Woolas: The Chancellor has allocated £350 million, which is adequate to cover the costs of the concessionary scheme, as is recognised by all parties concerned. The hon. Gentleman is shaking his head, but the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) criticised me a moment ago with the allegation of centralising and taking powers. The hon. Gentleman can either have devolution or not. If he wants the concessionary fare system to work—I know that he does—I hope that he supports my attempt to implement that policy using the formula grant rather than a centralised grant, which is, of course, the alternative.

Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): I welcome the increase in the resource allocation equalisation element, which is partly intended to ensure that local authorities such as mine that would suffer because of the lack of the revaluation will be compensated somehow, but I doubt very much whether it will fully compensate them. Will my hon. Friend ensure that the neighbourhood renewal fund is extended at least until the Lyons review is implemented? Will he also ensure that the cap on that fund comes off, so that authorities such as mine will get the full amount that they are entitled to under the formula, rather than the reduced amount that they get at the moment?

Mr. Woolas: I thank my hon. Friend for his support. For the benefit of the House, I should say that the move towards full resource equalisation has been taken because it appeared to my right hon. Friends and me to be the sensible way to implement the new system, particularly given the announcement of the abolition of the formula spending share, which has been criticised by some local authorities.

My hon. Friend's authority—Wigan metropolitan borough, which is rated as an excellent authority by the independent Audit Commission—will receive grant increases of 2.3 per cent. next year and 3.8 per cent. the following year and neighbourhood renewal funds of £4.1 million for 2006–07. That fund is, of course, subject to a transitional relief scheme whereby, as areas become more prosperous under the scheme, the funding is tapered away.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The Minister's announcement of a two-year settlement is to be welcomed if it is a good one; of course, if it is a bad one, it merely prolongs the agony for a further year. In that connection, Gloucestershire's fire and police settlements look particularly challenging. In Gloucestershire, our fire service has already been regionalised and our police force is about to be merged. No doubt, that will be followed by the Crown Prosecution Service, the probation service and the youth offending service. Will the Minister give us an absolute assurance today that, if the savings from those mergers do not occur—in fact, if there is a cost—none of the costs of those mergers will accrue to the council tax payers of Gloucestershire?

Mr. Woolas: The proposals on police authorities, which are under consultation, are driven by the policy of improving the effectiveness and efficiency of police authorities. However, I can reassure the hon. Gentleman, because the floor level announced for next year for the fire and rescue service of 1.5 per cent. must be viewed in conjunction with the generous approach that we have taken on the repayment of modernisation fund money. Additionally, new arrangements for fire and police authorities for paying pensions—the scheme for each is unfunded—have been devised in such a way as to benefit those authorities, so I expect that they will be widely welcomed. Before the hon. Gentleman draws his conclusions, I would ask him to read the small print, although I am not accusing him of not doing so.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): I welcome the increase of 5.2 per cent. in grant formula for Luton council up to 2007 and the stability that the Minister is offering. I understand that this is the eighth consecutive year in which we have received an inflation or inflation-plus settlement for local authorities. However, is he aware that Liberal-Tory Luton council has already indicated that it will make swingeing cuts to social services on the basis of anticipated Government grant cuts, thus ending day care to the elderly and all but the most acute social services? Will he clarify that that is not necessary and investigate Liberal-Tory Luton, the financial mismanagement of which appears to be putting the most vulnerable in jeopardy?

Mr. Woolas: I thank my hon. Friend for her contribution. Proposals that are put forward on the basis of formulae that have not been consulted on are not real proposals. I sometimes think that those who advocate opposition to the formulae on which there has been consultation are the same people who ask for more consultation. Perhaps in this area, if not in others, we are damned if we do and damned if we do not.

I can give my hon. Friend the reassurance for which she asks. The proposed net increase in the 2006–07 formula grant for Luton is 2.8 per cent. The figure is 5.2 per cent. for South Bedfordshire council and 2 per cent. for Bedfordshire council. In the following year, the figure for Luton will be 4.9 per cent., and it will be 4.6 per cent. and 2.7 per cent. for South Bedfordshire and Bedfordshire councils respectively.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I declare an interest as a member of Kettering borough council. Is the Minister aware of the special situation that faces Northamptonshire, given that it is the county that faces the highest proportionate increase in its population as a result of the Government's growth area agenda? Will he advise the House which—and whose—population projections have been used by the Registrar General? The brief look that I have had at the document that has been produced today suggests to me that the Registrar General is rather underestimating the population increase in the county.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question and acknowledge readily that he has taken a close interest in the matter on behalf of his area through his participation in debates. I point him to the proposals on the use of population statistics that have been announced today. In the past there was simply a regressive look at population, but there is now a balance between historical growth and future projections. I am more than happy to look into the detail of his point, but I think that the Government should be given support and praise today for the acknowledgement that we have made—both in the pre-Budget report of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the local council settlement—of growth area demands, which, incidentally, exist throughout the country.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): In addition to the grant floor for different local authority types, will my hon. Friend explain further what he means by phasing of social services?

Mr. Woolas: I thank my hon. Friend for that question, which will be important to her constituents and people throughout London. I have announced today that in addition to the floor that is provided to give stability to different types of local authorities throughout the country, social services will themselves be subject to a floor of 2.7 per cent. in both the young people and adult formulae. As I said in my statement, the floor is a permanent part of the local government formula.

Orders of the Day

Work and Families Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

5.50 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This Government back Britain's families and back Britain's businesses. Those aims are not mutually exclusive, but mutually supportive. Flexible working raises employment levels for our economy, widens the talent pool for business and improves people's standards of living. It enables parents and other carers not only to stay in work, but to advance at work as well. It seeks to ensure that every child gets the best possible start in life.

The Bill has four main parts. It will extend paid maternity and adoption leave, extend the successful right to request flexible working to carers of adults, help fathers to play more of a role in their child's upbringing if the mother returns to work, and make it easier for employers to manage the administration of those rights.

The Bill is about fairness, social justice and genuine choice. It is a necessary response to unprecedented change within our society, to unprecedented change within our economy, with the growth of Asia, to advances in technology, and to huge shifts in demographics. It is also a response to unprecedented change in our homes. The old formula dictated that all mothers gave up work completely on childbirth, while fathers sometimes had to work longer hours to make up for the loss of income, particularly if the mother was the higher earner. Increasingly, fathers want to play a more active role in child care, beyond the first few weeks of the baby's life, and more and more mothers want to return to the workplace after having a child, often because of a financial imperative, but also because they see work as an important part of a fulfilled life.

Around half of all mothers now return to work after having a child compared with a quarter a generation ago. Men now take on a third of all child care. So the birth of a child need not be the end of the mother's career. Mothers should not be forced out of the work force when they would rather stay on, and businesses should not be deprived of highly skilled, highly trained, highly capable staff when they want to retain them.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I understand what the Secretary of State says and very much support the Bill, but one small group—those who have a family by means of surrogacy—has been missed out, and I have taken up a constituency case with Ministers in the light of employment relations. The Bill covers only natural birth and adoption. Will he consider including that small group within the ambit of the rights?

Alan Johnson: I would be prepared to consider that again. We found some complications with it, but there is every opportunity to look into that in Committee.

Providing genuine choice is important for the individuals concerned and for the companies for which they work, but it is also important for the country's continued economic prosperity. The Government are determined to increase the proportion of people in work from 75 per cent., which is the highest of any G7 country, to 80 per cent., a level achieved only in Iceland—that is the country, incidentally, not the retail outlet.

The so-called family-friendly agenda, which has a crucial economic dimension, was neglected for too long. When we came into power in 1997, a father could watch the birth of his child in the evening and be compelled to go to work the next morning. We established the entitlement to paid paternity leave for the first time in this country.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): Will the Secretary of State give an idea of the current take-up of the entitlement to two weeks' paternity pay? There is a great deal of concern that because the pay is quite low, and because of the straitjacket in terms of notice requirements and so on, the take-up is low.

Alan Johnson: I do not have the exact figure, but take-up is encouraging and high. The matter does not relate just to those people taking paid paternity leave under legislation, but to the number of companies that accept that paternity leave should be a normal part of employment rights. Many companies that have had arrangements for maternity leave have their own arrangements for paternity leave. I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman gets the correct figure, perhaps during the wind-up, but it is encouraging.

In 1997, a working mother could receive a phone call from school saying her child was ill and her employer could still insist that she stay at work. We introduced a right to time off to deal with family and domestic emergencies. In 1997, adoptive parents—incredibly—were given no help whatsoever, despite the huge benefits to society of taking children out of institutions and placing them in a loving family environment. We have given adoptive parents broadly the same rights to pay and leave as natural parents. In 1997, paid maternity leave was 18 weeks. By the end of this Parliament, it will be 52 weeks. In 1997, maternity pay was £55 a week. Today, it is £106 a week.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): The Secretary of State rightly suggests that the Bill should be about fairness. Is it fair that families who run small businesses should have to pay for the administrative costs of the changes that he is trying to implement?

Alan Johnson: In terms of maternity leave, the hon. Gentleman well knows that small businesses get 104.5 per cent. reimbursed, unlike larger companies. He was a distinguished member of the Committee that considered the Employment Bill. We also increased the level of national insurance contributions that determines the 104.5 per cent. so that more small firms managed to benefit from it. We have been meticulous in trying to keep the cost of the arrangements to an absolute minimum. In terms of maternity leave and its extension, we have introduced, as small businesses wanted us to, various arrangements to give practical assistance.

Mr. Prisk rose—

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con) rose—

Alan Johnson: I want to make one final point.

In relation to paternity leave, we are taking a power in the Bill. We intend to consult widely on the regulations to enact that. A large part of that will be to determine how small businesses are affected.

Mr. Burrowes: Although small businesses can reclaim contributions, does the Secretary of State appreciate the significant impact such leave has on them? As 95 per cent. have five employees or fewer, the loss of manpower and skills could be considerable. Although much in the Bill is to be credited, many might interpret it as tokenistic. A true family-friendly policy should be within the taxation system, to give proper recognition of single-earner households and to benefit them.

Alan Johnson: I do not accept that. Interestingly, the hon. Gentleman mentions manpower, so I presume he is talking about paternity leave. We do not initially expect a large queue of people waiting to take the leave. We think that it will apply to 16,000 to 18,000, and about one in 700 small businesses will be affected every couple of years. It is unlikely to have an enormous impact.

I want to stress the positive impact on the employment market and small businesses in particular. Many small businesses, including a small business man, Simon Topman, helped us to shape much of what we have done on work-life balance since we came into power. It is about ensuring that small businesses do not lose valued members of staff. People, usually women, found it difficult to balance their working life with their domestic requirements. Many small businesses have been pleased that the legislation has been implemented because it helps to retain staff.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alan Johnson: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow).

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I have just taken a short and enjoyable period of paternity leave and I might plan to take some more, to the obvious and understandable delight of the Whips. With reference to the secondary legislation provided for in clauses 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, will the regulations be subject to the negative procedure of the House or to its affirmative counterpart?

Alan Johnson: The regulations will be subject to the affirmative counterpart.

John Bercow: Excellent.

Alan Johnson: Although we would all miss the hon. Gentleman when he goes on paternity leave, I hope that he takes it.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): To return to the point made by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk), does my right hon. Friend agree that small businesses benefit from offering flexibility to their staff, because they might otherwise lose experienced staff whose replacements would be expensive to train? The logic behind the provision is that by offering staff flexibility, a business retains their skills.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In fact, the average cost, for example, of the right to request flexible working is £80 whereas the average cost of recruiting a new employee is £4,800.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I am concerned about the Minister's statements on how the measure will affect small businesses. Is he not worried that if more burdens are placed on small businesses, they will design their work force to avoid the people who might receive paternity and maternity rights? [Interruption.]

Alan Johnson: As the chorus behind me is pointing out, that would be illegal. The hon. Gentleman makes the argument that we heard when we introduced the right to request, when we introduced the national minimum wage, when we introduced adoptive leave—in fact, on every occasion when we have tackled that agenda. Conservative Members such as the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) and the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) recognise that it is an important agenda. It is about time their party adopted a positive approach to it. As soon as we get anywhere near setting up decent, civilised, minimum standards in the workplace, we hear a chorus of, "This will reduce people's ability to recruit staff." Yes, that is a crucial concern that needs to be tackled and we have tried very hard to ensure that it is, with some success.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): In addition to emphasising the benefits to small businesses of the measures in the Bill, will my right hon. Friend resist the siren calls to deal with the matter purely through the tax system, which is a regressive way of dealing with it? Maternity rights and benefits have benefited a lot of low-earning families and dealing with the matter through the tax system will benefit only those who can afford to live on one wage.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point more eloquently than I could. We must consider that during our debate.

Mr. Prisk: Some time ago, when answering my original question, the Secretary of State said that small business organisations had made clear representations that they favoured elements of the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe) indicated assent.

Mr. Prisk: I see the Under-Secretary of State nod. Unfortunately, he has just given me a reply to a written question that states that he is not aware of what the representations from small businesses were. Will the Secretary of State now answer a simple question? A moment ago, he told the House that he understood that the small business community was very much in favour of the changes, especially the maternity leave provisions. Will he therefore explain why 80 per cent. of the respondents to a survey conducted by the British Chambers of Commerce said that they had grave reservations and opposed those changes? I, like the right hon. Gentleman, want to do the right thing for parents, but we must do the right thing for businesses as well.

Alan Johnson: I think that that survey, if it is accurate, was about interchangeable leave, which has now turned into additional paternity leave, and the idea that small businesses would have to police a system in which they had to know that the mother had returned to work before they could give authority for the father to take the additional paternity leave. That is why we have taken a power in the Bill to ensure that we are able to consult widely. We have ideas, which will probably emerge during this debate, about how to achieve that using a very light touch.

The issues that small businesses mentioned to us included the rule that maternity leave and maternity pay start on different days and the complication that that produces. Small businesses asked why it could not all start on the same day and whether the rate could be a daily rate, rather than a weekly one. The latter would help with another issue that they raised, which was that if a woman was going to be away from the workplace for up to 12 months, there should be an opportunity to bring her back in—for a day's training, for example—with the agreement of both sides and without penalty. If that happens now, the woman loses a week's maternity pay, just for coming back for a refresher day to get used to new technology. Those are practical considerations, as is small businesses' request that a woman who returns from maternity leave before the end of that leave should have to give more than four weeks' notice, which is all she has to give now. We have therefore doubled that requirement to eight weeks, because that is a legitimate and practical thing to do. In that and many other ways, we have shown that we are keen to help small businesses to deal with these matters.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Before moving on will the Secretary of State answer what I feel is an illogical point in the arguments made by some Labour Members? If he is right and the measures will be of great benefit to small businesses, because it would cost them £80 to process an application for maternity leave whereas it would cost some £4,000 to train high-value staff, why cannot businesses work that out for themselves, without his law making them do it?

Alan Johnson: I was talking about right to request costing £80. When we introduced the right to request—I see several faces familiar from the time spent scrutinising that legislation—we were told that it would be the end of civilisation itself, that it would be horrendously bureaucratic and would affect people's jobs, but that simply has not happened.

The cost to business of the maternity leave provisions has hardly figured in the representations. Concerns have been voiced about paternity leave and the extension of right to request, but little concern has been expressed about providing that a mother should have nine months' paid maternity leave instead of six months and that that should eventually increase to 12 months. That has widespread support.

John Bercow: The Secretary of State is being extremely generous in giving way. In clause 13, which deals with annual leave, he is proposing to be able in certain situations to introduce regulations to prescribe certain periods—presumably minimum periods—of annual leave to be allowed. I ask in all seriousness, is the intention to apply the power relatively narrowly in order to cater to the interests of groups of workers who have either no annual leave entitlement to speak of, or a very modest entitlement? I refer, for example, to the cleaners contracted to work for the House of Commons, who have a pathetically inadequate annual leave period of 12 days. If the intention were to deal with that situation, there could be a lot to be said for the clause. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain.

Alan Johnson: The intention is to fulfil a manifesto commitment that employers will no longer be allowed to take bank holidays into account as part of employees' four-weeks statutory entitlement to annual leave. Bank and public holidays must be additional to the four weeks' paid leave. That is the reason for the clause.

So, Madam Deputy Speaker, I return—

Norman Lamb: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Alan Johnson: Well, I almost returned to my script—[Laughter.] I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Norman Lamb: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his generosity. On the point that he just made, the Confederation of British Industry has suggested that any increase in annual leave entitlement to deal with bank holidays should be phased in to allow businesses to adjust. Does he have in mind such a phasing-in?

Alan Johnson: Again, we have taken a power in the Bill because we want to consult widely and listen to such arguments. That will be an important part of the debate on that part of the Bill.

Since 1997 we have trebled the financial support that a working family gets in the first year of a child's life from £2,610 in 1997 to more than £8,000 by April 2007. We have created 1.2 million additional child care places and guaranteed all three and four-year-olds a free part-time nursery place. It is worth remembering that the Conservative party opposed every single one of those measures.

The Bill has four principal parts. The first part will allow us to extend paid maternity leave and adoption leave from six months to nine months from April 2007. By the end of this Parliament, we intend to extend that to a full 12 months' paid maternity leave. The second part will extend paternity leave and paternity pay. Paternity leave will increase by up to six months in the second half of the baby's first year if the mother returns to work. The third part of the Bill will extend the right to request flexible working from April 2007 so that it covers carers of adults, as well as parents of small children and disabled children up to 18 years of age. The right to request has been an enormous success and has been taken up by almost one in four parents—almost 1 million parents in total. Eighty per cent. of all requests for more flexible working have been agreed immediately, with a further 10 per cent. agreed with modification as a result of discussions between employer and employee. Only one in 10 requests have been refused.

Most respondents to our consultation said that carers of adults should be the priority in extending the right to request. Some 6.6 million people have caring responsibilities and 3.5 million of them have jobs. Their role in society has become more important, given the ageing population and a growing need for family care rather than institutional care. That is why this aspect of the Bill will make an important contribution to the economic as well as the social environment.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I hope that the Secretary of State will not finish his introductory remarks without placing on record his appreciation of mothers who decide to stay at home to bring up their children. Where in the Bill are there proposals to improve their pension entitlements when they eventually retire, perhaps after going back to work once their children have grown up?

Alan Johnson: They are not in this Bill, but they are in the Turner report, and we will have to wait for the response to Turner. As I said earlier, the Bill is about genuine choice. If a mother's genuine choice is to stay at home with her child, that is fine—that is exactly as it should be. However, we do not want women being forced to stay at home because they have no alternative and having to give up their career. Nor do employers want that; it is bad for society and for the employment market in general, but it happened quite regularly before these measures were introduced.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): The Secretary of State said that the right to request flexible working would be extended to carers, and I applaud that vital step. As he said, we are talking about 10 per cent. of the population, or about 6 million carers. Friday was carers' rights day, and I met carers in my constituency who were juggling work and caring, which is difficult. Will the Secretary of State tell the House what definition of caring he intends to use in the regulations, because it is important that that definition remains as simple and flexible as possible?

Alan Johnson: I agree with my hon. Friend. We have not yet decided precisely how we will define it. Obviously, we cannot be simplistic and say that it applies just to elderly parents; siblings also have to be looked after. We cannot say that people have to live in the same house; they could live in another house nearby. We therefore aim to publish draft regulations as the Bill goes through the House so that people can see at all stages what our ideas are and so that we can bring the proposals to fruition for their introduction in April 2007, as we promised in our manifesto.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend said that he wanted to support women in their choices. When he issues the regulations during the passage of the Bill, I urge him to bear in mind those women who want to go back to work before the six month period. They may simply want to return to work, but they may also be the higher earner in the relationship or run a business that would go to the wall if they did not take a hands-on approach. In those circumstances, I very much hope that my right hon. Friend agrees that fathers who want to exercise their paternity rights before the end of the six month period should be allowed to do so.

Alan Johnson: We will certainly reflect on that. The result of the consultation that we published in February was a clear preference to protect that first six months, not least because of the World Health Organisation drive, to which we subscribe, to encourage women to breastfeed for the first six months of a child's life. That was the overwhelming response to the consultation. However, as the Bill proceeds through Parliament, we will listen to representations to see whether we should be more flexible.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The Secretary of State helpfully said that draft regulations would be published while the Bill proceeds through the House. The timetabling motion says that the Bill will complete its Committee stage by Tuesday 20 December. Does he intend to make those draft regulations available to the Committee before it finishes its work?

Alan Johnson: We can try. The timetable is a little tight, but I hope that we can publish those regulations before the Committee rises. That is probably a heroic ambition, but I hope that we can publish the regulations while the Bill completes its remaining stages and certainly by the time that it returns from the Lords.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the consultation on the regulations is important, particularly in relation to carers for adults and disabled people, many of whom do not regard themselves as carers at all? They would not immediately recognise that they are entitled to a request for flexible working, for example, because they are motivated by a sense of duty and loyalty, and they do not regard themselves as carers.

Alan Johnson: Once the Bill has completed its passage through the House, we must ensure that people, including carers, understand the provisions that are designed to help them. When the right to request was originally introduced in 2002, it quickly became a well-known factor in the workplace. Indeed, many carers asked us at an early stage whether it could be extended to them. There is therefore quite a high level of awareness, but I accept the important point that my hon. Friend made. We must work to ensure that awareness is increased.

I was talking about the important role of carers in society, which is a significant aspect of the Bill.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): To pursue the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) about a mother wanting to return to work before the end of the six-month period, does my right hon. Friend agree that a mother who wants to extend maternity leave beyond the six-month period may feel that she is being forced to return to work, even though she does not necessarily want to do so, to allow some father and child bonding to occur and because, otherwise, the father will not be able to use his paternity leave?

Alan Johnson: Given the way in which we plan to introduce the legislation, that will not be a concern. Two criteria must be satisfied for the provision to be implemented. First, the father must be working and in employment and, secondly, the mother must take maternity leave, then return to work. The point made by my hon. Friend is one reason why people suggested that we should keep the six months exclusively for the mother. I do not accept that the danger he outlined will arise, but we will look at the provision more carefully as the Bill proceeds through the House.

Norman Lamb: To return to the issue of flexible working and carers, the right hon. Gentleman's response to an earlier intervention suggests that he is looking at a wide definition rather than one that applies to a narrow group of people, which would be of little value. Will he confirm that that is the case? The Parkinson's Disease Society points out that it is problematic to make a request only once a year, particularly with conditions that vary over time. Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect on that to ensure that there is sufficient flexibility for people who care for individuals with conditions that may change over time so that they can return to their employer to discuss alterations to their arrangements?

Alan Johnson: We will reflect further on that point—the hon. Gentleman has said that that means that we will not do so, but that is not the case. We think that one request is correct, because it would be difficult for employers and, indeed, employees if such requests were to become six-weekly rituals. In that case, someone who had been granted flexible working would have to ask for it again a little while later. Furthermore, if a dialogue were to take place in which everyone accepted that a company could not work like that, it is unlikely that that company would be able to grant a flexible working request two months later. Those are the reasons why we originally limited requests to one a year, but, obviously, if the society that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned wants to make a representation on that point, we can re-examine the matter.

Fourthly, the Bill includes a number of deregulatory measures to help business manage absences related to child care. Businesses said that they need more notice of when women who do not want to take their full entitlement plan to return from maternity leave. As I have said, we have increased the period of notice from one month to two, which provides the kind of certainty that will greatly assist employers. Employers also said that they would like to calculate maternity, adoption and paternity pay in daily as well as weekly amounts, because the rules on maternity leave and pay were out of sync and were creating problems. As I have said, we intend to address those employers' concerns.

Businesses also said that the rules about contact were too restrictive, meaning that employees were missing out on things that they wanted to do, such as training. The Bill contains a power to allow "keeping-in-touch days", so that where employers and employees agree, a limited number of days of work can be done without employees sacrificing pay or ending their leave. We will follow that up by introducing regulations that make it clear that employers can make reasonable contact with their employees on maternity leave and adoption leave.

Finally, the Bill also includes a power to deliver our manifesto commitments on annual leave. While many people already get bank holidays in addition to their statutory leave, some do not, and the powers in the Bill will enable us to rectify that. However, we do not underestimate the complexity of the matter and will consult fully before exercising those powers.

Mr. Prisk: Will the Secretary of State tell the House whether those powers are retrospective? I assume that they are not, but the legislation does not make the matter clear.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman's assumption is correct—those powers are not retrospective.

In closing, there is a myth about the family friendly agenda that it will stop employers taking on women, and we have touched on that point in interventions. Yet female employment rates are rising, and countries with more family friendly policies have more women in jobs and senior positions than elsewhere. The best businesses are competing to offer more flexible working patterns, because they know that such working patterns are good for business.

The Bill promotes, rather than hampers, competitiveness; it broadens, rather than narrows, choice; it is good for business; it is good for families; and, most importantly, it is good for children. It is a Bill that progressive politicians on both sides of the House should support, and I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am pleased to say that we agree with many of the aims of this Bill and some of the proposals within it. However, I am bound to tell the Secretary of State that I am disappointed by the complete lack of joined-up government. I shall repeat a point that I made only a week ago in this House, when we debated the Childcare Bill and discussed how it could help parents to achieve a work-life balance: this Bill is also about helping parents to achieve a better work-life balance, so surely the two should have been put together in one Bill, which would have enabled us to examine and debate both sides of the issue. Instead, the Government have chosen to introduce this separate Bill, which has only 20 clauses.

Given the Government's insistence that the two Bills should be handled separately, it is surprising that they appear to have had such difficulty in deciding who should lead for them tonight—during the course of today, we have been told about three different ministerial line-ups, but I am pleased that the Secretary of State has led for the Government in tonight's debate.

John Bercow: We are gratified.

Mrs. May: It sounds like my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) is rather too easily gratified.

In my role as shadow Secretary of State for the family, I have opened both debates for the official Opposition, which shows that we are more interested than the Government in joined-up thinking. The fact that I have been joined by my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), who is a member of our Department of Trade and Industry Front-Bench team, shows that we want to achieve a balance between family and business needs. I urge the Government to ensure that while they are going through interesting and difficult times—the leadership, pensions reform and education reform—they do not lose sight of delivering the important aims of both this Bill and the Childcare Bill, which will have a significant impact on both families and businesses across the country.

The Secretary of State has referred to the movement among many businesses up and down the country to understand and deliver on the need for more flexible working practices. Small businesses often find it difficult to enact such provisions, but they often provide flexible working, although they would not perceive it as such—they perceive it as ensuring that long-standing or expert members of their work force can be kept within the workplace.

Conservative Members recognise that for many families, balancing the demands of family and career is incredibly difficult. Recent polling by the Equal Opportunities Commission found that nearly seven in 10 women and men agreed or agreed strongly that women's and men's lives are becoming more alike in terms of their need to balance work and family life. The poll also found that 70 per cent. of people were concerned about what family life would be like for their children and grandchildren, and more than six in 10 were concerned about spending enough time with their family. Indeed, the EOC polling showed that people were more concerned about those issues than they were about the state of the health service or crime in their local area. Many families simply have no choice about whether one or both parents goes out to work, and the kind of support that we were discussing last week on the Childcare Bill and now on this Bill can make the difference for families between coping and not.

Many new mothers want to get back to work as quickly as possible. They want to enjoy a good career and a good relationship with their children, but they sometimes find it hard to do so, because of the prohibitive costs of child care. Other mothers would like to take longer off work to care for their newborn child, but simply do not feel that they can afford the absence from work. Both are equally valid choices, and both put mothers under enormous strain.

We all recognise that the early months in a child's life are incredibly important and that the positive effects on a child's development from time spent at home with their mother can be hugely beneficial in many cases, which is why we support the Government's intention to extend the period of maternity pay to 39 weeks. Measures which give parents more choice will continue to gain our backing, but many parents will still feel unable to take so long off work. Sometimes they do not want to be away from their jobs for such a long time, but in many cases they are forced back to work earlier than they might wish because they cannot afford to stay at home on the current provision.

We have always said that new parents should have a real choice about whether and for how long they stay at home with their newborn child. All families are different, and their needs and priorities are different, and the system of maternity pay should be as flexible as possible to meet those needs. Many families will find that the pay offered over the nine-month period is still not enough, which is why we announced plans at the last election to give mothers the option of receiving the total sum that the Government propose to pay over nine months over six months instead. They would thereby have had a significantly increased sum of maternity pay over those six months. We wanted to offer parents a real choice between that significantly increased maternity pay for six months and the current level of maternity pay over nine months and to put them back in control of whether and when they go back to work.

Earlier this year, in an article in The House Magazine, my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) set out several proposals that he believed the Government should be pursuing in order to ensure that businesses were protected as regards maternity and paternity pay. He cited:

> "An increase to the current 28 days notice period for all women returning to work . . . Central administration of maternity benefits with the opportunity for larger businesses to opt out of a central scheme"

and

> "clearer guidelines for communication between employers and employees during the maternity leave period."

I am pleased that the Secretary of State said that the Government will move on at least two of those points, notably on the increased period of notice, which will be welcomed by all employers, and on communication between employers and employers during the maternity leave period. For many mothers, it is extremely important to continue to have contact with the workplace, not only to keep abreast of developments but to feel that they are still in touch with the workplace and have not been forgotten and left to one side.

I note that those matters are to be taken up in regulations instead of being covered in the Bill. I return to the point that was ably made by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham, who cited several clauses that refer to regulations. A significant amount of the Bill's detail is subject to regulations. I welcome the Secretary of State's commitment to publishing draft regulations as soon as possible. It would be preferable if that could be dealt with in Committee, but at least we should be able to look at the detail when the Bill returns on Report. This is a short Bill, and an awful lot of it will be subject to what those regulations say.

John Bercow: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for her remarks. The Secretary of State responded to my intervention dextrously and without a moment's hesitation, as is his wont, but I am not entirely certain that his answer was correct. I specifically asked him about the order-making powers in clauses 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, where no reference to the affirmative procedure is made, in marked contrast to provisions in later clauses. If I am wrong, I am happy to concede that, but I do not think that I am.

Mrs. May: I understood the Secretary of State to indicate that all the regulations in those clauses would be subject to the affirmative procedure, notwithstanding that that is not mentioned in the Bill. Perhaps he could clarify that.

Alan Johnson: I shall try to be as dextrous as possible. I am pretty sure that that applies to all the clauses. The point to which I gave a quick answer concerned paternity leave, which will be subject to affirmative resolution.

Mrs. May: I suspect that we will return to this in Committee.

We recognise that the right to request has been successful since it was introduced. Everyone, including employers' organisations such as the CBI, agrees that it has worked in balancing the needs of employers and employees. It is encouraging that 90 per cent. of requests are being accommodated by employers. That has had a positive impact on the families who have benefited and on business. In looking to extend it, it is right that the Government should do so only one group at a time.

As the Secretary of State acknowledged, Britain's carers make a significant contribution to our society. Indeed, it is estimated that they save the Treasury about £57 billion a year. They deserve the same life chances that we all take for granted—to enjoy a fulfilling career and to have a healthy life and financial stability in old age. Many carers want to continue working and enjoy the independence and the break from their caring responsibilities that work provides. More than 2.5 million of the 6 million or more carers juggle care with paid work, but as many as 50 per cent. have been forced to give up work because of their caring responsibilities.

Flexible working and the promotion of family-friendly policies are good for employers and benefit business, with improved employee relations, greater staff retention, lower recruitment costs and a happier, more motivated work force. That is why we will support the Government's aim of extending the right to request to carers. We are, however, concerned that the definition of "carer" needs careful consideration. As the hon. Member for Worsley (Barbara Keeley) said, we must ensure that we get it correct. What plans do the Government have to work with carers' groups and businesses to ensure that it not only benefits the groups that it is intended to benefit but is workable for the businesses that will put this into practice?

It is clear that some employees feel increasingly put upon or hard done by as a result of parents or carers being allowed rights such as the right to request. Many of these new rights work only because of the goodwill of work colleagues who do the extra shifts or accommodate the changes in work patterns for employees. It is important to ensure that the system does not build up resentment in the workplace. Many businesses are now seeing the case for allowing all employees the right to request flexible working. I would be interested to hear what discussions the Government are having with the CBI and others on extending these rights further in due course.

As I said, we support moves to help families and to give them greater control over their working and family lives. However, we all recognise that any family-friendly policies in the workplace will be successful only if they help business to innovate and to stay competitive. The measures that we have talked about, along with better child care and increased support for parents, allow business to make better use of its work force. They allow employers to retain skilled and effective staff and to keep up morale. The business case has been proven. That is why, in so many cases, business has been leading the way. We should pay tribute to that. Many businesses have found yet more innovative ways to help their staff and to get the best out of them. But the Government's measures will not work if they affect competitiveness. There is no point in being family-friendly if we are not job-friendly.

When the Secretary of State went on the "Today" programme to herald the Bill, he prayed in aid the CBI and claimed that the Bill was supported by business, but that is not quite the case. Yes, the CBI supports the extension of paid maternity leave and the extension of flexible working, as well as the increase from 28 days to two months of the notice period for employers when the mother intends to return to work, and the clarification about reasonable contact. However, business has grave concerns about other parts of the Bill. As the CBI said in the briefing that it sent out today:

> "Serious concerns remain over Additional Paternity Leave and whether the Government will deliver significant support for employers".

In the words of John Cridland, the CBI's deputy director general:

> "The government cannot have its cake and eat it".

Employers were originally told that this would be a "balanced" Bill giving increased rights to employees, with greater powers for and decreased burdens on business. However, several of the measures set to help business that the Government flagged up at an earlier stage have been dropped, seriously affecting the balance between family-friendly and employer-friendly policies.

Why did the Government decide not to proceed with the proposed transferable maternity leave and pay scheme that they outlined in their election manifesto earlier this year? The hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) mentioned that in her intervention on the Secretary of State. Do officials believe that there is a significant risk that the manifesto pledge on transferability would contravene equality legislation? It would be interesting for Members who will serve on the Committee to see the legal advice that the Government received. The Government have a habit of ditching manifesto commitments, but it is unusual to see it so early after a general election. There is genuine concern in business that the Government are not, as they first proposed, implementing transferable maternity leave, which the CBI accepted as long as it was administratively simple, but are instead introducing a new right to paternity leave. There is a real difference between those two things.

Alan Johnson: We have been at pains to explain to the CBI and others that the paternity leave proposals will introduce precisely what would have applied under interchangeability. European and domestic law is tight on protecting the rights of women, so providing for some interchangeability and for them to be allowed to give up some of their leave was difficult legally. We have found another way to achieve that: the woman must be back at work for her partner, the father, to pick up the remaining leave. We always intended—because it was the result of the consultation—for that to happen in the second six months of the baby's first year. The actual outcome is therefore exactly as we pledged it in the manifesto. It is simply not interchangeability, which we originally envisaged, because of the legal problems.

Mrs. May: I am grateful for that clarification and I accept that an element of transferability remains in the Government's introduction of the additional paternity leave. However, the way in which it is being done in the Bill creates a new right to paternity leave and many employers are concerned about that. They are not necessarily worried about the transferability element but about the potential requirements for the paternity leave further down the line. I remain attracted to the concept of interchangeability. Indeed, we proposed that for consideration more than a year ago. The hon. Member for Burnley set out some of the circumstances in which a family may feel that it makes sense for them for the transferability to happen earlier than at the end of the first six months. I am sure that we shall revert to transferability and its legal aspects when we consider the Bill in more detail in Committee.

Earlier, I referred to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Havant. One of his suggestions to the Government related to the central administration of maternity benefits. Small employers in particular find the statutory maternity pay calculation and the paperwork involved complex. As has been widely discussed in the past, small firms should focus on winning new business, not filling in forms for the Government. They would greatly benefit if the administration of statutory maternity pay were handed back to the Revenue, assuming that a simple procedure for supplying the information to the Government could be developed.

Many larger firms are happy to continue to administer statutory maternity pay because they are more aware of the rules and more likely to pay occupational maternity pay and they have already invested in the systems that enable them to do that easily. However, many small businesses would perceive the central administration of maternity pay as a significant opportunity to reduce the burden of maternity leave. I continue to believe that it would make sense for the Government to allow firms to choose whether they hand back the administration of statutory maternity pay to the Revenue, providing employers, especially small businesses, with much-needed extra support to help them cope with the significant extra and unexpected burdens.

Alan Johnson: I accept that Opposition Members have not had time to absorb the figures but does the right hon. Lady agree that, if direct payments cost the taxpayer £75 million for a saving to business of £1.1 million and only £400,000 to small businesses—those figures are the outcome of extensive discussions with businesses—it is not worth proceeding with the idea?

Mrs. May: I have only recently heard those figures. I have not seen the calculation and I do not therefore necessarily accept them. I acknowledge that the Government wish to make a balanced judgment on the cost to the taxpayer and that to small business. However, I find it surprising that the benefit to small business is as small as the Secretary of State suggests. Business organisations have asked questions about the validity of the Government's figures.

Mr. Prisk: I accept that the figures are recent and that the Secretary of State's offer to make the process more transparent is welcome. However, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a shame that the regulatory impact assessments appear to make several omissions? Indeed, no calculation is made for time loss. For businesses, time equals money. Does my right hon. Friend agree that Government regulatory impact assessments make a huge mistake in not including the cost to business of the loss of time?

Mrs. May: I agree with my hon. Friend's analysis of the problems with the figures that the Government provide. That is precisely why I am reluctant to accept the figures that the Secretary of State cited at the Dispatch Box today.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It strikes me that the Secretary of State's statement clearly shows that private business can do things a lot better than the Government. However, it probably also shows that the Government have grossly underestimated the cost to small businesses. There must be some mechanism whereby small businesses get additional payments if they are to continue to do the administration.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend makes some valid points about the genuine impact of legislation on small businesses. Our debate is about getting the balance right between the need to encourage greater ability for families to find the work-life balance that will suit them and to ensure that, in doing so, we are not restricting the competitiveness of British business.

Peter Luff: The Secretary of State produced a fascinating set of figures. If they are accurate, it is difficult to argue with his case. However, it might help us to form a judgment if we knew whether the figures had come from the Treasury or the Department of Trade and Industry. That would colour my interpretation of them.

Mrs. May: My understanding is that the Treasury, not the Department of Trade and Industry, did the major work on the figures. That may colour both the figures and my hon. Friend's view of them.

Although we support measures that make parents more able to spend time with their children, we remain to be convinced that the Government can introduce a system for managing paternity pay that allows the necessary checks to prevent abuse but is not overly bureaucratic for employers to administer. On past form, we are doubtful that the Government will deliver.

We also seek greater clarification of the proposals, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham and the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) referred, for introducing regulations to give the Government the power through secondary legislation to bring in new rules on leave entitlement.

[Mrs. May]

In his responses to interventions, the Secretary of State made it clear that the Government intended to introduce powers to ensure that the annual leave entitlement for employees did not include the UK's eight bank holidays. If my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham is correct, the House authorities will have to pay some attention to that proposal.

I am sure that most employers want to ensure that their staff have adequate paid holiday and will support the need to provide it for their employees, but that move will impose a substantial cost on some businesses and I doubt that many will relish the thought of giving the Government carte blanche to change the rules. Although the Secretary of State was specific about the intention of clause 13, the provision is vague and simply gives the Secretary of State the power to introduce secondary legislation that can affect the rules on leave entitlement. We will want to press the Government on that. If they have a specific intention, it should be in the Bill. Many employers might accept what the Government and the Secretary of State say about bank holidays as part of annual leave entitlement, but they would be worried about giving the Government a simple power to introduce—at some stage in the future—other regulations on leave entitlement.
